On the other hand, for today's 20-year-olds, the amendments demand 40 quarters in covered employment to qualify for benefits; and if today's youth stay all their working lives in covered employment, their compulsory contributions (which will rise to 2 percent in 1954 and 3½ percent in 1970) will amount to sufficient to buy a policy from a private company.

Although the amendments do raise the earned income exemption from $15 to $50 per month after 65, there is no ceiling on unearned income and retirement is still at a premium, although our economy needs more, not fewer workers, and it is generally agreed that continued employment rather than retirement is better for the aging individual himself.

Similarly, the amendments ease the discrimination against women by the innovation of dependent husband's benefits. But the system still assumes that a woman needs less to live on than a man, not only when husband and wife are living together, but when she is a widow and alone.

Most grotesque of all is the System's continued discrimination against the "underprivileged." While raising the highest primary benefits to $80 per month, the amendments only raise the lowest benefits to $20 per month—still not enough to live on independently over most of the United States. And, while extending coverage to some of the richest men and women in the country, the new law still excludes some fifteen to twenty million of the gainfully employed, including those most likely to be in need.

Investigation reveals the astounding picture of bank presidents, corporation executives, and Hollywood stars among those receiving OASI benefits as a right—a right for which they have only made compulsory token contributions, remember—while marginal domestic servants, migratory farm labor, share-croppers, and the widow whose deceased husband failed by a few dollars to acquire insured status, must await their turn to prove absolute need before being given public assistance.

Is this security, or is it sand in our eyes?

ECONOMIC INSECURITY

Now let us consider the economic aspects of the present system.

Individual security is only as secure as the economic soundness of the Nation; and there are enough ominous signs that the hand-outs we are contemplating will, in due time, undermine our entire national economy.

In the first place, OASI is not an insurance at all in the actuarial sense. This is readily understandable when a comparison is made between the total contributions and the windfall benefits of persons retiring during the first 20 years. Even with the rising pay-roll-tax rate during the maturing years of the system, benefits far outstrip what the employee's contribution or tax would purchase actuarially. This means that other people must pay the actuarial margin of error. Not only is the employers' part of the tax passed on to the consumers in higher prices, but the forfeiture of some contributors add to the windfall of others.

In addition, there is the question of what happens to the payroll taxes collected. Obviously the money cannot be kept safe and sound in a sock. It must, under law, be invested in Government obligations. The Government promptly spends the money, pays interest to itself from the taxpayers' pockets on the slips of paper in the Treasury and then, when these OASI IOU's fall due, must either float new bond issues or tax the people again to get the cash to pay the benefits.

But by far the most dangerous element in the economics of the liberalized law is the rising cost of the dual old age and survivors insurance public-assistance system. OASI deferred payments increase precipitously as greater numbers retire on a high-benefit scale. And, if past performance is any indication of future trends, political pressures will continue to multiply the millions of Federal grants-in-aid for State and local public assistance.

Dr. H. G. Moulton, president of the Brookings Institution, in his preface to the Cost and Financing of Social Security by Lewis Meriam and Karl T. Schlotterbeck, declares:

"The old age and survivors insurance system in its present form involves constantly mounting costs over a 50-year period. Great confusion has been engendered in the public mind because of the assumption that these costs can be gradually provided for through the application of ordinary insurance principles. That is, it is widely believed that the social-security taxes now being paid furnish the resources from which the future benefits may be paid. The fact is that a practically universal governmental system cannot successfully apply the actuarial legal reserve devices of private, voluntary insurance systems. As the present system operates, no real reserve funds with which to meet future requirements are accumulated. The benefits will have to be paid out of future taxes.

"The future demands upon the Government for benefit payments—to be paid out of future taxes—will be so great that it appears to us essential that they be given full consideration now before the commitments are made. The demand for cash for benefits must be studied in the light of other governmental cash requirements for national defense, foreign relations, veterans' benefits, interest on the public debt, and all other activities of Government."

The authors conclude with a recommendation for a true pay-as-you-go system under which persons now in need will have those needs met from current revenues.

POLITICAL INSECURITY

Now, Mr. President, let us stop for a moment to inquire how we managed to develop a system of ostensible security which in fact endangers our national well-being.

In my opinion, Mr. President, this has happened without our knowing it for three reasons:

1. Social insurance is a foreign concept, started by the German chancellor, Otto von Bismarck, in the 1880's to buy off democracy in his time. The idea of insurance was a political trick to raise revenue while fooling the people into believing in their right to state-guaranteed assistance. It was a poor substitute for that opportunity which was opening before the peoples of the western powers. But it worked in the rigidly class-conscious German society, to keep the masses subservient to the Crown, to the Weimar Republic, and finally to Adolph Hitler.

Grafted on to the American scene, the old age insurance benefit formula, determined by the payroll tax (despite some minor differences) could not but create class prejudice and work hardships here as abroad.

A windfall Federal hand-out to an American bank president at 65 affords him no more dignity than a needs-tested public assistance check does a poor widow.

2. The fact that OASI excluded so many classes of our population and the Federal Government guaranteed open-end grants-in-aid to the States to help them with their assistance programs was an invitation to local politicians to promise free Federal money to their constituents. Thus the fantastic mushroom growth of the State old age assistance programs.

3. The public in general has been kept in ignorance both of the foreign origin of OASI and of the political and economic implications of the dual social security system, while more, bigger, and better persons was the hue and cry of many voters as well as vote-getters from coast to coast.

However, Mr. President, I do not believe that the people of this country would be so stupid or unpatriotic as to undermine our national economy for short-term personal gain—if they realized what they were doing, if they were told the truth. Certainly the mess we are in is not the social security the people thought they were voting for.

Last year former President Hoover wrote to Chairman DOUGHTON, of the Ways and Means Committee, as follows:

"The real and urgent problem is the need group. It is not solved now, nor can it be solved for many years, by the Federal insurance system, even if that system can be made to work efficiently."

After recommending that an independent research body be established to analyze other possible systems, Mr. Hoover concluded:

"A careful inquiry might disclose an entirely different system which would avoid the huge costs of administration and duplication, which would substitute some other form of taxation, more simple and more direct for its support, and which would give more positive security to the aged than this complicated system."

Mr. President, during more than 3 months of public hearings and many weeks of executive session, the Senate Finance Committee labored to report out social security amendments that would be fair and just to all Americans. However, we found that it was impossible to devise an old-age social insurance formula to make the present aged eligible for benefits or to cover those most likely to be in need—such as marginal domestics, migratory farm labor, and share croppers. It was impossible because old-age social insurance was designed for the wage earner, not for the population as a whole.

I strongly suspect that the majority of the Finance Committee is not only unhappy concerning the conglomerate amendments which now have become law, but, for reasons of justice and considerations of economy, would favor an honest pay-as-you-go social security system. This is proven by the proposed committee resolution to set up a subcommittee specifically instructed to study pay-as-you-go.

It became apparent during the hearings that the opponents of the present system fall into three principal groups: (1) Those who would like to see a pay-as-you-go plan adopted, but who cling to the idea of contributions; (2) those who want a pay-as-you-go, low, flat-rate floor of protection for all citizens without a means test; (3) those who believe with the Brookings Institution in pay-as-you-go protection for the aged but on the basis of some kind of a means test, as the only system economically sound.

The proposal which I am about to outline is an attempt to follow Mr. Hoover's recommendations and to incorporate in one universal-eligibility, pay-as-you-go, contributory social security program, the best features of the various points of view. That is: (1) Equal protection for all under the law; (2) freedom from the means test; (3) universal contribution; and (4) economic soundness; pay-as-you-go, go-as-you-pay on an income-tax, income-supplement basis, for all aged persons and dependent children whose income or means of support drops below a given minimum.

AMERICAN CITIZENS PENSION PLAN

In a nutshell, my program, after wiping the slate clean of the fallacious foreign concept of social insurance under which selected classes make token contributions toward annuity rights, would recognize the right of every American citizen to protection, on the fire-insurance principle, in case of need in old age. It would provide pensions on a mathematical sliding scale, without a means test and without discrimination, in amounts to supplement inadequacies of income. The important problem of old-age protection would thus be solved in a manner that would neither bankrupt the Nation nor humiliate the recipients.

Here is the plan in broad outline predicated upon the asumption that a top-flight commission be appointed to work out details and to follow up the provisions affecting the aged in principle also for dependent children:

I. Pension provisions: Create a new social security system as a substitute for the indefensible dual OASI-public assistance provisions of the present act, under which:

A. Every American citizen aged 65 and over would have the right to a citizen's pension, according to the following conditions:

1. Every individual over 65 whose estimation of income for the year ahead (as currently required for income tax purposes) was $600 or less, would receive a citizens pension of, for example, $50 a month—the exact amount to be determined. This would provide every aged couple $100 per month.

2. Every individual 65 and over whose estimation of income for the year ahead was more than $600, would receive a citizen's pension reduced by $1 a month for every $50 more of annual income.

3. Every individual 65 and over whose estimation of income for the year ahead was $2,450 or more would receive no citizen's pension.

B. Revised declarations of estimated income could be made throughout the year. Following the end of a calendar year, the amount of overpayment or underpayment of an individual's pension would be determined and any necessary adjustments would be consolidated with other necessary income tax adjustments.

II. Financing: Support the new system by a tax on every citizen whose net taxable income exceeds some such small amount as $600 a year. Thus, substantially every individual would during some period of his life be contributing toward his ultimate protection.

A. The rate of the supporting tax would be redetermined from time to time solely on the basis of the necessary costs for financing the system. This would constitute checks and balances between the means of the contributors and the desires of the recipients.

B. The initial rate of the supporting tax, according to the proposed schedule, would probably be around 5 percent and in any event would be limited to the first $3,000 of individual income. This 5 percent would be only in part additional because:

1. The existing payroll tax would not be levied.

2. In the long run the local taxes required to support the assistance programs would be escaped.

3. The initial tax would be accompanied by a reduction of about 2½ percent in the regular income-tax rates on the first $3,000 of individual income, in recognition of the fact that the new system is at once relieving the Federal Government of substantially over a billion dollars a year in grants-in-aid.

4. On the other hand, the $600 personal income-tax exemption for individuals 65 and over might be abolished.

III. Transition: An important task of the special commission would be the equitable disposition of the present OASI fund.

Suggestion:

A. Refund to contributors in the form of bonds.

B. Used fund for first year's operation of new system.

C. Hold fund intact and use interest as a cushion for recession periods when incomes drop.

ADVANTAGES

Such a program as here envisioned would have very definite advantages over the present system from the point of view of administration, the national economy, and the best interests of the American people individually.

American tradition: It would be American as opposed to our present copy of European class legislation. It would be just, democratic, nondiscriminatory. It would play no favorites; offer no special privileges. It would match the equal opportunity of our American way of life with equal protection against loss of income in old age. It would assure every American, the richest as well as the poorest, that if catastrophe should strike, he or she would be adequately provided for, by right, in a wholly dignified manner. At the same time, it would put the burden of responsibility on the individual to work and to save. Also, it would put responsibility on the individual whom catastrophe did strike to make an honest declaration of his income for the year ahead—just as now he is expected to make an honest income tax return—and so he would determine his own citizen's pension. In other words, responsibility would be returned to the individual for his own welfare.

National economy: My proposed program would be economically sound. It would cost far less than the present system while providing protection for the entire population instead of selective groups thereof. Mr. George Immerwahr, former Chief Actuary for OASI, a distinguished authority in this field, has supplied a preliminary cost study in which he concludes with the conservative statement that the adoption of my proposal in substitution for the present social-security system "would produce an ultimate saving of $5,000,000,000 a year." Mr. Immerwahr's estimate of course takes into consideration a vastly simplified administration and greatly reduced bureaucratic expenses. Since it would not undermine the national economy, it would offer every American far greater assurance of security.

General public reaction: My proposal to abolish the means test would have a direct, immediate appeal for the approximately 3,000,000 present public assistance recipients—not to mention any who might have to undergo the test in the foreseeable future.

My proposal to bring in the present aged would affect over 6,000,000 who now are receiving nothing, in addition to those 3,000,000 now on assistance.

My proposal for universal eligibility would effect fifteen to twenty million farmers, sharecroppers, migratory farm labor, and marginal domestic servants.

My proposal to pay pensions on a graduated, income-loss basis would give more in pensions to greater numbers.

Organized labor would gain right on down the line. It is true my proposal would reduce the over-all pensions of those few retired workers who hold a 25-year record of service with companies having no offset clause in their collective bargaining pension contracts. However, it would give more to the vast majority of workers who are employed by small business and who change jobs every few years.

Farmers would approve my proposal as a guaranty of their traditional independence rather than in any way interfering with it. Rural areas generally would be emancipated from the oppression of public assistance.

State governments would be relieved of a large share of their present financial outlay for public assistance. State funds would thus be freed for other necessary local developments or for tax reductions.

The advantages of my program for the individual American, for important groups of Americans, and for the country as a whole, it seems to me, Mr. President, add up to an impressive total.

The 3,000,000 aged on public assistance, the 6,000,000 present aged on neither OASI nor public assistance, plus the fifteen to twenty million of the gainfully employed who remain uncovered by the Social Security Act amendments of 1950, amount to more than 25,000,000 Americans who would be benefited by the adoption of my program.

Add to this the advantage to be won by the members of organized labor and by the farm population on top of the financial relief to State treasuries—and who have we left against it? Those OASI compulsory contributors who might—but then might not—land a windfall. They are the only ones who would lose. And even they would gain surer protection in case of need by contributing to a sounder national economy.

It has been said by proponents of the present system that the American people, all of whom would be taxed (or would contribute) for American citizens pensions and aid to dependent children would not consider it fair not to receive their money back in case they were frugal or lucky and able to save for more than a $3,000 a year income after 65.

I don't believe it. The American people consider it perfectly fair to buy fire insurance and expect only to get their money back in case the house burns down. But far more important, the American people who gladly contribute to the rehabilitation of war-devastated Europe and the building up of backward areas all over the world, I am sure feel strong enough to support those of their own aged and dependent children who have for whatever reason found themselves in the position of having to draw on their insurance policies.

Mr. President, I offer my full-eligibility, contributory, pay-as-you-go social-security program to indicate the way we may reach the American road off which we wandered. Only on the American road can be hope to continue to live the American way and adequately defend ourselves from enemies within and without.

The Need of a United America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, November 27, 1950

Mr. HOEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD a very important statement made by my colleague, Senator Frank P. Graham, who retires today from the Senate. This statement is entitled "The Need of a United America."

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

THE NEED OF A UNITED AMERICA CONFRONTED WITH THE THREAT OF TOTALITARIAN TYRANNY AND GLOBAL WAR

INTRODUCTION

As the first of those Senators of the Eighty-first Congress to leave the Senate, under the terms of my appointment to succeed the lately lamented and distinguished junior Senator from North Carolina, the Honorable J. M. Broughton, until my distinguished successor, the Honorable WILLIS SMITH, is qualified, I wish, for all those who will soon leave, to express our good wishes to my successor and their successors in the high opportunity at a critical time in human history for service to our country and the world. To name these colleagues who will soon depart from these Halls, the majority leader, the majority whip, the chairmen of three of the most important Senate committees and a former chairman, and six other able members of important committees, representatives of both parties, all able, eminent, and patriotic Americans, to name them would be to entitle a significant chapter in the recent history of the Senate.

APPRECIATION OF WORK OF COLLEAGUES IN EIGHTY-FIRST CONGRESS

I have a sense of the precious treasures of comradeship and of workmanship, even for a brief period in a beginning way, in being numbered with these and other colleagues in this Congress which enacted such vital legislation as: further provision in aid of the economic recovery of free nations; ratification of the Atlantic Pact; the military assistance program against potential aggression; the reciprocal-trade agreements; asylum for the persons displaced by the war; the reorganization of the Government in line with the Hoover report; the housing program for veterans and people of low income; the 75 cents minimum wage; the extension of social security; the conservation, reclamation, and development programs; the flood control and power programs; the agricultural parity price support, agricultural extension, research and vocational education, rural electrification and telephones; the national scientific research program; more adequate provision for military, naval, air, and atomic power; selective service, economic controls, and more adequate mobilization of the Nation for defense against aggression; and other vital acts for the security and welfare of the people. Much remains to be done.

THE VICE PRESIDENT THE BEARER OF GOOD WISHES TO NEWCOMERS AND VETERANS

Mr. President, we who leave look to you, who perennially remain, we trust, in health and happiness, at a more ample time and in a more adequate way, to interpret your and our good wishes to both the newcomers and the veterans who will now carry on the traditions and opportunities of the United States Senate. Yours are the special qualifications for such an interpretation. For us all you are "Mr. Senate." You are a product of both the House and the Senate and a byproduct of the highest traditions of these two historically American institutions which come from both the States and the people. You are the only Member elected by the people of all the 48 States. By inheritance you are a blend of colonial America and the pioneer West, whose forebears followed the trails of Daniel Boone from North Carolina into old Kentucky, a composite of the old South and the new, out there where the West first began and the risen South now beckons to the historic North and the great far West as the triple hope of a greater America.

In your composite Americanism, Mr. President, with recent beautiful reenforcements from Missouri, itself the middle quintessence and herself the very efflorescence of Americanism, you can speak for us all. In your own folklore you speak for us all, whether in the chair or in the cloakroom, by the clock or by the calendar. Long may you preside, Mr. President, with your fair firmness and gracious courtesy, youthful wit, and ancient wisdom, and the experienced skill of the old master. Unlike Old Man River, you do say something, in fact many things in many places, yet in your deep and moving ways, you just keep rolling along. Wherever you tell the stories of politics, history, and life, the people gather together to hearken to your eloquence even though, on occasion in off years, they may vote the other way and then expectantly wait for you to return undismayed for another day. Senators come and Senators go but you, Mr. President, just keep rolling along. Long may you preside, long may you roll along, by sea and air, road and rail, over hill and dale. Long may you wave from coast to coast in the land of the free and the home of the brave.

In your inimitable way, Mr. President, at later times more ample for your historic background, congressional experience, humane insight, and composite Americanism, we pray you to say our good wishes and interpret to all those who carry on with their devoted work the hopes of the people in the United States Senate, which, by constitutional provisions, modern history, and global circumstance, has become the most strategic deliberative body in the world.

CLOSE RANK AS AMERICANS

In your spirit, Mr. President, after the primaries, as members of political parties, we mainly closed ranks as Democrats or as Republicans. After the general election, in like spirit as citizens of our beloved country in a world threatening to human freedom, we must now close ranks as Americans. We must stand united on the shores of a continent fronting on the two great oceans which connect all the continents under skies which reach unbroken around the earth. Beyond those shore lines it is imperative in self-defense that we close ranks as a free people with all the free peoples of the earth confronted with us by the threat of totalitarian tyranny and global war. This totalitarian dictatorship of the Soviet Union would use the continents, the oceans, and the skies, and, by the ways of subversion, doubts, and confusions, would use the destructive divisions within free nations and among free nations, for the subjugation of all the peoples of the earth.

THE HOPE OF THE PEOPLE FOR PEACE

At the shore lines by closing ranks as Americans and beyond the shore lines by standing united with all free peoples, we will make it unmistakably clear, and thereby give pause to the dictators, that we will, in a great American tradition, defend freedom against aggression to the uttermost with our lives, our fortunes, and our most sacred honor. Yet, Mr. President, we must make it no less clear to the great Russian people and to all people, as far as we can get the word through to the people, that we hold on with prayerful hope, in our own imperfect and yet ever aspiring ways, for closing the global ranks as human beings with the will to continue the struggle toward one world of freedom, justice, disarmament, and peace under law for all the peoples of the earth.

With the surrenders of the Axis Powers and the ratifications of the Charter of the United Nations by 51 nations, there came to the generation, which had suffered the deaths, sorrows, destruction, and miseries of two world wars and one world depression, the hope at last for the organization of freedom, justice, and peace in the world. The cooperation of the allied nations which had won the war against fascism, nazism, and imperialism would now, it was hoped, be carried over into the cooperation of the United Nations which would win the moral equivalent of a war in the conquest of hunger, fear, injustice, and war itself. The cause for which scores of millions had died, lived on in the hopes and prayers of hundreds of millions of people. At long last peace could be organized on earth. In this hope there was comfort for the families of the soldiers and sailors dead in strange lands and in far waters around the earth. Now at last as a memorial to heroic youth and as an answer to the prayers of the mothers of men the nations would organize the freedom and peace of the world.

THE RESPONSIBILITIES OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA AND THE U. S. S. R.

The answer to the prayers and hopes of the people was mainly in the keeping of the two nations—the United States and the Soviet Union—which survived with the vast potentials of their productive and military power. Would the disillusionments of war, resulting too much in the loss of the objectives for which the war was fought, cause the United States to withdraw from organized international cooperation? Would the illusions of isolation again cause us to lose the peace for which the isolation was attempted? Would confusion of minds and the wavering of purpose between national isolation and international participation, set the world stage for the drift into a third world war? Would the Soviet dictatorship become, as asserted, a transition to freedom, democracy, and peace or become a fixation for tyranny, aggression, and expanding power? Would the Soviet Union return to the policies of subversion, sabotage, liquidation, and subjugation or turn to the policy of participation in an international organization for cooperation and peace?

Once before in this generation the hopes of the people were lifted high for freedom and peace across the earth. After the First World War the United States of America took the leadership in the organization of the nations for peace. In the postwar reaction the United States renounced the League of Nations, attempted to withdraw in isolation, erected trade barriers with the highest tariff walls, and failed the hopes of the people of the world. In the Second World War the United States, to help win the war, shared her resources and her gigantic production with all the Allied nations. American foods, goods, planes, tanks, trucks, and ships streamed across the seas for the succor of the people and the armed forces of Britain, Russia, China, and associated nations on three continents. Lend-lease during the war, interim aid and UNRRA at the close of the war, and later the Marshall plan, regional pacts, technical assistance, and bold bipartisan international leadership, made it clear that the United States was all out for international cooperation and placed its high faith in the United Nations as the chief hope of peace in the world.

The Soviet Union, instead of carrying on the international cooperation which won the war, withdrew behind the iron curtain and more completely cut off the Russian people from the knowledge and intercourse of the non-Communist world. With delays, vetoes, walkouts, withdrawals, violations of the Charter of the United Nations, and obstructions of the procedures of international cooperation, the Soviet Union has damaged the foundations of the United Nations and has failed the humane hopes of mankind.

The United States and the Soviet Union, in cooperation with other nations in the United Nations, could answer the prayers and fulfill the hopes of the people for peace. If both chose to obstruct the procedures of the United Nations, the third world war would be inevitable. The intransigence, the subversions and aggressions of the Soviet Union have thrown upon the United States the main responsibility of preserving the life of the United Nations and the freedom of peoples, and of preventing both a third world war and the establishment of the totalitarian dictatorship of one world police state. The United States of America, by the leadership of free peoples in the United Nations, seeks to prevent the establishment of a world police state without a third world war and seeks to prevent a third world war without surrender to the threat of a world police state. The people of the United States have made it clear that they will, if necessary, fight a third world war to prevent the world dominion of the totalitarian police state.

AMERICA MUST BE STRONG

To carry the burdens of world leadership and to seek to prevent the awful catastrophes of either a world dictatorship or another world war or both, the United States, in self defense and for the survival of free peoples, must be strong. America must become stronger in the most modern military, naval, and air power; in atomic and cosmic science; in research on all the farthest frontiers of knowledge for every emergency of national defense and for every need of human freedom. America must be increasingly strong in the conservation, development, and wiser coordination of our natural, scientific, agricultural, industrial, financial, social, cultural, human, and spiritual resources for the crucial strains ahead. America must be stronger in the reorganization of the Government for economy and efficiency; in an abundant production which can for the long run balance the budget and pay off the debt without the destruction of the essential values of the public welfare, without bringing on a depression, and without surrendering the world to the Communist dictatorship. America must be more deeply resourced in her humane heritage historically great but with promises yet unfulfilled. America must grow stronger in the freedom of enterprise not as the privilege of monopoly of a few but with its equal opportunities open to all within the wide boundaries of the public welfare for that gigantic production, upon whose liberated energies and dynamic power of the organized cooperation of labor and management so largely depend the independence of America and the cooperative self recovery and self determination of peoples. America must be stronger in policies for agricultural equity; good health, preventive medicine, and programs for more adequate hospitals, medical care, and research; minimum wages and social security; in the self-organization of workers and equality in collective bargaining; in fairer and more intelligent interfaith, interracial, industrial, and other intergroup relations as part of the vigor, variety, and promise of American life. America must become thus stronger in democratic morale with a supreme concern for the freedom of the mind, the human dignity and spiritual autonomy of the individual, with a lawful regard for the will of the majority, and a joyous zest in the unresting adventure of fulfilling the American dream of the equal freedom and welfare of all people.

Through the higher knowledge and more general power of free and creative minds, through the more gigantic production of a dynamic economy, and through high democratic morale springing voluntarily from fairer human relations, America will be in the most powerful moral, economic, and military position at the most critical time for the cooperative leadership of the free peoples of the earth. For our own sake and as part of the moral power of American leadership, we must confess some failures and frustrations in our continuous struggle upward toward the fulfillment of the American dream for a freer and fairer society.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN DIGITIZED

REMINDER OF THE REVELATIONS OF THE DEPRESSION

We need to recall that the depression revealed that we were far short of the fulfillment of the American dream, made cruelly clear in the failures and frustration of our democracy and of human society in general. Democracy had provided equality of suffrage but not equality of opportunity; the freedom to worship but not the opportunity to work; the freedom of assembly and the right of collective petition but not the freedom of the self-organization of workers and the equality of collective bargaining; corporate privilege, but not agricultural parity; and political liberty but not social security against the hazards of modern society.

The democracies, in general, with their dominant position, and America, in particular, with its unparalleled possession of the resources of abundance, presented to the world the disillusionments of the insecurity of peace in a world of armaments, poverty of farmers in a world in need of food, child labor and sweatshops in the midst of unemployment, loss of farms and homes in a society largely based on them, poverty and dependence of men and women after lives of faithful work, injustice to Negroes and to other racial and religious minorities, oligarchic corporate manipulation of stockholders, regimentation of workers, and wide misinformation of consumers, the use of the historic documents of human freedom in behalf of economic power over the freedom of human beings, vast unemployment in the midst of universal need, hunger amid plenty, and disillusionment and despair in a world of youth and opportunity. The political liberties and social drift of a more static society were found tragically insufficient to meet the vast economic changes, the financial crises, and the deep human needs of our dynamic modern society.

The American genius for enterprise, invention, and adjustment preserved the old Bill of Rights and added a new charter of freedom and equality for industrial workers and farmers; and of security for bankers, depositors, investors, the unemployed, and the old; of conservation and development of soils, forests, rivers, and power; and proposed a program of Federal aid to the States for the schools under State and local control for more equal educational opportunity for all the children in all the States.

SOME PERSISTING FRUSTRATION OF HOPES

Our people have become more aware of the moral implications of the remaining discriminations against racial and religious minority groups; of the barriers of sentiment and pressure against the organization of workers in some communities and against agricultural cooperative societies in others; inadequate housing, the shortage of doctors, nurses, and hospital beds; the prices rising disproportionately to the increase in incomes; the costs of hospital and medical care beyond the reach of millions of people; a few uneconomic anomalies in the agricultural program; the wastage of soils, forests, minerals, and water resources; huge expenditures for luxuries above the funds provided for the necessities of education and welfare; dictatorships in a few cities, corporations, and unions; slums, crime, and rackets; the break-up of homes; youthful deliquency; the manipulation by financial power of the prejudices, fears and hates of the people against the interests of the people; the scourge of disease, drink, depressions, and wars recurring in many lands.

Too much is the consideration of the pecuniary interest placed above the scientific, technological and even the industrial; and the industrial exalted above the human and spiritual. Too many are the tendencies to value success as the standard of ethics; license as self expression; size and speed as progress; headlines as information; statistics as knowledge; mere compilation as research, and digests as culture; the humanities and the fine arts as frills; science as philosophy and materialism as religion. Yet in no land more than in America is the struggle more vigorous, various, and unyielding for a realization of the hopes in the minds and hearts of the men and women who crossed the uncharted seas and the unblazed wilderness toward the fulfillment of the American dream of equal freedom and justice for all.

THIS IS AMERICA OF OUR FAITH AND HOPE

In spiritual faith and the American dream, America is being made safe for democracy without vulgarity, differences without hate, and excellence without arrogance; where men become brothers in the sight of God and in the human heart; where opportunities of the children in homes and schools are the chief concern of present progress and the chief hope of a nobler society; where enduring progress in human relations is made through religion, education, and voluntary cooperation in the minds and hearts of the people; and where the struggle for the fulfillment of our historic Americanism is the best answer to fascism and communism in the present global struggle against totalitarian tyranny for freedom and peace in the world.

In this America of our struggles and our hopes, the least of these our brethren has the freedom to struggle for freedom; where the integrity of simple people is beyond price and the daily toil of millions is above pomp and power; where the answer to error is not terror, the respect for the past is not reaction, and the hope of the future is not revolution; where the majority is without tyranny, the minority without fear, and all people have hope. This is our faith. This is America. God bless America.

THE PEOPLE OF AMERICA STILL LOOK WITH HOPE TO THE RUSSIAN PEOPLE WHO ALSO HAVE THEIR DREAM OF FREEDOM AND PEACE

Every people have the land of their dreams, whether it be the eastern lands of the sunrise, the promised land of the Hebrews, the Greek Commonwealth of the oath of the Athenian youth, the eternal city, the city of God, the mecca of the pilgrimage, La Belle France, the British Commonwealth, the fatherland, the motherland, the American Republic, or the Russia of Tolstoian hopes. The free energies of the human spirit spring eternal in the hopes of the people who will make over their states and institutions in the image of their dreams. The Russian people whose hope of freedom and peace have been betrayed by the absolute power of the dictatorship of the Soviet Union cannot permanently be held in isolation and subjection behind the iron curtain which seeks to hide the prison wall of the police state. Despite the tyranny of the czars and the dictators, the Russian people have their own great tradition of the love of their country, lands, homes, churches, forests, their spacious views, the far reaches of the steppes, rivers, mountains, their folklore, songs, literature, and art. The peasants reveal the strength of religion, toil, patience, suffering, shrewdness, love of the land and open country, sense of home and hope. Russia is a land of mighty contrasts and high aloofness of the rulers from the people. The vast land and the robust people give to observers the impression of the potentials for mighty undertakings and a great future. The Russian people have their mighty rivers and stalwart boatmen, vast plains, their villages, and self-reliant peasants, their cattle, sturdy cowboys, and valiant horsemen nonpareil. They have through the generations had their heroic struggles for freedom and unity.

The American people have had much in common with the Russian people in their search for freedom and unity across vast land masses and in the need for expansion between the eastern and western seas and to the southern waters. Differences are cited, not as a matter of superiority or inferiority, but as a basis of better understanding. Some of the differences between the two peoples come from the differences in historic orientation, from the fact that the people of Russia missed and the people of America inherited the legacies of the Roman Empire, Catholic scholasticism, the pervasive influence of the large number of universities founded in Western Europe in the later Middle Ages, the Renaissance, the Reformation, the commercial revolution, the main currents of the scientific revolution, and the philosophic enlightenment, the English tradition of liberty, parliamentary government, the common law, the Bill of Rights, the American Revolution and Constitution, the French Revolution, the industrial revolution, the rise of the middle class, a strong labor movement, a vigorous woman's movement, universal education, universal suffrage and the more dynamic modern currents of freedom and democracy.

These western and American legacies and influences were assimilated and carried on through former centuries and recent generations. The Soviet dictatorship has, with some vital liberations from the czarist despotism and with the energies and hopes released by revolution, sought in one generation to make over the government, the ideology, the economy and the society of 200,000,000 people. The dictators have, with indomitable drive but ruthless cruelty, sought to force and bend the Russian people to their totalitarian will for world dominion. Dictatorship feeds on tyranny, and totalitarian power on more total power. The relaxing of the tyranny of expanding power, the dictators fear, would mean the overthrow of the dictatorship by the people.

The dictatorship demands more regimentation, espionage, exile, imprisonment, and enforced bondage, a more rigorous iron curtain, more false propaganda about plots and wars against the Russian people, and more subversion, infiltration, liquidation, subjugation and exploitation of other peoples for the domination of the world by the expanding power of the totalitarian police state. The Russian people and their satellites are the victims and the means of this dictatorship.

The American people and other free peoples still yearn for peace with the Russian people and all people. The Government of the United States has gone far in seeking cooperation and peace. In every honorable way the United States, in cooperation with the free nations in the United Nations, is doing its utmost to avoid a war with both Russia and Communist China. The United States which, for more than half a century, has had a decisive part in saving the territorial integrity and independence of China against Russian and imperialist power, spent billions in aid to China against Japanese aggression while the Soviet Union stood mainly on the sidelines. Yet, by the propaganda line of the Soviet Union, which has stripped Manchuria and would exploit the Chinese people for Soviet totalitarian power, the United States is pictured as the enemy of the Chinese people, intent upon imperialism and war against China. A war with Communist China would be the mighty prelude to the third world war which, on top of two world wars, would, with atomic power and all the other high potentials of modern warfare, wreck the accumulated civilization of our age.

The democratic people recognize that totalitarian power is now in the hands of the dictatorship of the Soviet Government with all the technological facilities and political power of the police state. As witnesses to the resurgent power and the unconquerable aspiration of the human spirit for a freer and better world, the people of the free world still have faith in the dreams and hopes which we suspect are deep in the minds and hearts of millions of the Russian people. Exile, bondage, and death are still the price of their aspiration and struggles. The epic defense of Stalingrad came not from and not for the dictatorship but from and for the soil, the plains, rivers, the towns and the villages, homes, the people and the soul of Russia that beat back one dictatorship and will some day beat down their own.

The Russians are experiencing the cruel realization that the revolution which was to liberate the workers and free the dissenters, has exiled, imprisoned, or forced into bondage more millions of workers and dissenters than were ever held in slavery at any time in human history. The revolution which was to end imperialism and exploitation has set up a most despotic empire, and exploited scores of millions of nonparty members in Russia and the satellite nations. The revolution which raised the hopes of the Russian people for justice, freedom, and peace is today the chief cause of the world-wide fear of tyranny and war. The Soviet Union, with many different peoples and some 2,000 Negroes has, to its credit, little or no race problem. The revolution, which was to end all forms of discrimination and segregation, discriminates against scores of millions of nonparty people, holds in enforced bondage millions of nonconformists, and segregates 200,000,000 people behind the iron curtain from the rest of the world. The Russian people have had their dreams, which will yet live again to make them free to join the other peoples of the earth in their struggles and hopes for freedom and peace.

MUST GET THE STORY OF THE AMERICAN DREAM AND OF HUMAN FREEDOM TO THE PEOPLES OF RUSSIA, ASIA, AND THE WORLD

With some 700,000,000 people in the world wavering between the dictators' false promises of security and the slower ways of democracy, the United States must be strong in free association with the peoples in this hemisphere in the treaty of the Americas, with the peoples of France and the British Commonwealth heroically tested in two world wars, with the peoples of the Western European and the North Atlantic community in the Atlantic Pact, in the hopes of the Pacific-Asian conference of the independent people of the East, but most important of all, through a stronger United Nations.

To make known the resolute commitment of the United States to its obligations under the Charter of the United Nations and to gird the loins of the United Nations with the power of the moral opinion of mankind girdling the globe, the free nations must get the facts and meaning of the great story of the hopes for freedom and peace of the American people and all free peoples through to the people of Russia, China, India, and to all other peoples, east and west. For example, let us recapitulate again and again in leaflets, pamphlets, books, press releases, and on the air waves around the earth the comparison of the American and Soviet Government policies regarding: (1) The free institutions of the people; (2) self-determination of peoples; (3) discrimination against dissenters and underprivileged groups; (4) aid for the self-recovery of nations; (5) international agreements and the unification of Germany and Korea; (6) international information and understanding; (7) atomic power; and (8) the procedures and purposes of the United Nations.

1. The United States has fostered and the Soviet Union has crushed the freedom of the mind, the press, the schools, the colleges, and universities; the right of assembly and petition; the independence of legislatures and courts; and the free self-organizations of the people. The Fascist and Communist dictators have written in the blood and sufferings of heroic men and women the list of those autonomous and free institutions of the people, without the subjugation of which, tyranny could not have become totalitarian power. This honor roll of freedom includes, we wish to emphasize, the churches, the press, the universities, parliaments, corporations, labor unions, cooperative societies, and other free civic, professional and fraternal organizations, as expressions of the enterprise and freedom of the human spirit, all of which have written heroic chapters in the history of liberty.

2. The United States liberated the Philippines, stood firm in diplomatic, democratic, and moral support for the independence of Indonesia, Iran, Israeli, Korea, and other small nations; rejoiced in and has respect for the independence and internal security of Egypt, the Arab States, India, Pakistan, Ceylon, Burma, and sympathizes with the aspiration of all people for self-determination.

The Soviet Union swallowed up Esthonia, Latvia, and Lithuania; and without free elections but with force or the threats of force, subversion, infiltration, and liquidation, dominates Bulgaria, Rumania, Poland, Hungary, Albania, Czechoslovakia, East Germany and what is left of North Korea.

3. The United States has guaranteed to dissenters the civil liberties and to underprivileged groups the freedom to struggle for more freedom. With racial prejudice springing from consciousness of kind and with its degree an index of the three main factors, namely, numbers, visible differences, and economic competition, more millions of Negro people, largely concentrated in the South, have made more progress in the United States in the last 85 years than any like number of people in any like period of history. Men and women of good will of both races are working through religion and education for either substantially equal and separate, or, if not equal, the same facilities in accordance with the laws of the State and the decisions of the United States Supreme Court; for private and public, local, State, and Federal cooperation for the prevention of even one lynching by a mob in the South or by a gang in the North, and for the voluntary cooperation of management, labor, and public facilities for the optimum use of the available competent manpower for national defense and maximum production; for the abolition of the poll tax; and for the development of the sense of the human dignity and human brotherhood of all people in fulfillment of our American dream and our religious faith.

4. The United States has supported and generously aided, while the Soviet Union has opposed and has attempted, by misrepresentation and sabotage, to block the self-recovery of nations. Instead of the timely aid of the Marshall plan and the long-run aid of technical assistance, the Soviet Union has siphoned off most vital materials and ruthlessly exploited the satellite peoples for her own dominion and power.

5. The United States has sought patiently and faithfully to fulfill international agreements. The Soviet Union has blocked the fulfillment and has broken the Yalta and Potsdam agreements. The United States has stood for, and the Soviet Union has blocked, free elections for a democratic unification of Germany and Korea. The United States with Britain and France, in order to save the people from the alternative choice between slow starvation or surrender to tyranny, carried through the hazardous Berlin airlift with an efficiency and courage worthy of the brave German people of West Berlin. The United States in and with the United Nations, in fulfillment of international obligations at a most critical time and at the risk of immediate disaster and an ultimate world war, chose to defend with military, naval, and air forces the little Republic of South Korea against the aggression of Communist-dominated North Korea.

6. The United States has in the main promoted and the Soviet Union has in the main sought to block the free exchange of information and knowledge, the mobility of people, and the cultural interchange and international understanding between the peoples of the world. The people of the United States are seeking, within bounds of security against subversion, espionage, and sabotage, to remove any unnecessary barriers to a sound program of humane international exchange and understanding of peoples. One of the barriers to the freedom and peace of nations is the iron curtain which the Soviet Union dropped over the minds of the Russian people in an already darkening world.

7. The United States, when it had the monopoly of atomic power, supported and the Soviet Union vetoed the program of the United Nations for the control and inspection of the sources and use of atomic power. This offer of the United States to give up its then monopoly of the most powerful weapon of national defense for international control and humane use is without precedent in history. The rejection by the Soviet Union is one of the most awful setbacks to peace and international cooperation for a more productive and more noble society in our time.

8. No less tragic than the policies of the Soviet Union regarding civil liberties, the free self-organization of people in behalf of deep human needs, the national independence and self-determination of peoples, the aid for the self-recovery of stricken peoples, the breaking of agreements, the blocking of the unification of Germany and Korea, the iron curtain and atomic power, are the policies of the Soviet Union in the United Nations. As already emphasized in this statement, this is the chief source of the frustration of the people's hopes for freedom and peace in our time.

Short of the self-liberation of the Russian people, the present surviving hope is in the United Nations supported by the United States and the free peoples of both hemispheres.

THE HERITAGE, RESPONSIBILITY, AND OPPORTUNITY OF THE UNITED STATES

The United States and the free peoples have, through the United Nations, come into the responsibility of world leadership in the midst of one of the greatest crises in human history. The American people, with a great bipartisan leadership, are ready for this hour by their heritage, their struggles, their resources, and the commitments of their hopes. The first Americans, selected on the basis of initiative, daring enterprise, and the will to get away from the despotism of kings, the authority of bishops, and the stratification of society, crossed an uncharted ocean and confronted an untrailed wilderness with their courage and their faith in themselves and their destiny. Facing west to the wilderness with axes, muskets, Bibles, and chartered liberty in their hands and history, and with the self-reliant individualism of the ever-moving frontier, they crossed mountains, rivers, prairies, plains, deserts, and mountains again to another sea. They fought the Revolution for their own freedom, a civil war which freed the Negro slaves, fought two world wars, and will fight another for human freedom. They cleared the forests, tilled the soils, exploited its mines and resources, built churches, schools, factories, roads, canals, railways, airlines, libraries, hospitals, cities, and States, making America to the pattern of their relentless wills and to the image of their dreams.

To them the union of States is an example for the union of nations. The Federal principle which gave the balance of freedom and law for local, State, and national functions of autonomy and power can, for any union of States and any commonwealth of nations, provide in a far more limited yet adequate way the basis for all the United Nations of the world.

Facing the two great oceans, strategic between the east and west, heir of all the races and regions, colors and creeds of mankind, possessor of mighty natural, military, economic, scientific, cultural, and spiritual resources, decisive factor in two world wars, guardian of the heritage and hope of human liberty, and maker of the American dream for the equal freedom and opportunity of all, the people of the United States, in the providence of God, have come into the leadership of the free peoples of the earth in a time for greatness. In this crisis America has measured high under a great and still unbroken bipartisan leadership in crucial decisions, upon which, up to now, have depended the freedom of peoples and the peace of the world.

SOME GREAT DECISIONS

Confronted with the designs to lock Turkey and Greece behind the iron curtain, the Truman doctrine with quick courage shielded their freedom and independence from destruction. Challenged by the threats of starvation, subversion, and the sabotage of the recovery of Italy, France, all western Europe, and other struggling peoples, the Marshall plan, with timely and generous aid to all stricken peoples, saved hundreds of millions of people from the threats of hunger and tyranny. Faced with the Berlin blockade, the answer was given in the high hazards of the Berlin airlift. The negotiated and achieved freedom of Israeli was accorded recognition as an independent nation. Confronted at a crucial time both with the designs of Dutch imperialists to bypass the United Nations and eliminate the Republic of Indonesia and with a Moscow-inspired resistance of Communists to the balanced Republican leadership, the answer was a firm stand for the continued good offices of the United Nations and the inclusion of the republic in the new United States of Indonesia to prevent the Dutch domination of the United States of Indonesia and to guarantee the self-determination of the Indonesian people.

On top of it all there came in Korea the challenge, which tested the moral foundations of the United Nations, the courage of little nations, and the resolute will of American leadership for the awful risks of the responsibility of instant decision. The United Nations, supported by the decision of the American President, decided to meet the challenge and risk the possible military disaster of a Dunkerque to avoid the certain moral disaster of a Munich—one of the great decisions in the history of human liberty. The local struggle of arms in Korea is a part of the global struggle for freedom in our time. The boundaries and foundations of the freedom and integrity of the little Republic of South Korea were widened to include the spiritual horizons and deepened to test the moral foundations of the free world. The raising of the flag of the United Nations in Korea has the historic meaning that hereafter the standard of freedom will be raised by the United Nations in fulfillment of the commitments of its charter against unlawful aggression, however vast, powerful, and unbroken be the land mass back of the aggressor, and however secret be the timetable of the dictator.

Other great decisions include the adoption of the Atlantic Pact by the Atlantic nations with the hope of some day including western Germany as the basis for the unification of all Germany; the adoption, by an overwhelming vote of the General Assembly of the United Nations, of the uniting-for-peace proposals to avoid the destruction of the purposes of the United Nations by the Soviet Union; and the decision to include Japan as soon as possible in the community of nations.

NO ISOLATION IN MODERN DYNAMIC INTERDEPENDENT WORLD

These historic decisions emphasize the fact that no place on this earth can be isolated from the air above, the seas around, or the continents beyond. The mariner's compass, the discovery of America, the rounding of Africa, the circumnavigation of the globe, and the commercial resolution have included all the oceans, continents, islands, and seas, their people and resources in one commercially interdependent world. The steam, electric, gas, and oil power engines as the motive force of the factories, farms, trains, ships, automobiles, and plants of the industrial revolution and its gigantic mass production have made the earth one industrially interdependent world. The actualities of the uranium bomb and the potentialities of the hydrogen bomb fatefully tie together all the peoples of the earth for self-destruction or for abundant production and human enterprises.

The great mechanical framework of roads, rivers, steel rails, copper wires, pipe lines, ocean lanes, high-tension power lines across continents, and cable underseas, has been flung around the earth. Made dynamic by steam engines, dynamos, turbo-generators, internal combustion and Diesel engines, variously resourced in coal, water, gas, and oil as the sources of industrial power, this mechanical framework holds up the economic structure of the modern world and catches up wars and depressions anywhere and involves human beings everywhere.

NEED FOR STRENGTHENING THE UNITED NATIONS

To charge this mighty structure now with atomic power and later with cosmic power, makes necessary the strengthening of the United Nations. The high potentials of the nationalistic and dynamic structure of the modern world requires amendments to the charter of the United Nations. Preparations should be made looking toward an international conference of nations to provide for: (1) an international police force responsible to the United Nations; (2) universal disarmament; (3) the inspection and control of atomic power; (4) the original jurisdiction of the World Court over crimes of individuals against the Charter of the United Nations, with the attendant protection of an international bill of rights; and (5) the widening of the responsibilities of the Assembly of the United Nations regarding the causes and prevention of war and the maintenance of peace under law. Part of the preparation for this conference should be the education and mustering of the moral opinion of mankind so that no government would wish or dare to block its purposes in answering the humane hopes of the peoples.

The bipartisan foreign policy, to be further strengthened by the early return of the eminent senior Senator from Michigan, a casualty of the valiant front line of heavy and devoted labors, for the distinguished partnership in international policy, is essential to the effectively united stand of America confronted by the threats of world dictatorship and global war. We of America stand in the great tradition of the struggle for freedom, justice, and peace from 1776 to this hour. The Congress stands on the high tradition of the Fulbright, Connally, and Vandenburg resolutions, fundamental to our bipartisan foreign policy in support of the United Nations and the freedom and peace of nations. Other resolutions, in various forms by Thomas and Douglas, Taylor, Sparkman, Kefauver, McMahon, Ferguson, and Benton, capped by the Tobey resolution, sponsored by Hill, Morse, and others, look in common to the strengthening of the United Nations.

We need always to emphasize that the international economic framework which girdles the globe with its dynamic power for weal or woe, and the international political structure of the United Nations organized to include all the nations of the earth for cooperation and peace, need the international spiritual communion, humane good will and love of people in the minds and hearts of the people who will, in spite of dictators, imperialists and militarists, yet find effective ways to make come true their hopes for freedom and peace. The idea and teaching of Jesus that we are all children of one God and brothers of all men, long rejected as unrealistic, has become, in the atomic age, the most practical and necessary idea of them all for the people and under God, who "made of one blood all the nations of men to dwell on the face of the earth."

May I again express the wish and the challenge that our America, in her rendezvous with destiny, will not fail the hopes of the people for freedom and peace. Rather may she rise in a great bipartisan leadership to the responsibility of her power and the opportunity for her greatness to stop aggression, save freedom, strengthen the United Nations and lead the peoples of the earth in the great adventure of creative cooperation toward one world neighborhood of human brotherhood and peace on earth in God's good time.

Radio Address of Solomon Rosenbaum, Esq., of Fitchburg, Mass.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PHILIP J. PHILBIN

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, November 27, 1950

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an excellent radio speech by a very talented and distinguished young lawyer and warm friend of mine, Attorney Solomon Rosenbaum, of Fitchburg, Mass.

Many mutual friends have asked me to seek permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD, and I am pleased to do so even though I fear that my valued and able friend, Mr. Rosenbaum, has been altogether too kind and generous in his references to me. Most assuredly, I am very grateful for his inspiring confidence and the fine friendship I enjoy with him and his distinguished family.

Good evening, ladies and gentlemen. I am greatly honored by this opportunity to address you, my friends, neighbors, and fellow Americans, in support of the renomination, to the distinguished office of Representative of the Third Massachusetts District in the Congress of the United States, of that eminent citizen and brilliant statesman, the Honorable PHILIP J. PHILBIN.

It is my pleasure to speak to you in my capacity as a long-time resident of this district, who takes pride in its progress, as a business and professional man active in its economic and civic life, as a citizen who has a genuine interest in the well-being of the people of our district as well as of our State and Nation, and as an American who sincerely believes that the selection of a proper representative, by a people who are, and intend to remain, free, is a matter of the utmost importance, and, as such, I can honestly say to you that we, in this Third District, are most fortunate in having had Congressman PHILBIN as our spokesman in Washington, for no truer or finer representative of the best interests of his constituents could possibly be found anywhere, and it is in that spirit that I wholeheartedly and unequivocally urge every one of you to go to the polls on Tuesday, September 19, and to vote to renominate Congressman PHILIP J. PHILBIN.

Congressman PHILBIN is amply well qualified by education, experience, and progressive attitude on matters of public interest for this high office and he has justly earned the right to renomination and reelection on the basis of his proven record of outstanding accomplishments, his long and fruitful years in public service, and his sound, liberal, and forthright approach to every problem.

During the 8 years he has already served all the people of this district in our Federal House of Representatives, Congressman PHILBIN has carved out an indestructible monument of public service, resplendent with the piercing light of positive achievements. The manner of his discharge of his duties as the peoples' representative has been most intelligent, courageous, and patriotic, and in thorough fulfillment of the fondest hopes and the highest expectations of the people who chose him as their advocate.

The glowing record of Congressman PHILBIN's many accomplishments conclusively demonstrates that in his services at our Nation's Capital, he has been one of the most aggressive, forceful, hard-working, and conscientious legislators that Massachusetts has sent there in many a decade. In fact, it is a record that is most remarkable both for its quality as well as for its extent. It is a record worthy of the highest praise and it manifests his preeminent competence and his devotion to duty and to the best interests of our district and our country.

The official records of the Government of the United States confirm Congressman PHILBIN's allout support of an impregnable national defense program; his sponsorship of legislation benefiting our beloved and deserving veterans and servicemen, as well as their families and dependents; his efforts to secure international cooperation and the strengthening of the defenses of the free democracies; his implacable determination to resist communism and totalitarianism both at home and abroad; the protection and advancement of the hard-won rights of labor; the simplification and equitable distribution of the burden of taxation; his sincere interest in the problems of every segment of our population, including the wage earner, the farmer, the shopkeeper, the merchant, and the consumer; providing security for the aged and the infirm and help for the underprivileged and the handicapped; his relentless opposition to unbridled bureaucracy, waste, and red tape; his championship of justice and civil liberties for all the people in our country; and the fostering of the American form of free government and the American system of free enterprise.

Significant honor has been brought to our district by Congressman PHILBIN's appointment to the Armed Services Committee of the House of Representatives, a committee of the highest importance in our National Legislature, and a preferment which testifies to his recognition by his fellow Congressmen as a statesman of unusual ability and attainment.

Congressman PHILBIN was the first Member of Congress to introduce legislation providing for the establishment of a 70-group air force, warning the Nation as early as March 1948 that Russian aggression necessitated immediate air supremacy for our country. He is now chairman of the congressional Subcommittee on the Production and Procurement of Tanks, and the proficiency of his efforts in that respect is best attested by the fact that our Armed Forces now have tank superiority in Korea and are thereby able to maintain our positions against numerically superior enemy troops.

Long the outspoken foe of communism, Congressman PHILBIN has striven to defend our basic American institutions and the free democratic way of life, which our founding fathers so wisely ordained and which our brave sons, brothers, and husbands are now preserving at the risk and sacrifice of life and limb. Time and time again, Congressman PHILBIN has warned the Nation of the growing menace of communism, urging a strong America to combat the baneful influence of radical infiltration and to meet all possible threats against our national security.

Sprung from humble, hard-working people himself, Congressman PHILBIN has always been the faithful friend of labor, and his service to the cause of the workingman has been endorsed not only by virtually every labor organization but also by the overwhelming majority of the rank and file of grateful and appreciative workers throughout this district. Congressman PHILBIN's deep sympathy for the plight of those who toil and suffer is exceeded only by his zeal in moving vigorously to assist them.

In addition to his sound and faultless record in these matters of national and international importance, Congressman PHILBIN has given most generously and freely of his time, efforts, energies, and talents to each and every one of his constituents who has ever sought assistance, and by his many benevolent deeds, in behalf of the downtrodden, the helpless, the sick, the needy, and the unbefriended. He has shown that a warm and comforting spirit of humane kindness and heartfelt consideration for his fellow man pervades his every word and action.

I can, of my own knowledge, personally vouch for this attention by Congressman PHILBIN to those deserving help and assistance, and I have observed, with pleasure and approbation, the careful, painstaking, kindly and thorough cooperation and effort he has extended, and the prompt and eminently satisfactory results he has attained.

In the critical times that now exist and in the troubled days that lie ahead, it will be to our own very decided advantage to continue to reap the benefits of Congressman PHILBIN's long and faithful experience. This is certainly no time to lightly cast that accumulated experience aside. Congressman PHILBIN has been tested and tried, during war and peace, in the fires of actual service, and has been found sterling and true. His vigorous mind, his familiarity with the mechanics of government, his mastery of practical "know-how," and his wise counsel and sound judgment are needed today even more than ever before to successfully cope with and solve the confounding and perplexing problems of this emergency era.

In making your choice of candidates, I ask you to please bear in mind the fact that Congressman PHILBIN has been in Washington for 16 years; that he has a very wide acquaintance among Government officials; that he knows his way around. He is thoroughly familiar with the intricacies and the procedures of the various bureaus, commissions, and administrative agencies. He knows how to cut through red tape. As a result he is in an excellent position to take care of your problems quickly and effectively, whenever the occasion may arise. Congressman PHILBIN's ability to serve your needs may prove most important to you. Let us not deprive ourselves of this advantage—we may have serious need of it sooner than we think.

In order that we in this Third District may continue to enjoy the best of representation in Congress, in order that we may be assured of experienced service, and to the end that real democracy may find its finest and truest expression on the American scene, I earnestly appeal to all of you to go to the polls tomorrow, Tuesday, September 19—to take your relatives, friends, and neighbors with you—and to make sure that all of you vote for and renominate the Honorable PHILIP J. PHILBIN as our representative in Congress.

I thank you, and good evening.

Our "Mothball" Fleet Has Proved Its Worth in War

OF

HON. MELVIN PRICE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, November 27, 1950

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include herewith an article written by Mr. John G. Norris, reporter for the Washington Post, and which appeared in that newspaper on Sunday, November 19, 1950. It merits the attention of the House Members and it should be well worth the few minutes it will take to read this informative and detailed story of the United States Navy "mothball" fleet program.

Mr. Norris' article follows:

OUR "MOTHBALL" FLEET HAS PROVED ITS WORTH IN WAR

(By John G. Norris)

NEWPORT NEWS, VA.—America's "mothball" fleet program—a much-questioned postwar experiment—has passed its first test with full credit, if not with flying colors.

In the past 5 months of mobilization, more than 200 ships have been hauled out of "cold storage." Another 300 are being readied for sea. On the basis of performance to date, it is clear that the warships and merchantmen still are in good shape after their 5-year layup.

And, in cases where speed of mobilization was vital—a key point in the program—the ships were ready sooner than most everyone, including the Communist high command, expected.

When we went into Korea, logistics chiefs said they needed 250 additional merchant vessels in the Pacific. The American merchant marine and foreign fleets could provide less than 100 of them. The other 152 were hauled out of mothballs.

Fighter planes had to be rushed to the Far East. Divisions at home were alerted for Korea. Pacific Fleet commanders called for more fighting ships. So aircraft carriers, troop transports, and other warships were hurriedly pulled out of the reserve fleet.

IT PAID OFF

The record was not 100 percent perfect. No major combatant ships in mothballs were readied in time for the major operations around Korea. But the big turning point of the war—the Inchon invasion—was made possible by planes, men, and supplies hauled across the Pacific in demothballed ships. It caught the Red leaders flatfooted, confident that our counteroffensive could not be mounted so soon. It is safe to say that the program paid off.

Important lessons were learned in the process. Both Navy and Maritime Administration officials discovered and are correcting some flaws in their highly different ship-preservation methods and mobilization plans. This can be very helpful in a future total mobilization.

One byproduct has been a comparative evaluation of the Navy and maritime systems—the first really made. A Navy board, to the surprise of many, found considerable merit in the cheaper, make-do techniques of the merchant sailors. They may adopt some, to the advantage of American taxpayers.

The United States has a lot of money invested in laidup ships—a cool $28,000,000,000 at today's replacement costs. We spent about $500,000,000 dollars on the vessels during the past 5 years. Now that the mothball program has been tested, the Washington Post felt it was a good time for stock taking.

THE BACKGROUND

How successful was the mothball-fleet concept? What happened to the ships while in "cold storage"? Which techniques worked and which didn't? What lessons were learned during the Korean test which will help during another emergency?

To get the answers, the Washington Post interviewed Navy and Maritime Administration chiefs, studied the available files and records, and made field trips to the Philadelphia Naval Shipyard, the Norfolk base, the James River reserve fleet, and the Newport News Shipbuilding & Drydock Co. yard here.

Just to draw in the background, after VJ-day the United States found itself with the greatest naval and merchant armada the world had ever seen—some 14,000 seagoing ships. Obviously only a fraction of them could be operated in peacetime, and there was much scratching of official heads about what to do with the rest.

Some were ordered scrapped, and others were earmarked for foreign sale. There remained more than 5,000 vessels—too valuable to get rid off, too costly to keep in service. The decision was made to lay the rest of them "away in mothballs," as someone then put it, ready for a future emergency.

Two plans for maintaining the laidup ships were approved. The Navy scheme, developed by Capt. H. Gordon Donald, now retired and living in Washington, called for readying the vessels for instant service and "putting them away in a zipper bag."

Donald's rather expensive method contrasted sharply with what the Navy had done with its surplus warships after two prior wars. The steam-propelled iron ships built during the Civil War were tied up and left to rot, while conservative admirals, with limited funds for buying coal, kept wooden sailing vessels in service.

Following World War I, we stripped down our laidup vessels, daubed red paint and preservative over them and hoped for the best. Out of this "red-lead fleet" came the 100 destroyers traded to Britain for Atlantic bases, and many another ship fighting the U-boats in the crucial early years of World War II.

It took a lot of doing to get such ships ready for combat. Donald's zipper-bag concept, on the other hand, envisaged complete overhauls before mothballing, keeping the vessels in top shape while laid up, and arrival of Naval Reserve crews 5 days after mobilization to activate and take them to sea.

It was a beautiful plan, but it was not carried out fully. Demobilization intervened, and "bring Johnny home" took overriding precedent. Only 40 percent of the ships were overhauled before mothballing. Too often, even the decommissioning job was rushed and incomplete. In some cases records and blueprints were lost, and routine maintenance and repairs were neglected.

Reserve fleet crewmen, however, did the best they could. The layup process was complicated and expensive. Airtight cocoons—nicknamed igloos—were built over gun turrets. Similar shrouding was placed over topside vitals. Hull, decks, and superstructure were scraped and painted.

Below decks a novel experiment was tried. Machines containing a dessicant and blowers were installed and dry air approximating the humidity of the Arizona Desert was piped through the ships' fire mains. Almost everything below—spare parts, bedding, instruments, complicated fire-control, radio and radar equipment, electric wiring, even such things as pianos—was left in place. A special preservative was used on the engines and boilers.

Then the interior of the ship, plus gun turrets, was sealed up. Officers and men of the reserve fleet made regular inspections of the vessels to assure that the dehumidification machines were operating, seals were intact and moisture conditions were right. Maintenance of the decks, hulls, and superstructure went on.

It was far more costly in both trained manpower and money than anything ever attempted before. From VJ-day through last June the Reserve Navy spent about $450,000,000 on its reserve fleet. About 1,000 officers and 15,000 enlisted men are assigned to maintain the laidup ships.

The cost, and particularly the diversion of highly skilled manpower from the active fleet, let the entire program in for criticism both from within and without the Navy. Extremists attacked it as a huge boondoggle, and the fleet was a white elephant. Many naval officers felt we should keep more ships in active service and simply tie up the rest. The ships were rapidly getting obsolete anyway, some argued, and were a "psychological block" to the building of new ships.

Under the Johnson economy program, the 5-year overhaul plan was stopped and repair money was cut. But fleet maintenance men argued eloquently the need for "keeping up insurance premiums," and the curtailed program kept going.

Contrasting with the Navy reserve-fleet plan was Capt. Ernest Gorman's Maritime Commission program, under which a larger number of ships has been maintained at one tenth the Navy cost. Maritime reserve-fleet spending for the past 5 years totals $45,000,000.

The methods employed are far different. Instead of being tied to docks at Navy yards, merchantmen are moored in large numbers at remote anchorages.

When laid up, the ships first are stripped of all perishables and semiperishables—bedding, canvas, rope, etc., are stored ashore. The cargo-handling equipment is removed and put in the hold, water lines are drained, and the electrical equipment is cleaned and varnished. One boiler is filled with preservative oil which is pumped through all machinery and pipes.

Then decks, superstructure, and the hulls above the water line are blasted with high-pressure fire hoses. This removes most of the old paint and rust, and a heavy coating of oil and red oxide is sprayed on. It looks like red paint, but dries completely only after many months. The coating not only prevents further rust; it loosens the old paint and scale, which can be removed almost entirely by a second blasting.

This water-pressure method, many times cheaper than the conventional chip-and-paint technique employed on Navy ships, is a Maritime Commission innovation. It's not as thorough as the Navy system, but it preserves the ships.

Of course, the whole approach and objective of the Navy and Maritime Administration systems is different. "We're trying to preserve some old trucks and tractors," said one Maritime official. "The Navy is keeping a fleet of limousines in a condition of near readiness."

When the Korean war started, the Navy had 2,125 ships in the mothball fleet—more than three times those in the active fleet. The laidup vessels included 83 aircraft carriers, 15 battleships, 58 cruisers, 198 destroyers, and 98 submarines. It would cost $22,000,000,000 to replace them today.

Sixty-two of the vessels have been activated, according to an announcement 6 weeks ago, and 296 others will be demothballed by next summer to strengthen the active fleet. About $375,000,000 is expected to be spent in readying them for service, including modernization of electronics, antisubmarine gear, etc.

Late in June there were 2,277 freighters, tankers, old passenger ships, and miscellaneous types in the maritime reserve fleet, worth about $6,000,000,000 at today's building costs. Twenty million dollars was spent in fitting out 152 of the best of them.

Thus, for an outlay of about $500,000,000—the total spending on the mothball fleet to date, plus reactivation costs—the United States is getting 510 ships it would have to pay $3,600,000,000 for now. And the great bulk of the reserve fleets is still untouched.

Most important, the Nation is getting the warships and merchantmen into service in periods ranging from 10 days to 12 months. It would take up to 3 years to build many of them, at great dislocation of the rest of the defense effort and civilian economy because of the huge quantities of steel and other scarce materials involved.

This was the pay-off on the mothball experiment. Here are some instances of the lessons learned in the process:

1. The Navy's elaborate below-decks dehumidification process proved almost 100 percent successful. The machinery and electrical systems on recommissioned ships seem as good as ever—though how they'll stand up under rugged service remains to be seen. Guns and elaborate fire-control mechanism on some vessels reactivated at Philadelphia proved to be better than those on many ships in service.

2. Topside, the story was different. Five years of research failed to produce anything that would beat the elements except constant and painstaking maintenance. Ready ammunition boxes, ladders, radar—everything that could be detached—were moved below in the dry interior. Insulated wiring held up, but not connections and fuse boxes. The Navy moved them below and plugged up the wire ends.

Wooden carrier decks took a beating. A plan to cover them with fabric covers and tar was a failure. An answer finally was found: List the ship so the deck will drain, and slap on three coats of house paint.

Chipping and painting seemed the only way to preserve the exposed hulls and superstructure, though the Navy is now giving careful study to the maritime water-blasting plan. And a commercial firm in Florida has a promising method of blasting with wet sand.

3. Hull deterioration also went on underwater. Periodic drydocking has been necessary, except in the reserve fleet at Green Cove Springs, Fla., where the black swamp water acts as a preservative. Navy chiefs also are much interested in a novel Maritime Administration method of stopping bottom corrosion.

Under this cathodic-protection system, strings of magnesium bars are hung over the sides of ships. The two dissimilar metals—magnesium and the steel in the hulls—become a wet cell battery in the salt or brackish water and the electric current prevents corrosion and pitting of the hull. While successful, and costing less than one-quarter of the expense of drydocking and painting, the system does not do anything about barnacles.

4. By a combination of circumstances, the merchantmen for the most part were gotten to sea faster than the warships. The maritime plan calls for all reactivation being done by commercial shipyards. As things worked out, the yards were able to drydock, clean up, repaint and repair the 152 vessels without straining in 2 to 3 weeks, and crews for them were available around union headquarters in major ports.

Navy mobilization plans provide for a crew of Reserve officers and men to report 5 days after M-day and activate the ship under direction of experts permanently assigned to the reserve fleet. Under the partial mobilization procedure of the current emergency, crews did not report until considerably later. Reserve-fleet personnel did the bulk of the demothballing.

5. The maritime reserve fleet received an unexpected outside evaluation last summer. When Assistant Navy Secretary John T. Koehler became acting chief of the Maritime Administration last May after its reorganization, he was aware of a widely held opinion that the merchantmen were rotting away. Not a nickel had been appropriated by Congress for drydocking and overhauling the ships, and the daubedup craft certainly didn't look a bit smart or shipshape. Maritime officials assured him the ships were all right.

To get an independent opinion, Koehler arranged for the Navy Board of Inspection and Survey to go over the maritime reserve fleets. Its report, submitted September 14, found the ships on which the layingup process had been completed to be in satisfactory condition.

This view was borne out by ship repair chiefs of the Newport News Shipbuilding & Drydock Co. here. The yard did most of the reactivation of the merchantmen from the nearby James River reserve fleet. After 5 years in storage, the vessels were in comparable shape to ships putting in for overhaul after a couple of years at sea, they said.

The Navy board also had words of praise for the Maritime Administration, noting that the preservation job has been accomplished with a very small expenditure of funds and manpower.

A trip to the James River reserve fleet provides convincing evidence of this and proof of the old saw about necessity being the mother of invention. Capt. John J. Fallon, commander, and Capt. Allan Hoffman, fleet captain, both naval reservists who skippered attack transports during the war, have made a virtue of poverty and improvisation.

Their greatest triumph is a "jet propelled" water monitor used to blast scale and old paint off ships' hulls. A tower was installed on an old barge and a standard firehose mounted. It can clean one side of a hull in a day. The neatest part of the trick is propulsion of the barge. All the helmsman does is turn and depress the hose. The jet effect skims the craft along.

6. Both Navy and Maritime officials agree on one thing—you only get out of mothballs what you put in. Most instances of machinery and parts replacement could be traced to defects not remedied when the ships were laid up. Warships put in reserve in 1948 were in far better shape than those hurriedly decommissioned in 1945.

7. Both Navy and Maritime officials say more maintenance funds are needed. Vice Admiral Edward L. Cochrane, United States Navy (retired), new head of the Maritime Administration, wants to make repairs on 300 to 400 of his ships. Heretofore, only money for preservation has been spent, but Congress last session voted $18,000,000 for repair of about 100 of them.

Cochrane says also that we should build more new merchantmen—tankers and fast cargo ships. We've got freighters "running out of our ears," he concedes, but most of them are slow Liberties, sitting ducks to modern Russian submarines. If we get new craft, some of the Liberties should be scrapped, he believes.

Navy fleet maintenance officers want to triple current spending on the mothball fleet and boost reserve fleet crews by at least one-third. They say that the plan to completely overhaul laidup ships every 5 years—abandoned during the Johnson economy program of last year—should be revived.

But top officials are going a bit slow. They want to evaluate thoroughly the Maritime Administration methods and other experimental techniques under study by the Navy Bureau of Ships.

Annual Reunion of the Cormier Family

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PHILIP J. PHILBIN
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, November 27, 1950

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a resolution adopted by the recent annual reunion of the Cormier family, which was held in New Bedford, Mass.

I am especially impressed by the strong stand which this resolution takes against communism and in favor of a strong foreign policy.

This family admirably promotes the ideals of Franco-American unity and exemplifies the best traditions of that indeed proud heritage.

Its membership is Nation-wide, and there is no group in the country which represents more faithfully absolute loyalty and devotion to fundamental American principles.

I am very happy to note that my own intimate and valued friend, J. Alfred Cormier, of Uxbridge, Mass., is a zealous leader of this group.

Whereas for more than a century the Cormier family has been pledged to the welfare and development of the American Commonwealth;

Whereas many of its members have played a prominent part in the civic, political, military, and religious affairs of this country while fostering and promoting policies and measures conducive to a better understanding among peoples, as well as to the prestige and good name of the American Nation abroad;

Whereas these wise domestic and foreign policies of the United States are being seriously threatened by subversive activities of Communist agents, operating both within the boundaries of the United States and without; and

Whereas these Communists agents are known to be inspired and directed from Moscow by the Soviet Government or its representatives, whether official or secret: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by members of the said Cormier family, assembled in the city of New Bedford, Mass., on the 30th day of September in the year of our Lord 1950 and originating from several States from Maine to Louisiana, That a strong stand be taken and an energetic declaration be expressed against all brands of communism and all methods of communistic activities anywhere in the world, but specifically here in the United States; and be it further

Resolved, That since communism is hostile to all the basic interests of these United States, the duly elected Representatives in Congress of the several States in which members of the aforesaid Cormier family have established their residence be urged to press, with all due vigor, legislation and other means designed to thwart the concerted efforts of communism, whether in the United States or its Territories, or abroad, and specifically to put a definitive stop to the insatiable imperialism of the Soviet Government, and the secretary of the Cormier family is hereby directed to send a copy of this resolution to the aforementioned Representatives in Congress.

EMERY J. CORMIER,
Executive Secretary.
J. ALFRED CORMIER,
President of the Supreme Council.

Executive President.

Surplus Dairy Products

OF
HON. JOHN W. HESELTON
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, November 27, 1950

Mr. HESELTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following inspiring address by Stanley Andrews, Director of Foreign Agricultural Relations, United States Department of Agriculture, before the thirty-fourth annual convention of the National Milk Producers Federation at Minneapolis, November 14, on the subject The International Situation and Its Impact on Agriculture:

The subject assigned me may well be divided into two parts—the effect of the international situation on agriculture in postwar 1945 to about the middle of 1950, and the situation as it affects farmers and their business since the Korean episode and the steppedup remobilization and rearmament program visualized at the present time.

At the close of the shooting war in 1945 we found a world pretty much blasted to bits. On top of that there was a deliberate policy on the part of the allies to so conduct the occupation of Germany and Japan that they could never again, through force of arms, become serious threats to world peace.

Economies geared to war had to be regeared to peace; those in the Armed Forces had to get back to peaceful pursuits. Literally millions of people had been uprooted and displaced by the fighting. They had to get back to some sort of a niche in the world community. Industrial production for peaceful purposes was at near zero except in the United States. Agricultural production in Europe, especially, and to some degree in the Orient, was down by 25 to 30 percent. The population of the world had increased, however, even during war. There were nearly 200,000,000 more mouths to feed than existed 10 years before.

A good part of the industry of the world had to turn to the United States for its machine tools, its raw materials, and some of its consumer goods. This kept the American industrial machine which had been built up on war production in high gear for peace. We did not have that 10,000,000 unemployed about which some of the more pessimistic had been talking.

In agriculture, the American abundance which had rolled from American farms during the war continued to roll out, to keep millions of people from literally starving to death. Few of those people or the countries of their nationality could pay for the food and clothing and raw materials and machine tools. So, America went into an extensive and far-reaching program of assisting nations and their peoples to get back on their feet economically. United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration was the first important step in that direction. Though this effort was a United Nations program and involved many nations, more than one-half of the money spent was contributed by the United States. This was followed by loans to Britain, military aid to Turkey and Greece, special aid to Italy and Austria, and, later, the European recovery program. Thus, on top of a war costing about $350,000,000,000 which caused expansion and development and earnings and living standards to go far beyond anything we ever had in this country and above the dreams of most countries of the world, we have actually given away in aid in one form or another around $42,500,000,000. Most of those dollars eventually came back to the United States in turn for food and goods and materials which this country supplied. How could we fail to prosper in a money sense with such expansion and such prodigious production? How could a group of cooperatives or businesses of almost any kind fail to grow and become prosperous with the greatest industrial activity in our history going ahead with wages, earnings, and living standards at an all-time high? So, in the past 5 years we have shipped abroad on the average of about 15,000,000 tons of food products each year. This has been wheat, corn, cotton, oilseeds, lard, dairy products, and some meat. That has kept our farm plant operating at a pretty good clip. It has helped keep prices up and, in at least some of the basic crops, kept surpluses from piling up beyond manageable proportions. Another significant thing about this abundance at home and strong market abroad is the fact that the world had to have American food and raw materials to survive the past 5 years. The iron curtain, whether or not we like to admit it, not only cut off the movement of people, ideas, and goods between the Russian sphere and the western nations, it also closed off a great volume of food products and raw materials which Europe and some of the far-eastern nations had to have to survive. The choice was between dealing with the Far East on Russian terms or finding foods and materials elsewhere, and the United States was about the only nation with anything to spare. Thus we have had a marked increase in exports of all kinds, and particularly food products.

To be specific, compared with the 1934–39 period, our exports of basic commodities line up about as follows:

Wheat and wheat flour of domestic grain:
Average, fiscal years 1934–35, 1938–39 ——— bushels	45, 120, 000
Average, fiscal years 1945–46, 1949–50 ——— bushels	390, 225, 000
Cotton:
Average, crop years 1934–35, 1938–39 ——— bales	5, 296, 000
Average, crop years 1945–46, 1949–50 ——— bales	4, 065, 000
Tobacco:
Average, calendar years 1935–39 ——— pounds	420, 797, 000
Average, calendar years 1945–49 ——— pounds	504, 549, 000
Fats, oils, and oilseeds:
Average, calendar years 1935–39 ——— pounds	286, 000, 000
Average, calendar years 1945–49 ——— pounds	1, 094, 000, 000

The weak note in all that is, of course, the fact that about 60 to 70 percent of those exports in the past 5 years were paid with money which we have taken from the United States Treasury to give to various countries to buy our products.

With European agricultural production catching up, with industrial production recovering to where it was beginning to press for markets, and with a reduction in ECA and military funds, there was evidence 5 months ago that farm prices were headed for some decline. The dollar gap, which had ranged from about seven billion in 1946 to a little under four billion last year, was still narrowing largely through reduction in our exports. Therefore, most of the experts and forecasters were predicting a pretty sharp slump all along the line in October of this year.

Then came the Korea explosion and we once more began to fight and rearm. Though the Korean episode seems well on the way to a successful conclusion, the fact that Russia, which could have stopped the North Koreans on an instant's notice, was willing to risk the possibility of an all-out war means that this country will have to get ready for an all-out war as possibly the best assurance that Russia will not risk it again.

We are in a war boom again—prices have shot up, employment is rising, and Mars again devours the goods which war requires. There will be some pinches in scarce materials and if we move toward the announced objective of about 3,000,000 men under arms and fully equipped with new weapons, if we continue the military aid promised western Europe, the next few years will likely have the appearance of a near-war mobilization.

Europe will not be able to produce the war materials to rearm and at the same time produce the industrial goods and other materials to sell in the world market and thereby close the dollar gap with their own means. The demands of our own mobilization will place a strain on our own and other Allied resources. Indeed, our own prodigious buying of industrial and raw materials such as wool, rubber, minerals of all kinds, and some finished steel has actually given this country an import balance of about $68,000,000 in the month of August—something which has not happened in more than 10 years.

Now, as representatives of a group of cooperatives dealing with milk products, you are no doubt interested in where milk, butter, and cheese stand in the picture, and, like a lot of the rest of us, you no doubt are scanning the horizon to see what the future may hold.

I'm sure I need not recount to this audience the war record of the dairy industry. With shortage of help, shortage of feed, and with about every other handicap, you poured to the armed forces all over the world an endless and almost limitless stream of dairy products. The people at home, of course, had to be cut back in their quite natural and normal desire for milk, cheese, and butter products. So effective was this cut-back that during the war, with high wages and great industrial activity which in the past had always meant increased consumption of these products, we actually ate less than 11 pounds of butter per capita in some of the war years against a 1939 average of about 17 pounds. Even counting the increased consumption of oleomargarine, the two accounted for only 14.3 pounds per capita per year against a prewar average of 19.6 pounds per capita per year.

Right or wrong, we had a right to expect that, once the war ended and rationing was lifted, with the continued high level of industrial and commercial activity, with increased population, butter consumption would increase sharply with ample supplies again available. The reverse has been true. Butter consumption per capita has declined to 10.5 pounds per person, although we are utilizing more milk in the form of fresh milk and cream than before the war. On top of that, dairy-cow population is averaging about 1,000,000 head below the prewar average.

Import and export of butter, in the traditional sense, have always been negligible factors so far as domestic production and consumption were concerned. We have been normally a net butter exporter.

The industry, viewed from the standpoint of its statistical position, looks pretty sad. The Government, stepping in with its support programs to stabilize the industry, finds itself with large amounts of all dairy products and an important part of the market for butter, dried milk, and cheese.

This is not only an intolerable situation for the Government; it is a situation which, if not corrected in some way, may eventually have more serious effects on the industry. I know that most of you are familiar with the figures on Government stocks, but maybe it is worth while to look at them again as they were on November 3. Here they are: Butter, 149,000,000 pounds; nonfat dry milk solids, 290,000,000 pounds; cheese, 43,000,000 pounds. While undoubtedly the present high rate of industrial activity, and perhaps some decline in production will change that picture for 1951, the very presence of this huge pile of food in the hands of the Government, the very existence of nearly 10,000,000 more consumers in this country compared with 1939 are surely challenges that an alert, aggressive industry should not ignore.

Far be it from me, a mere bureaucrat, to try to tell this important group what is good for their industry. But I submit that no industry was ever developed very far by being bailed out by the Government every year. With 150,000,000 customers, with a product which is not only good and palatable but good for us, what has become of American salesmanship when we limp along eating 10 pounds of butter per year against an earlier period when, under far less attractive economic conditions, we consumed 17 pounds per person? We cannot say that oleomargarine has taken our markets because the per capita increase of that product will not offset the decline of our utilization of butter.

We reiterate—the present domestic situation is a challenge to the dairy industry of this country to set about correcting its own ills. There is no other market on earth equal to the American market in volume and ability to absorb usable products.

No other group of people on earth has so wide a choice of what to do with its income. For 80 percent of the people of the earth outside the United States, the question of what they spend their money income for is academic. It is usually already spent before they get it in the form of food, clothing, housing, and medical services. But in America there are about 125,000,000 people who can make a choice every morning whether they will buy a gadget, a new dress, take in a show, save for a bond or a vacation, eat butter or do without it; it's merely a matter of choice with them. That is at once a challenge and an opportunity for the dairy industry. The dairy surplus problem will never be solved by seeking some foreign market or by dumping for relief purposes because most people of the world can't even afford the luxury of eating butter given to them. We have the solution of our dairy problems in our own hands and in our own country.

Yeshiva University's Charter Day Celebration—Proceedings of Dinner Commemorating Elevation of Institution to University Status on Sunday, November 12, 1950

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, November 27, 1950

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, it was my privilege to participate in the proceedings commemorating the Charter Day celebration of Yeshiva University at the Hotel Astor in New York City on Sunday, November 12, 1950. During the course of those proceedings I made the following brief remarks:

This is indeed a unique celebration. Jews the world over have been known as the people of the book. No matter in what surroundings they found themselves, no matter how destitute they were, no matter that even their sacred scrolls were taken from them and burned, learning and teaching remained their most important endeavor. Food for the body might be lacking but food for the spirit was always there.

The more oppressive the persecution, the more destructive the crusades against them, the stronger they clung to the tenets of the one God and the all-embracing concept of true brotherly love.

It was to be expected that when the new state of Israel was brought into being that education would have an important part in the new government's program. It was less to be expected, however, that that program would be one that would require by law that all children, Arab and Jew alike, must attend school and must acquire an education.

More surprising perhaps to the Christian world was the fact that with money and materials so scarce because of the supreme effort being made to accommodate the tremendous influx of new immigrants, that the state nevertheless found the wherewithal to supply that education for the children at government expense.

Reflection upon those matters causes us to wonder why it took so long for the Jews of America to establish a school of learning in this country of university status. The delay in accomplishing that worthy goal could hardly be attributed to an aversion to establishing a university under religious auspices, because in this country there was repeated precedent therefor; most of the larger and best known universities of our country were establishd by religious groups.

For reasons unknown, the Jews have been most backward in bringing into being and sustaining and maintaining and expanding Yeshiva University, the first of its kind to be organized under Jewish auspices. For a long time Jews were fearful that the establishment of the new State of Israel would give rise to new outbreaks of anti-Semitism. The contrary is true.

Today the Jew travels the world over, holding his head high, respected both for his religious affiliation and for his loyalty to the country which he claims as his own, whether it be the United States of America, Israel, or any of the other great democracies of the world. The same must be made true, too, as to institutions of education.

We must continue to preach that it is un-American and undemocratic for any institution of learning anywhere in the world to exclude a student otherwise qualified because of his race, creed, or place of origin.

On the other hand, the strongest preachment on the subject is the establishment and maintenance of a Yeshiva university where boys and girls are readily acceptable upon meeting the scholastic requirements. When the Jewish boys and girls of America have a university which will accept them, the other universities instead of closing their doors to them will soon be inviting them.

The furtherance of the purposes of Yeshiva University will destroy the alleged exclusiveness of those institutions which still maintain a quota system.

Too few people today know the story of Yeshiva University and fewer yet support it financially. All those present tonight should assume the obligation of spreading the story about Yeshiva University and bringing to its support, ever increasing numbers of Americans, who can and will give spiritual and monetary aid.

I commend to you those beautiful words from the Book of Proverbs, chapter XXIX, of our Torah: "The man who loveth wisdom causeth his Father to rejoice."

Mr. Speaker, the toastmaster of the evening was Max J. Etra, president of Yeshiva University Synagogue Councils, of which Mr. Max Halpert is the director. In presenting Dr. Samuel Belkin, president of Yeshiva University, he made the following remarks:

With humility and reverence I have the honor to present the distinguished head of Yeshiva University. Trained in the great religious academies of eastern Europe, product of Brown and Harvard Universities, Dr. Belkin is the symbol of the synthesis of Jewish learning and general knowledge which is the goal of our university. Foremost Talmudic scholar of our day and simultaneously master of Hellenistic literature, he is the guiding genius of our great educational enterprise. The glory and prestige that our university has achieved are the result of his vision, sacrifice, and consecration.

Ladies and gentlemen, the president of the Yeshiva University, Dr. Samuel Belkin.

Dr. Belkin, on behalf of the university presented its annual award to the Honorable William O. Douglas, Associate Justice of the United States Supreme Court. In that connection Dr. Belkin said:

Every title which a man bears symbolizes certain attainments of that particular individual. If a man is a physician we know that he dedicates his life to the curing of the sick. If one is a lawyer, we understand that he devotes his time to the defense of his clients. If one is a judge, we realize that he renders legal decisions. The same is true of titles of books particularly in the nonfiction field. The title reflects the content of the book. I was, therefore, always puzzled by the title of one of the Biblical books.

I could understand why the first book is called Genesis, because it deals with the creation of the universe; with the genesis of the human race. It teaches us the lesson that all of us stem from the same source; that all of us were created in the image of God. Exodus, because the book narrates the story of the flight of the Jewish people from ancient Egypt, from slavery and degradation. It tells us that God is revealed to us not in metaphysical speculation but in human experiences in the concept of liberty and freedom—"I am the Lord thy God, who has taken thee out of the land of Egypt." The Book of Leviticus, because the book contains the laws pertaining to the priests and Levites. The Book of Numbers, because it relates the life of the Jewish people in the Wilderness; to the numbers of the families and tribes. The Book of Deuteronomy because it is a deutero-nomos: a repetition of the laws—a digest of the laws which are found in previous books. The Book of Joshua because it tells of the life of the servant and successor to Moses; his struggles and his victories. But I could never understand the title of the Book of Judges. I expected to find in this particular book many references to legal decisions, to court procedure. I expected to find recorded disputes between man and man, between family and family, tribe and tribe, province and province, and the final decision rendered by the highest court in ancient Israel. We must remember that there were courts in ancient Palestine similar in structure to the courts of the United States.

We are told that there were lower courts, and higher courts, courts of appeals, and a supreme court the highest court in the land which was called the Sanhedrin, and which had its permanent abode in ancient Jerusalem. But none of the institutions is mentioned in the Book of Judges. In fact, with the exception o fthe Pentateuch hardly any legal material is to be found in the entire Bible. I, therefore, wonder why the book is called the Book of Judges. For the book merely relates rather the conflicts and wars between the ancient Israelites and the Philistines; between the Hebrews and the Canaanites, but no reference is made to laws, judgments and courts.

Then I thought that this title teaches us a very profound lesson. True enough it is of utmost importance that a judge, and particularly a judge who sits in the highest court should be a master of jurisprudence. He should be thoroughly versed in the Constitution of the land. He should know legal procedures, and in a sense be a genius in his chosen field. But there is something even more important than the knowledge of the law itself as a prerequisite for a judge in the highest court, and that is the personality of the judge. The willingness to champion the cause of justice, and those ancient judges who fought for monotheism, for a spiritual system of values, for moral discipline, and for the proclamation that there shall be one law for the native and the stranger, and opposed the paganism and materialism of the Philistines and the Canaanites, were the proper men to be judges.

My friends, we are privileged tonight to have with us one of the greatest men in our contemporary American democracy. I could speak of his many intellectual qualities. We all know that Justice Douglas possesses one of the most brilliant legal minds in the United States. I have heard some distinguished jurists say that Justice Douglas is the rightful successor to men like the late Justices Brandeis, Cardozo, Stone, and many others of the same type. I could speak of Justice Douglas as a great academician, for he has served with great distinction as professor in outstanding universities on this continent. I could speak of Justice Douglas as the literary genius, for whoever has read his recent book, his own autobiography, could easily see that had the Justice devoted his life to the field of English literature, he would have made one of the greatest contributions to the field of English letters. The fact that he is interested in reading biographies of forgotten great men shows the humaneness of the man—and I may say in a figurative sense that he loves to climb mountains, often reaches the top, but never looks down on anyone.

But I, as one, would say that the greatest tribute which we may pay to Justice Douglas is that he has always been a crusader for human rights and a champion of liberty, human dignity, and the preservation of our American democracy.

God once asked an ancient judge what wish I could give thee, and that man answered, a wise and understanding heart. A great man is one who possesses a wise mind and a wise heart, and that is one of the greatest qualities of the Justice whom we are honoring here tonight.

May I say that in a sense Yeshiva University endeavors to accomplish this synthesis—a wise heart and a wise mind. Yeshiva University is a full-fledged university. It is accredited by the highest academic agencies in the United States. It offers the courses and degrees as any ancient seat of learning in our American democracy. We also offer accredited courses in the premedical field, and we hope in the course of time we shall also establish a medical school. But, if one should ask us for the raison d'être of our institution, I would say that we endeavor to create a synthesis between secular learning and divine wisdom, between knowledge and moral discipline, between a wise mind and a wise heart, and while we may use a different method, and different application, nonetheless, we aim to achieve the same end, namely, that through our religious heritage and concept of the divine law, we may create a more spiritual personality.

I, therefore, consider it a privilege to confer upon Justice Douglas the Morris Morgenstern award, and may I say that when we address him as Mr. Justice we do not merely apply the technical term for a Judge who sits in the highest court, but we firmly believe that in his own life, and in his own personality he symbolizes the concept of justice—and as a symbol of our high regard for you, Mr. Justice, I hand you this award.

To which Mr. Justice Douglas responded as follows:

I appreciate the honor which you have conferred upon me. I cherish it, as the late Harlan F. Stone and the late Frank Murphy, of the Supreme Court of the United States, cherished the like honor you bestowed on them. Much of their lives was given to the defense of liberty and the protection of civil rights of the citizens of the Nation. They and Yeshiva University had much in common.

Yeshiva University has a devotion to learning which is possible of realization only in a democracy. It takes patience and tolerance to pursue truth wherever it may lead. The full measure of civil liberties is realized only when government, the community, and those who sponsor an institution allow unrestrained inquiry and sanction full academic freedom in practice as well as theory. This university is a part of the front line concerned not with military matters but with the vastly more important problems of the mind and spirit. Men of learning, men of faith, men devoted to the ideals of freedom—these men rather than those trained in the military tradition are the real security of a nation. They are the ones who keep alive the spirit of independence, who translate the democratic ideal into the lives of every man.

Yeshiva University, though comparatively young, has already made a deep impression upon the cultural and educational life of the community. It has gathered together students from all parts of the Nation and based its program on the belief that the ancient faith forms a solid ground work for the development of American culture and American traditions. The sons of Yeshiva have shown through their activities, both in the pulpit and elsewhere, that religious training and religious outlook upon life are of inestimable aid in advancing the causes of liberty and humanity to which we Americans are dedicated.

There is a deep well of learning from which all spiritual strength is derived. By thought and deed man can achieve spiritual realization and come to be like God. There are men of this faith throughout the world.

We can reach the peoples of the earth only through spokesmen who have that perspective and understanding. It will be the great tragedy of this hour if we let the military be our spokesman. The military mind knows only how to destroy. We need to do a vastly more difficult task. We need to create tolerance, understanding, good will in the world. We need to show the people of the earth the warm and generous heart of America. It is foolhardy to do it by recklessly throwing away our wealth and squandering our fortunes. They need sympathy and understanding, not money. There are revolutions in the world which need management and direction. Revolution is a great heritage of American life. Millions of the people of the earth are trying to do today for themselves and their children what our forefathers did for us in 1776. It will be shameful if when the history of the period is written America is credited with suppressing these struggles, with alining itself on the world scene with reaction, tyranny, and oppression.

Within the past year, I have had the opportunity of visiting the new democracies in Israel and India. I saw exhilarating efforts of hard-pressed people to fulfill their national aspirations and to establish their own cultural and spiritual development. There are important differences between the type of democratic government which grows and flourishes in Israel and India and that with which we are familiar. But they are as deeply devoted to tolerance for minorities, to religious and academic freedom, to the elimination of discriminations of all kinds—race, sex, creed, color—as we are. There are many things we can learn from them. The least we can do is to give them sympathetic understanding, encouragement, and good will.

It is because this institution is a symbol of tolerance for minorities and of respect for their rights that I am happy to receive the honor which you have conferred upon me. I know that in doing so you are not honoring a man but the institution to which I belong; that in this manner you are indicating your devotion to the Constitution of the United States and to the principles on which it is based.

Prompt Senate Enactment of Antimerger Bill Vital to Free Enterprise

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EMANUEL CELLER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, November 27, 1950

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, H. R. 2734, a bill designed to plug a loophole in existing antitrust law by prohibiting the acquisition by one firm of the corporate assets of another where the effect of such merger may be substantially to lessen competition overwhelmingly passed the House of Representatives on August 15, 1949. The bill, which merely codifies the original intent of the Clayton Act by preventing the elimination of competition through acquisition of corporate assets as well as of corporate stock, should now be promptly considered by the Senate.

Since as far back as 1927 the Congress has been forewarned of the existence of this loophole in its antitrust fabric and the potential dangers to the economy which might arise therefrom through persistent plaints of the Federal Trade Commission. The Temporary National Economic Committee, consisting of the most prominent Members of Congress, which spent several years closely examining the Nation's economic structure, recommended in 1941 that section 7 of the Clayton Act be amended to prohibit continual circumventing of Congress' original intent in passage of the act.

In his state of the Union message delivered to the Congress on January 4, 1950, the President of the United States, Mr. Truman, urged upon Congress the importance of this legislation when he stated:

> We must curb monopoly and provide aids to independent business so that it may have the credit and capital to compete in a system of free enterprise. I recommend that the Congress complete action at this session on the pending bill to close the loopholes in the Clayton Act which now permit monopolistic mergers.

The importance of enacting this law cannot be overemphasized. Already, according to reports of the Federal Trade Commission, controls of our basic and strategic industries are falling into fewer and fewer hands. In the field of primary aluminum, only three companies exist. Three companies likewise control 95 percent of the tin-can and tinware industry, 88 percent of the copper industry, 72 percent of the distilled-liquor industry, and over 70 percent of the rubber-tire industry.

Similarly, entire segments of industries are being wiped out through preemption of their fields by large companies. In the steel industry, for instance, the magazine Iron Age depicted the demise of the barrel and drum business in the following words:

> A few weeks ago the purchase of the Bennet Manufacturing Co., Chicago, by the United States Steel Corp. pretty well completed the capture of the entire barrel and drum business by major steel producers. Some 87 percent of the business, representing about 435,500 tons of steel consumption yearly, has been corralled by the mills.

Independent fabricators in various industries are similarly finding it increasingly difficult to remain in business because of the forward integration into finishing processes by the large producers of raw materials. The shortages of resources caused by the emergency period will, if not offset by this legislation, compound damage wrought by large-scale integration.

With these facts in mind and with a long-term mobilization program in prospect which, unless carefully scrutinized, will further tendencies toward economic concentration, it is most urgent that this bill be enacted into law while opportunity still exists. The Judiciary Committee of the Senate has already recommended to that body that this bill be enacted into law—Senate Report No. 1775, Eighty-first Congress, second session. There remains now only for the full Senate to consider this bill, which has the approval of the Federal Trade Commission, the Department of Justice, the House of Representatives, and the President of the United States. The Senate must act before it is too late.

Apportioning Seats

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. W. STERLING COLE
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, November 27, 1950

Mr. COLE of New York. Mr. Speaker, the outstanding living authority on the question of congressional reapportionment is Dr. Walter F. Willcox, of Ithaca, N. Y., who has made a lifetime study of the subject and prepared an article which was published in the New York Times on November 19, 1950, and which I include herewith:

APPORTIONING SEATS—METHODS FOR GREATER EQUALITY IN HOUSE REPRESENTATION PROPOSED

(The writer of the following letter is professor emeritus of economics and statistics at Cornell University. He has served in an advisory capacity to the Federal Government and is the author of Introduction to the Vital Statistics of the United States, 1900–1930.)

To the EDITOR OF THE NEW YORK TIMES:

Analysis of the recently published census figures suggests that a political struggle over methods of apportionment may start this winter like the one which took so much time in Congress nearly 10 years ago.

Then the Democratic majority voted to adopt a novel method which gave seat 435 to Arkansas in preference to the method used after previous censuses which would have transferred it to Michigan. Now it may be in the interest of the Democratic Party to return to the method discarded 10 years ago, because to do so would transfer seat 435 from Kansas to California.

If such a struggle as I foresee should arise next winter, the technical arguments outlined below will reinforce rather than oppose the political ones.

TRANSFERABLE SEATS

Methods of apportionment are of three types, two extreme and a group of intermediate ones. Both of those now under discussion belong to the intermediate group. The results of different methods differ only in the number and distribution of what may be called transferable seats.

If the States are divided into two groups—one with a population larger, the other with a population smaller, than the average—one extreme method gives all transferable seats to the group of large States, the other gives them all to the group of small States, while methods belonging to the intermediate class divide them about equally between the two groups. The number of such transferable seats after the first census was only 2; 30 years later it was 9. Now it is 17.

Under the 1950 figures the present method of equal proportions gives 9. The displaced method of major fractions would give 8 of these 17 seats to the group of small States.

Two questions seem likely to arise. With the first—namely, which method gives results advantageous to the party in power—I have no concern. With the second—which method best carries out the mandate of the Constitution that "Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers"—I am deeply concerned.

INTENT OF FOUNDERS

Discussions in the Constitutional Convention in 1787 and in Congress since then through 150 years seem to indicate that the intent of those who wrote the Constitution was that, while in the Senate each State should count as one, in the House each resident or each 1,000,000 residents should have as nearly as possible the same number of Representatives, whether the 1,000,000 reside in large States or small. The converse of this proposition is that the average population per district in the two groups of large and of small States should be as nearly equal as possible.

Accepting this as the intent of the Constitution and of Congress, I lay down two propositions:

The method which makes the average population per district of the two groups of large and small States most nearly equal is the best.

The method which makes the average number of Representatives per 1,000,000 people, whether living in large States or in small, most nearly equal is the best.

These two propositions are merely different aspects of the same argument. One form of it, however, that about the size of districts, may appeal more to the average Congressman, and the other form about the equality of representation more to the average citizen.

In 8 of the 17 censuses the results of the 2 methods differ; in 9 they agree. In each of the eight cases of difference there is less difference between the average district population of the two groups of large and small States under the method of major fractions than there is under the method of equal proportions. The sum of the eight differences under the method of major fractions is less than one-half of the sum under the method of equal proportions.

AVERAGE DIFFERENCE

If the other method of comparing the approach to equality in the groups of large and small States is used, it appears that in each of the eight cases the average difference in the number of Representatives per 1,000,000 people is greater under the method of equal proportions than it is under the method of major fractions and that the total of the eight differences under the present method is twice as great as it is under the discarded method.

In the 8 cases in which the results of apportionment by the 2 methods which have differed, 10 seats were involved, 3 by the 1920 figures, 1 in each of the 7 other cases. The method of major fractions would have given seats to the following large States: California, Iowa, Michigan, New York (2), North Carolina, Pennsylvania, South Carolina, Virginia (2), which the method of equal proportions would have transferred to the following small States: Arkansas, Kansas, Nebraska, New Jersey, New Mexico, Rhode Island (2), Vermont (3).

Separation of Air Mail Subsidy Pay

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. HESELTON
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, November 27, 1950

Mr. HESELTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I want to refer briefly to H. R. 9184, which has a rule and which could come before the House soon for debate and vote.

This is one bill reported overwhelmingly by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce designed simply to bring the cost above a fair return for carrying air mail into the open so that the American people can have the facts and the Congress can appropriate based on these facts.

The committee report is No. 3041.

In the Appendix of the RECORD of September 18, page A6631, I outlined certain major points of importance for the consideration of this legislation.

I now wish to include copies of two telegrams I received with reference to the problem involved:

NEW YORK, N. Y., September 19, 1950.
The Honorable JOHN W. HESELTON,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.:

The people of the Nation are entitled to know how much of their money is being spent for carrying the mails and how much is for subsidies. Therefore, the Reorganization Commission specifically recommended "that the amounts of these subsidies should be paid to the Post Office by open appropriation from tax funds and not imposed upon the Post Office or the mail users in this hidden manner." I strongly urge that this Congress enact legislation to effect this recommendation of the Reorganization Commission.

HERBERT HOOVER.

NEW YORK, N. Y., September 21, 1950.
The Honorable JOHN W. HESELTON,
House of Representatives:

I agree with Former President Hoover who in a recent telegram to Members of Congress said, "The people of the Nation are entitled to know how much of their money is being spent for carrying the mails and how much is for subsidies," separation of air mail subsidies was a major recommendation of the Hoover Commission and is effectively carried out in the provisions of H. R. 9184. You have done good work in seeing that those provisions are included.

Chairman, Citizens Committee for the Hoover Report.

I hope this will make readily available for all my colleagues material which will be useful to them. The great savings which would follow the enactment of this bill into law will certainly be welcomed by the American people in view of the burdens placed upon them now and likely to be increased soon.

Draft of Resolution of the Washington, D. C., Chapter, University of Missouri Alumni Association

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. A. S. J. CARNAHAN
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, November 27, 1950

Mr. CARNAHAN. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include herewith a resolution adopted by the Washington, D. C., Chapter of the University of Missouri Alumni Association:

Whereas the Washington Chapter of the University of Missouri Alumni Association, assembled in plenary session at the Lee House in Washington, D. C., for a buffet breakfast brunch, at high noon Sunday, November 19, 1950, in order to effectively decide for all time the controverted merits—there being no demerits—to various county claims to curing and producing the best hams in Missouri, it already being established as fact that Missouri produces the Nation's finest hams; and

Whereas the Audrain County ham contributed by Mitchell White, editor and publisher of the Mexico Ledger, and longtime adviser and counselor for numerous and diverse university, county, and State causes, has exceptional merit in taste, flavor, and obvious artistry employed in its preparation; and

Whereas the incomparable Boone County ham sent air express by Robert E. Lee Hill, secretary, Missouri Bankers Association, long noted internationally as the university alumni secretary and No. 1 supporter and enthusiast for all university causes, possesses supreme individuality and succulency; and

Whereas the ham contributed for Callaway County by a most illustrious and successful son, Paul Truitt, of Callaway County and Millersburg, outstandingly upholds the immortal name and claims of kingdom of Callaway aspirations to the title of best producers of Missouri ham; and

Whereas the Lincoln County ham sent direct from his home by the Honorable CLARENCE CANNON, loyal university alumnus and distinguished dean of the Missouri congressional delegation who has been elected by his constituents to the House of Representatives in 15 successive victories of landslide or near landslide proportions, and whose perennial position as chairman of the powerful House Appropriations Committee has long established him without peer as a judge of values, whether of hams or of dollars, and earns for his transmittal comment the contest ham is the best he has produced this year on his Elsberry farm immediate substantiation, corroboration, and confirmation by competent and critical fellow alumni; and

Whereas the assemblage deeply regrets inability of the Honorable H. J. Blanton, of Paris, many years a tireless university curator, and many, many years revered editor and publisher of the Monroe County Appeal, to supply a much anticipated ham entry in the contest from his capital of democracy (with big and little D) because "farmers who cure hams the old Virginia way have gotten rich under New Deal and Fair Deal administrations and instead of selling hams now eat them," per his attached letter of regret; and

Whereas the entire occasion has been made more enjoyable and the ham delicacies the more delectable because of the delicious Crimes Golden and Red Scarlet Pike County apples sent especially by the Stark Bros., in Louisiana; and

Whereas a most appropriate Missouri products touch for a Mizzou alumni rally was supplied in souvenir superplastics by the A. P. Green Fire Brick Co., a superlative supporter of university causes and an employer of many outstanding alumni technical and scientific specialists whose refractories products have combined with Audrain ham to give Mexico world renown; and

Whereas the Lee House displayed and exhibited typical Missouri hospitality in leaving no detail unturned to assure complete success of the occasion, especially in the person of Manager Ed Sheehe, whose talents reflect the Missouri influences of his successful regime as manager of the Missouri Hotel in Jefferson City, and likewise in the person of his good right bower, Roger Jacobson, and specifically in the serving of an authentic Washington version of such an important menu item as the Little Dixie Hot Biscuits: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the unanimous decision of the judging and resolutions committee, in which the chapter enthusiastically concurs, after exhaustive tasting, sampling, eating, comparative research and analysis, that all the entered contest hams are of such uniformly supreme flavor and excellence as to permit no other award under the evidence than a merited and deserved tie for first place; and be it further

Resolved, That all Missouri hams, properly cured in the dense smoke of hickory chips, are backed, favored, supported, and endorsed against challenging Virginia hams, Maryland hams, Kentucky hams, and hams throughout the world in competition any place and at any time, for money, marbles, or chalk; and be it finally

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be struck and forwarded to all those who contributed to the success of this historic research and fact-finding event, as a unique, distinctive, and historic first in the National Capital, at the Seat of Government, where history on many subjects of much lesser significance is constantly being made.

Belated Discovery

OF
HON. ANDREW J. BIEMILLER
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, November 27, 1950

Mr. BIEMILLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am inserting an interesting editorial from the November 24 issue of the Christian Science Monitor.

BELATED DISCOVERY

Signs increase that most of the Members of Congress who swept the McCarran Communist control bill over a Presidential veto did so more from fear that any vote against any anti-Red measure would be distorted by their opponents and misunderstood by their constituents than from approval or even understanding of all that bill contained.

The weekly magazine Counterattack, which had battled consistently for the McCarran bill and for its predecessors, now urges its subscribers to write their Congressmen and Senators in support of revising the law in certain respects.

The act as it stands, says Counterattack, could be used to proscribe labor unions as well as the Communist Party. The definition of subversive organizations should, therefore, be amended to prevent this. (In unscrupulous hands, the law could be interpreted also to proscribe any minority movement inconvenient to the majority in power.)

Likewise, says Counterattack, barring from the United States any alien who "at any time" has been associated with Communist or other totalitarian organizations has already worked injustices. And it recommends this provision be changed to recognize the fact that people can wake up and recant.

The official listing of vital defense facilities should be made discretionary instead of mandatory, the magazine adds, so as not to provide enemy agents with gratuitous information.

Counterattack is right. Congress should make these revisions as soon as possible—as this newspaper has been urging ever since passage of the law.

But Counterattack's explanation of how such egregious defects got into the law bears examination. The law, says the magazine, is an "experimental venture in legislation," and effective methods of combating communism can be found only by trial and error.

True—in part. However, these particular defects and these particular perils were held up and exposed by a few courageous Congressmen, by the President in his veto message, and by an alert press in plenty of time to have permitted correction before, not after, the McCarran bill became law.

Men of Yalta

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, November 27, 1950

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am including an interesting broadcast by Mr. George E. Sokolsky presented over the American Broadcasting Co. stations on Sunday, November 5, as follows:

On Tuesday we shall go to the polls to vote. Some will vote for personalities, for a friend or a neighbor, for someone who has charm or is a lodge member or is photographed kissing anybody who is available for a photograph. Some will vote for men because the A. F. of L. or the CIO recommends them, or against them for the same reason.

Some will vote for candidates because they are Republicans, others because they are Democrats.

None of these reasons interest me even slightly. The times are too serious. I cannot think of an American boy fighting in the chill mountains of Korea without saying to myself:

"Brother, I shall vote to protest against the waste and loss of your young years. I shall, first of all, vote against the men of Yalta, against the politicians and statesmen and bureaucrats who have lied to us with consistency, who have tricked and fooled us, and upon whose souls must be the blood of Americans, spilled in this avertible war."

For 2 years now on this broadcast, and since 1943 in my newspaper column, I have warned the American people to distrust their own Government regarding far-eastern questions. It has been a most unpleasant task. Nobody really enjoys denouncing the judgments and decisions of the President of the United States and his Secretary of State; nobody enjoys attacking such a personality as Gen. George Marshall.

Yet it had to be done; and had our Government listened to those of us who really knew the Far East, we should not today be fighting the armies of Soviet China in Korea, and perhaps soon enough in French Indochina and India.

How could Dean Acheson possibly have favored the admission of Soviet China into the United Nations? The Communists of China are no new group; they were organized in 1920. Everything about them has been placed in the files of the State Department since 1920. I know of reports that were filed in those years; I prepared some of them for American consular and military officers. In his position, the Secretary of State cannot plead ignorance. It is his business to know.

Yet, under orders from President Truman and Dean Acheson, the American delegates to the United Nations long ago announced that while they would not vote to admit Soviet China, they would not use the veto to keep those satellites of Stalin out, and that they would abide by the majority vote.

So what happens? Dean Acheson is betrayed by Soviet China which goes into the Korean war and kills Americans. And now they say that the United Nations will declare Soviet China an aggressor for her military and imperialistic role in Korea, Tibet, and French Indochina. But what is true today was true a year ago, 5 years ago, 30 years ago. Communist China has been a member of the Third International, in its various forms, since the Baku Congress in 1920.

For this alone, I shall vote against any candidate for any public office who has supported the far-eastern policy of Roosevelt, Truman, Alger Hiss, Dean Acheson, and Owen Lattimore.

That will be my first consideration in this election because Americans are dying in Korea.

Now, I would like to know this. Why was the Wedemeyer report on China suppressed for 2 years and the Wedemeyer report on Korea suppressed up to this very moment?

I say here, categorically, that had the Wedemeyer report on China and Korea been accepted by the United States in 1947, this war in Korea could not have taken place in 1950.

I am not saying that I have read the Wedemeyer report on Korea. Nevertheless, I am going to repeat, categorically, that General Wedemeyer in 1947, warned of the dangers in Korea and set forth a program for safeguarding our situation. That report has been suppressed.

Who ordered it suppressed? Why is it that General Wedemeyer, a great authority on far-eastern matters, and a great general, sits in the Presidio in California twiddling his thumbs, while a far-eastern war is going on? Is it because he told the truth?

Until the entire Wedemeyer story is out in the open for all Americans to see, I shall vote against any man who condones the betrayal of the American people in the interest of party politics.

I want to know something more. Gen. Douglas MacArthur has regarded Formosa as of the utmost strategic importance. He has risked the displeasure of the President by making a public demonstration of his feelings about Formosa. Also, Douglas MacArthur reported on the perils in Korea, although that area had been excluded from MacArthur's sphere.

Why did the President and Dean Acheson write off Korea? Why did they withdraw our troops from South Korea? Why did they fail to train and equip the South Korean Army? Why did they not know that Soviet Russia was arming and training the North Korean Army? Why have we been flirting with the Chinese Communists as recently as a few weeks ago, when they were then actually in Korea and they were then actually in French Indochina?

Who is responsible for the untruthful smearing of President Syngman Rhee of Korea? Is it not remarkable that the smearers are repeating against Rhee what they said about Chiang Kai-shek? He is corrupt. His entourage is corrupt. Is corruption to be limited to Kansas City, Mo.?

These are questions that should be asked in the Senate and House of Representatives. Some of them were asked there in the last session.

I shall vote against any man, of whatever party, who has supported the Acheson-Hiss-Lattimore far-eastern policy.

Now, I want to go into another matter. You will recall that Senator MILLARD TYDINGS was appointed to head a commitee to investigate the infiltration of Communists into the State Department. Associated with him was Senator BRIEN MCMAHON and Senator THEODORE GREEN. There was also a minority of two Republicans consisting of Senators LODGE and HICKENLOOPER.

That Tydings committee never made a proper investigation. I know and say now that Senator TYDINGS knew the truth. I say that his counsel, Edward Morgan, knew the truth. Morgan discussed the work of the committee with me at its inception and his conversation made me enthusiastic that at last a fine job was going to be done. That job died on the vine. TYDINGS, who started like a lion, ended like a crooner. MCMAHON, who likes to play safe, scuttled off into oblivion on that committee.

It ended up in a smear of Senator JOE MCCARTHY and a whitewash of Owen Lattimore and the State Department.

Now, what I want to know is who called off Senator TYDINGS? Who sealed Edward Morgan s lips? Who scared BRIEN MCMAHON?

I want to know why these men failed to protect their country, so that now, because of mistaken policies and school-boyish absurdities in the State Department, our sons are being killed by Chinese Communists in Korea.

No use talking the fancy language of high diplomacy and great statesmanship. We need the truth now and election day is the time for Americans to show that they mean to have the truth.

There is only one way to get the truth and that is to vote out of office everybody who supported the Tydings-McMahon report. We should get rid of them now.

During the end of last week, we probably lost 1,000 of our boys. I don't know how many. Up to October 27, our casualties amount to 27,610 with 4,401 dead.

And last week was one of the worst in this war.

That means a lot to me and I am sure it does to you. And it could have been averted beginning with the Tehran Conference in November 1943, and through the Yalta and Potsdam Conferences. It could have been averted had we not sent Generals Stilwell and Marshall to China to help the Chinese Communists. It could have been averted had we not withheld support from Chiang Kai-shek. It could have been averted had we not drawn the line at the thirty-eighth parallel in Korea. It could have been averted had we listened to Generals MacArthur and Wedemeyer.

That is the issue in this election as I see it—and I shall vote accordingly.

In 1926, I wrote the following for the China yearbook of that year:

"The Communist Party and Communist youth are organizations which came into existence largely through young people of China being converted to communism through the reading of Communist literature and through education in Communist schools in Irkutsk, Moscow, Leningrad, and other Russian cities. These Chinese are more closely affiliated with the Third International than with the Soviet government and their activities are not always identical with the activities of the Soviet representatives in China."

That was written 24 years ago, in the course of a day's work.

But the State Department only discovered the facts of life last week when the Manchurian armies openly appeared in Korea.

Europe or Asia?

OF

HON. ANDREW J. BIEMILLER

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, November 27, 1950

Mr. BIEMILLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am inserting an article from the Christian Science Monitor for November 24, entitled "Europe or Asia?—One Answer Is Steel." I think anyone reading this article will certainly see the wisdom of continuing our assistance to the nations of Western Europe.

EUROPE OR ASIA?—ONE ANSWER IS STEEL

(By Richard L. Strout)

WASHINGTON.—The biggest military prize in the world today is the steel production of Europe. It as simple as 2 plus 2 equals 4. Yet in the discussion of the relative importance of Europe and Asia to the United States the equation is frequently forgotten.

With Western Europe's steel on America's side Russia's long-term victory in direct combat is virtually impossible. But if this steel were integrated into Soviet strength the position of the United States would be perilous indeed.

There is no similar steel stake in Asia. Asia's vast potential for the time is manpower. But who will make the guns, the tanks, the locomotives, the machines to equip Asia's potential soldiers? For generations to come the center of such production will not be in Asia (outside of Japan) but in North America, in Western Europe, and in Russia itself.

The simple statistics tell the story better than a volume could do. They show the awful danger threatening the United States if Russia should grab Western Europe. They explain the cold shiver that went through many American military men at the question of Senator ROBERT A. TAFT, Republican, of Ohio, Can Europe be defended? If Europe's steel production and potential cannot be defended and if this means that it will ultimately go to Russia, then the situation is gloomy indeed. If only for its own preservation, America needs to defend Western Europe.

Here are some comparative figures of steel capacity for 1949 expressed in metric tons (the figure on short tons would be larger):

United States and Canada, 94,000,000.

Western Europe, 60,000,000.

U. S. S. R. and satellites, 27,000,000(?).

If the Soviet conquered Western Europe and took over its steel capacity then its output would be about equal to North America's. Omitting the United Kingdom (with 16,500,000-ton capacity) the Soviet would still boost its controlled production to about 70,000,000 tons if it took over the balance of Europe.

Look for the contrast at the Pacific. Biggest steel capacity there is Japan's, with 7,000,000 metric tons. Australia and India have about the same, around 1,500,000 each. Communists have taken over China but its steel capacity is only about 100,000 tons, while Manchuria has about the same amount. Korea had about 75,000 tons.

Here is the military argument for defending Western Europe. Reduced to statistics like t ese it seems almost too simple to be worth stressing. The Soviet is steel-poor. It has added a little to its own estimated 21,200,000 tons capacity by taking over four satellite nations: the Czechs with 2,800,000; Poland, 2,200,000; Hungary, 600,000; and Rumania, 300,000. But it is no match on this basis for the outside world. Steel is what Russia needs. Germany has an estimated 1949 capacity of 17,000,000 tons; France, 10,000,000; the Saar, 2,700,000.

It is folly to ask, Why should the United States defend Europe? It is folly because physical capacity for waging war is still based on steel. Russia can't get steel in Asia.

Greater Lawrence Joint Board, Textile Workers Union of America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, November 27, 1950

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include the following address of George L. P. Weaver, a national CIO official now on leave of absence as special assistant to W Stuart Symington, Chairman of the National Security Resources Board, at the annual banquet of the Greater Lawrence Joint Board, Textile Workers Union of America, CIO, November 12, 1950.

Mr. Weaver was born May 18, 1912, in Pittsburgh, Pa. He received his education in the Dayton, Ohio, schools, the YMCA, college in Chicago, Ill., and Columbia University.

While a member of Local 1000, UTSE-CIO, he was appointed an international representative of the union. In 1944 the convention of UTSE created two assistants to the international president, and Mr. Weaver was appointed to one of these posts, in charge of the Washington office. He was named to the union's general executive board in 1946. Mr. Weaver has served as director of the Committee To Abolish Discrimination since it was established by the CIO in 1942. He is assistant to the secretary-treasurer of the CIO, James E. Carey, and a member of the general executive board of the United Transport Service Employees, CIO.

It is with hesitation and humility that I accept your kind invitation this evening. My association with the National Security Resources Board is of such brief period—and my ignorance so profound—that at the outset, I must extend an apology for my audacity. However, the opportunity to participate in the annual banquet of the Greater Lawrence Joint Board of Textile Workers resolve my doubts.

For the last 8 years it has been my privilege to serve you on the national staff of the CIO. During these years, I have had the opportunity of working with a man, whom I deem it a pleasure to consider my friend and counselor, and whom you have honored in each one of your conventions by electing him your general president, Emile Rieve.

Tonight we are breaking bread together in thanks for surviving another war. This is the time that we pause as an organization and take stock of the events of the past year. Since June, our country, in association with the United Nations, has been in military combat and the events in Korea, though tragic in many respects and to many people, have nevertheless made an invaluable contribution to the future security of the United States. They have given us one more chance to face up to the necessities for survival. They have underscored a simple truth; namely, if we do not first attain, and then maintain, adequate strength, there is sure to be another war, and America is sure to lose. In this new world society, all the old rules have been changed. Wars are no longer declared; the art of diplomacy has been reduced to invective; and the world has so shrunk that oceans no longer offer a means of defense.

In the two previous wars, the United States literally had a period of years in which to mobilize; and the scope and volume of our production finally turned the tide. Today, we cannot bank on having a period of years in which to mobilize our resources. This becomes an important calculation to consider—it is no longer a theoretical matter.

In the middle thirties the most important question for civilization was "What are the Nazis doing?" so today the most important question, one which affects a major part of national and individual thinking and effort, is "What are the Russians doing?" Believing that to be true, Mr. W. Stuart Symington, then Secretary of the Air Force, but now Chairman of the National Security Resources Board, set out to find out from ourselves and our allies as much of this answer as possible; and, as a result, in February presented the following six points in a talk at Baylor University:

"This we know. Those who reiterate America must be destroyed now have:

"1. A ground army greater in numbers than the combined armies of the United States and its allies;

"2. An air force whose strength in nearly all categories is now the largest in the world and growing relatively larger month by month;

"3. The world's largest submarine fleet; and an intensive submarine development and construction program."

Here are three facts which every American should know, because this is the world in which we live:

"1. Behind the iron curtain there has been an atomic explosion.

"2. Behind that curtain is the air equipment capable of delivering a surprise atomic attack against any part of the United States.

"3. We have no sure defense against such an attack."

For the first time in the history of this country, a foreign government has the capacity to attack our home soil tonight—has the weapons and the means to deliver those weapons; and the danger will grow unless we realistically evaluate these grim facts of the last 12 months. This is no theoretical matter to us, and as the military strength of Russia increases, it is certainly no theoretical matter to the United Nations troops in Korea. We cannot underrate the production potentials of this aggressor, as we review our triumphs of production during the last two wars. We can no longer think of the sweep of territory behind the iron curtain as a place where peasants scratch the earth with a stick. It is a vast land, rich with untold resources. There is an immense industrial machine behind that iron curtain; and we now know that the greatest share of its production goes into implements of war, and into more industrial capacity which, in turn, will be used for still more implements of war. That industrial capacity is producing weapons. Unskilled peasants didn't make the tanks that swept over the United Nations forces in Korea.

When you count resources, add in people. In Europe behind the iron curtain there is a population of 270,000,000, and the Communist or Communist-controlled people of the world now total over 800,000,000 people. In terms of sheer output it takes a lot of motors to match that many people.

Whatever we think of the methods used to develop the economic potential behind the iron curtain, we must be realistic in facing up to the result, a wedge of immense force that can now be driven whenever a calculating aggressor chooses to drive it, and theirs is the choice of where and when.

In wartime we ask our civilians to reduce their scale of living in order to release materials and labor for military supply. But the millions of people behind the iron curtain who have never had metal toys to give to their children, or pressure cookers to put on a porcelain range, or enough to cook in any kind of pot, have nothing to give up. What they did without, when they did not have the means, they do without now. For their consumers there is little; for industrial development looking to production of war goods there is much.

The leaders of Communist imperialism not only have great military forces at their command, they have demonstrated a willingness to use these forces in open and naked aggression, in spite of the united opposition of all the free nations. Under these circumstances, the free nations have no alternative but to build up the military strength needed to support the rule of law in the world. Only in this way can we hope to maintain that which is decent, that which is good, and that which is just in our society.

According to President Truman, in order to do our part in building up our military strength and the military strength of the free nations throughout the world, we must more than double our defense efforts. We must increase our rate of spending for defense purposes from $15,000,000,000 to more than $30,000,000,000 by next June.

In the years after that we shall probably have to spend much more than $30,000,000,000. We must be prepared to maintain a very strong defense program for many years to come.

To do this job we must meet and solve three hard, tough problems:

First, we must produce the materials and equipment needed for defense.

Second, we must raise the money to pay the cost of our increased defense efforts.

Third, we must prevent inflation.

To meet these demands we must expand total production. This means, as Mr. Truman has said, harder work and longer hours for everybody. It means utilizing more women in industry, older people—it means we no longer can afford the luxury of discrimination because of race, color, or creed in our employment patterns in American industry. Practically everyone warm and walking is working today—but not at their highest capacity. We must realize the highest productive capacity from each and every worker.

It means that businessmen must expand productive facilities, develop new techniques, and increase efficiency in every way possible. It means enlarging our capacity to produce basic materials such as steel, aluminum, and copper. Until this expansion can meet all our needs, some civilian goods will have to give way for the production of military goods. This is the challenge to our economy for the next few years.

The Defense Production Act of 1950 is one of the prime tools to accomplish this task. This law will enable Government to provide special capital to create this expansion. It will enable Government to make sure that defense orders have top priority—to make allocations of critical materials in short supply—to prevent the hoarding of raw materials essential to defense. It will also enable the Government to cut down the production of nonessential civilian goods that use up critical materials.

The administration of these and other powers will be coordinated by the Chairman of the NSRB, Mr. W. Stuart Symington. In addition, the National Security Resources Board is an advisory board to the President. It is a board which recommends the essential coordination between civilian and industrial mobilization potential and military potential; or it might be said that it recommends, in emergency, the allocation of all types of resources except military resources, and then monitors the coordination of those resources in accordance with the Defense Production Act of 1950. It is not an operating agency, but a planning and coordinating agency. In furtherance of these objectives the Board resolves interagency issues, prescribes policy and program directives, obtains reports and information on the status of work in the various operating agencies and advises the President on the progress of the program. The Board under the chairmanship of Mr. Symington, is made up of the Cabinet Secretaries, except the Postmaster General and the Attorney General. The new Economic Stabilizer, Mr. Alan Valentine, and the Assistant to the President, W. Averell Harriman, also meet with the Board.

In World War II the policy of the Textile Workers and the CIO was complete cooperation with our Government. In cooperation with the War Labor Board, the War Production Board and the War Manpower Commission, labor became a vital part of the great national drive for superior military equipment. Along with the courage of our fighting forces, American working forces and American managers brought victory through the miracle of their production.

Labor knew then for what it was fighting, and labor knows now why it is of supreme importance to first make the defense of this country strong, and then keep it strong. Emile Rieve, as chairman of the CIO economic policy committee, is manifesting this conviction daily in his wise leadership of this most important economic arm of the CIO.

Labor understands the necessity for the Marshall plan and has supported it in a most practical manner. It has assigned dozens of its best personnel to full-time duties with the Economic Cooperation Administration. It has sent many of its top officials to Europe to give encouragement and guidance to the leaders of democratic labor movements. It has raised and contributed millions of dollars in direct assistance to democratic peoples abroad. Through the organization of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, all major sections of the American trade-union movement have established a friendly and working relationship with the free-trade unions of the world.

Labor, better than any other group in our society, understands the character, or better, the lack of character of our enemies—for labor has come to grips in a practical manner with the spokesman of red reaction, and has democratically defeated their obvious purpose of destroying free trade—unionism—at every opportunity. Labor knows only too well that free-trade unions and communism are incompatible. It knows that wherever the Communists have gained power, free-trade unions have been destroyed, and their leaders jailed or murdered. In place of the independent democratic unions, in Russia a new type of political company union has been created—a tool of the police state. Such a concept is a far cry from the freedom and independence of the labor movement in America.

We have demonstrated time and again, the enormous resources and vitality of our free society. In World War II we astonished the world and ourselves by our vast production without sacrificing any of our basic liberties. Since then, our rate of growth has exceeded our most optimistic expectations.

Today, spurred by a greater menace than we have ever faced, we must surpass every previous record. I am certain that we, as a people, working together, can build the strength needed to establish a just and durable peace. I am convinced that labor, as always in the past, is prepared to pull its full share of this load.

Taxing Excess Profits

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HENRY D. LARCADE, JR.
OF LOUISIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, November 27, 1950

Mr. LARCADE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I wish to submit an editorial published in the New Orleans States of November 24, 1950, as follows:

TAXING EXCESS PROFITS

In theory, a hefty tax on excess profits sounds fair and flawless. A doctrine universally approved is that no one should be allowed to make a profit out of war, because profits for some, and death, grief, terrible suffering and privation for others, just doesn't make sense.

In practice, the recapture of a big share of excessive profits in taxes, say 75 to 85 percent, is something else. Some of the tax authorities in Washington are reminding us of the difficulties. And some among these approve in theory a stiff tax on this portion of corporate income.

When the tax is steep, the corporation earning a big profit will find ways of spending it in preference to paying it over to the Government. That is human nature. Taxes are not relished any more by the corporate fat cats than they are by the scrawny wage-earner who sees a bite taken out of his pay envelope.

Therefore, steep taxes on excess profits means excessive spending to beat the tax collector; that in turn means inflationary pressure on prices and on wages. Corporations will resort to illogical expenditures, will voluntarily increase wages and increase other costs, merely to cut down the tax bill, even if the revenue is direly needed for the prosecution of a war for the preservation of the profit-and-loss system.

The logical way it seems to us is, first to place rigid controls on prices and wages; next to restrict inflationary spending; and then levy the lug on the excess profits. But few would want to adopt such extreme measures as the national economy and the military demands now stand.

Aid to Medical Colleges

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ANDREW J. BIEMILLER
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, November 27, 1950

Mr. BIEMILLER. Mr. Speaker, the American Medical Association continues its stubborn opposition to Federal aid to medical colleges. It pretends that only a handful of those it chooses to call radicals favor this legislation. Actually there is widespread support among people of varying degrees of political thought and from all walks of life in support of this legislation.

I am inserting an editorial from the Orangeburg (S. C.) Times and Democrat, which gives the views of the Honorable James F. Byrnes on the need for more doctors. The moment anyone talks about training more doctors, particularly with the use of Federal funds, the AMA always hollers "socialized medicine."

No one in America wants socialized medicine, but if the present leadership of the AMA continues its opposition to even such mild reforms as aid to medical colleges, we may wind up with socialized medicine in spite of ourselves. It is high time the doctors came forward with some constructive support.

BYRNES SAYS WE NEED MORE DOCTORS

Governor-elect James F. Byrnes, speaking in Charleston recently, told the board of trustees of the Medical College of the State of South Carolina that he has been fighting socialized medicine all his life, but he warned that "if the doctors do not get their own house in order, and if we don't train enough doctors so that competition exists among doctors, then the fight against socialized medicine may be lost."

We quote Mr. Byrnes, in using the term "socialized medicine." Nobody has yet defined what constitutes socialized medicine and what does not. It is something of an epithet that has been bandied around the Nation to frighten the people of this country and to preserve the present economic fortune of the medical profession.

Mr. Byrnes calls attention to the lack of doctors in rural areas and the custom of young doctors to move into small towns. The obvious fact is that doctors, like other Americans, are locating where financial returns are greatest. This is an entirely human procedure which subjects no young doctor to criticism. If financial remunerations are insufficient to attract doctors to rural areas, then society, acting through its government, must do something to subsidize doctors in such areas.

We were interested in the statement of Dr. Kenneth M. Lynch, president of the medical college, who admits that "an obstructionist" attitude has existed in the past about the number of medical students being trained. Our only inference from this statement is that the doctor is conscious of a deliberate effort to limit the number of doctors and medical experts in the country. He asserts, however, that the board of trustees are in favor of training as many students as possible.

Gov. J. Strom Thurmond, ex-officio chairman of the board, said that "it is sad that hundreds of students every year who want to enter the medical college cannot because of a lack of facilities for training." Some two hundred men are turned down by the college each year for this reason and the Governor admits that "it hurts my soul and I think something ought to be done about it."

Governor-elect Byrnes warned the doctors that they have "a great deal to do to put their own house in order." He adds that "if the doctors don't get competition" they are going to run into trouble and suggests that "the medical association, or somebody, ought to do something about the situation."

We have little comment to make upon the above declarations, which seem to speak for themselves. We admit, however, that we have not swallowed the propaganda put out by the American Medical Association which has sought to persuade the people of this country that any effort to provide adequate care for the population of this country will be socialized medicine.

The doctors of the country have rendered a great service to the people of the nation in the field of medical research and treatment. They are experts in this line and we think that sensible people should follow their advice in connection with medical matters.

This observation does not apply, however, to the economic problem of paying for medical services. Upon this subject, the doctors know no more than anybody else. Moreover, the people of the Nation have the right to provide, by public funds, adequate medical treatment for that percentage of the population that is unable to secure adequate medical care.

Of course, nobody pretends that every man, woman, and child in the United States receives the benefit of modern medical science and adequate medical attention. In fact, very few people do.

Memorandum to Our United States Senators and Congressmen

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. E. C. GATHINGS
OF ARKANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, November 27, 1950

Mr. GATHINGS. Mr. Speaker, controls on commodities and wages is one of the most serious concerns of the American people. Under the 1950 control legislation, ceiling prices cannot be invoked on commodities without also applying the same to wages. The recommendations of the Arkansas Wholesale Grocers' Association generally appear to be plausible, reasonable, and profitable. It was unequivocally the intention of both Houses of Congress that price controls and wage controls should be tied together. According to the association's statement, it has been rumored that a loophole is being sought by officials of the Government to impose controls on commodities and permit the price of labor to go uncontrolled. When this legislation was before the House, great care was made to leave no doubt in the minds of anyone that both prices and labor should be controlled alike.

I know of no action that could be taken at this time that would be as inflationary, detrimental and calamitous to the public interest than to permit wages to advance and at the same time hold the price of commodities down.

The officials charged with the responsibility of administering the control program should be interested in protecting the American economy and not in building up a mammoth agency to continue to harass the citizen with controls after the emergency is over. When the emergency is ended, controls, too, should end.

Only those who believe in, and subscribe to, the American system of free enterprise should be called upon to administer the Defense Act of 1950. The full text of the recommendations drafted by Mr. William L. Humphries, secretary-treasurer of the Arkansas Wholesale Grocers' Association, Inc., in Little Rock, Ark., is as follows:

MEMORANDUM TO OUR UNITED STATES SENATORS AND CONGRESSMEN FROM ARKANSAS IN ORDER THAT THEY MAY HAVE THE BENEFIT OF THE THINKING OF MEMBERS OF THE FOOD INDUSTRY ON IMPORTANT LEGISLATION WITH WHICH THEY WILL BE CONFRONTED

1. The members of the food industry of Arkansas fully endorse the program of full military preparedness due to the present world situation.

2. The industry, however, realizes the placing of a military preparedness program on top of our normal economy will create an overabundance of buying power coupled with an inflationary trend and will, in addition, create a serious dislocation of a normal distribution of merchandise.

3. The Arkansas Wholesale Grocers' Association is for workable wage and price controls at all levels.

4. We are normally against controls. We believe in the freedom of the people and are against Government regimentation in any form. We recognize, however, that because of the present emergency we will have to give up temporarily some of our liberties. The demand on our manpower and material resources may be so great as to require controls for an equitable distribution of merchandise, and to halt the advancing wage and price spiral that threatens destruction.

5. We are told by competent observers of the Washington scene that the Administration is seeking a loophole in the Defense Act of 1950 in order to circumvent the tying of price controls with wage controls. The members of the food industry in Arkansas know that in order to have price control we must have wage control. We believe the intent of Congress to tie the two together should be strictly followed.

6. We oppose any controls that will not work. We believe the taxpayer will rebel at supporting control agencies if they do not have a workable control. If we have to have controls we must have controls that will cover everyone. We believe the people will support this type of controls and this type only.

7. Since food is a primary requisite for a healthy nation and more of the consuming money is spent for food than any other item we, as members of the Arkansas food industry, feel that we are particularly concerned with the Government's efforts to allocate and price control our American business life. We seek classification of the food industry through the wholesale level as essential to the war effort.

8. In the light of our experiences during the controls of World War II we have certain ideas as to controls which we feel should be given a sincere study by those responsible for authorizing the controls and for their creation.

9. We believe that roll-backs are impossible without accompanying subsidies. We unalterably oppose both roll-backs and subsidies.

10. We believe that the Government wasted much manpower during World War II due to the multiplicity of control authorities.

11. We believe that simple controls not dominated by lawyers will be most successful.

12. We believe that quick redress from inequities is a prime necessity for effective controls. We believe that members of the various industries subject to control with a practical knowledge of the particular industry can best administer the controls and can correct inequities most quickly.

13. We believe that controls should not dislocate the normal distribution of merchandise. It takes practical experience to fully understand what is normal to a particular industry.

14. We believe that in most instances a ceiling price on the manufacturer with a percentage mark-up for the various distributors is the most practical method of controls. This method is not practical for the restaurant industry. The restaurant industry asks that in the event their material and wage cost are increased that they be permitted to increase their selling prices in the same proportion.

15. We believe that controls which are unpopular or unworkable will result in a tremendous black market and a breakdown of law and order.

16. It is our position that the bureaus handling controls should be staffed by men who believe in a free economy and are willing to surrender their authority at the earliest possible moment after they have served their purpose.

17. We believe that patriotic members of the various industries will willingly serve to make controls workable and acceptable to the American people if given a proper part in the control program. We particularly stress that members of the industry should have a strong voice on policy and procedure, as well as the actual writing of the control orders.

18. We wish to emphasize some of the more objectionable features of controls used in World War II which should not be permitted to occur under any new controls.

19. Controversial language: Control regulations should be written in plain language so that the average citizen can understand them. OPA employed a great number of lawyers to interpret its regulations for OPA officials. We cannot expect a merchant to correctly interpret regulations written in legal phrasing.

20. Rulings which are enforced retroactive: Merchants should not be liable for actions made in good faith prior to interpretations and rulings by the control boards.

21. Kangaroo courts: The American government is a government of checks and balances. The control agencies should not make the rules, interpret the rules and prosecute and judge. This is against American democracy.

22. Intent: The intent of a merchant who has infringed under any new control laws should have great weight in judging his case. Many errors occur under bureaucratic control when the intent of the seller is to abide by all regulations. We wish to emphasize that intent should be given great consideration.

23. Enforcement: We believe that much effort in the past was wasted in enforcing trivial violations. We believe in strict and good enforcement aimed primarily at the willful big black and gray market operators. If the large black and gray operators are permitted to operate without stern measures, many legitimate operators will be forced out of business.

24. In conclusion, we wish to state that we are willing to make any necessary sacrifices to place our Government in a sound position. In turn, we ask that the Government refrain from using the present emergency to advance its social program—operate on a balanced budget—eliminate unnecessary stock-piling of labor, and, when the emergency is over eliminate all controls and shackles that are contrary to the American system as soon as possible.

WILLIAM L. HUMPHRIES,
Secretary-Treasurer, Arkansas Wholesale Grocers' Association.

The People Express an Opinion

OF
HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, November 27, 1950

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, from the Allegan Gazette of November 2, published at Allegan, Mich., comes an editorial written by Leo W. Hoffman, which conscientiously stated some of the issues on which the people expressed an opinion. The editorial is as follows:

IN OUR OPINION A VOTE FOR FREEDOM

Next Tuesday, November 7, you will have the opportunity to help perpetuate freedom in America.

Your vote can be as potent a weapon in this battle for freedom as any muzzle-loader carried by your forefathers.

Your vote, this year, and in the next few elections, may well determine America's destiny.

Any vote cast for a Democratic candidate is a vote for an evil and corrupt clique—and any failure to vote is an admission that you don't care what happens to your native land.

For 20 years the Democratic Party has been in control.

Prior to 1930 Democrats were traditionally loyal to America. The party was respected as an American institution, and radicals, labor bosses, and crooks had no voice in its councils.

In 20 years the character of this party has changed. Communists, like Alger Hiss and Lee Pressman, have acted as Presidential advisers. Sidney Hillman, recognized as the leader of virtually all radical elements, was strong enough to dictate the nomination as Vice President of Harry Truman. Labor bosses have written our labor laws, approved by a rubber-stamp Congress. Communists have gained positions of trust in the Government, and spies have had a free hand in the theft of military secrets. And who dictated our Asiatic foreign policy?

Roosevelt became an easy mark for Harvard graduates foisted on him by Justice Frankfurter, and it is now history that many were Communists. Such men had more influence than real Democrats. Men like Glass and BYRD of Virginia, Garner of Texas, Hull of Tennessee, Byrnes of North Carolina, and Smith and Farley of New York were repudiated and labeled "turncoats" and "isolationists."

The advice of Henry Wallace, Sidney Hillman, Lee Pressman, Alger Hiss, Owen Lattimore, Rex Tugwell, and Dean Acheson was preferred.

Prior to these fateful 20 years Soviet Russia had gone without diplomatic recognition from four Presidents. Knowing the Communists for what they were, they harkened to the words of Lenin: "As long as capitalism and socialism remain we cannot live in peace. In the end one or the other will triumph—a funeral requiem will be sung either over Soviet Russia or over world capitalism. * * * We will have to use any ruses, dodges, tricks, cunning, unlawful methods, concealment, and veiling of the truth."

Those were the words of Lenin, and Russia's rulers have remained faithful to them—practicing murder, imprisonment, starvation, torture, blackmail, bribery and robbery to stifle opposition and destroy free governments throughout the world.

This was the Russia given diplomatic recognition by Roosevelt.

From then on, Communist influence increased everywhere. During and after the war, our Democratic leaders permitted Russia to gain control over all the Baltic countries, all Eastern Europe and all of China.

The Democratic Party became so corrupt it permitted Roosevelt to "barter" the lives of millions of Germans, Poles, Austrians, Slavs and Chinese. And the "four freedoms" became a hollow mockery.

Because of such policies—often determined by Communists—and contrary to the advice of old-time loyal Democrats, America today faces the choice of fighting a war of survival or allowing Red Russia to control the world.

What is the reason of 20 years of radical Democratic control?

What has the period brought us?

A 50-cent dollar and the possibility that, in another 20 years, it won't buy a pack of cigarettes or a candy bar.

Establishment of Russia as the most powerful government on earth.

A public debt of $250,000,000,000.

Destruction of the character of American people with cradle-to-grave benefits.

Taxes so high that most of us now work 4 months out of every year for the Government.

And it has also brought us to the very brink of extinction.

It is time to turn out of office those who, intentionally or through ignorance, have advanced the Communist cause. It is time to evict the Democrats, for they no longer have control of their own party.

What do you value most: Freedom for yourself and your children, or a temporary government handout that won't stretch to cover groceries?

Make your answer known next Tuesday.

Hon. Earl C. Michener

OF
HON. LOUIS E. GRAHAM
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, November 27, 1950

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Speaker, in the closing days of this session it is well that we pause in our deliberations to do honor to a number of distinguished Members of this House, whose service herein will terminate at the close of the session.

Naturally, one is peculiarly drawn to those with whom he has served in committee. For 12 years it has been my honor and pleasure to serve on the Committee on the Judiciary, and firm indeed have been the enduring friendships that I have formed with certain of the members.

I refer particularly to our able and distinguished colleague, EARL CORY MICHENER, who has so well represented the Second District of Michigan for the past 32 years with the exception of the 2 years of the Seventy-third Congress.

At the moment, there are only eight Members who have served longer in the House than he.

In that period he advanced to the chairmanship of the Committee on the Judiciary in the Eightieth Congress, and most exceptionally did he perform the duties of that high office. His record as committee chairman is one in which he can take justifiable pride.

Endowed with a splendid mind, enriched by a fine education, both in the liberal arts and the study of the law, and steeled by the experiences of the Spanish-American War, he entered in the House in the Sixty-sixth Congress, well equipped and amply prepared to carry out the difficult duties which were ahead. How well he performed those duties we can all attest.

Always kind, considerate, and helpful, many a Member is richer in service by reason of his thoughtfulness and kindly interest.

We who have known him intimately will treasure the memory of an able lawyer, a distinguished legislator, a patriotic American who unselfishly lived up to his highest ideals and leaves behind him a record that all may emulate and rejoice in the fact that he served his district, State, and Nation so well.

Farewell, good friend, and may your closing days be filled with precious memories of the good that you have done for your fellow man and for your beloved country.

Congress Must Find What We're Buying

OF
HON. ANGIER L. GOODWIN
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, November 27, 1950

Mr. GOODWIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks I include the following stimulating and timely article by George Minot from the Boston Sunday Herald of November 26:

CONGRESS MUST FIND WHAT WE'RE BUYING—GERMANS WON'T REARM, BRITISH WANT TO SPEND LESS, FRENCH RESIGNED

(By George Minot)

Secretary Acheson couldn't have made a more asinine remark had he really tried than he did when he hit at Republican "reexaminists." These persons—and he was sneering particularly at Senator TAFT—he likened to a farmer who pulls up his crops to see if they were growing. He added that he couldn't see any difference between this crowd and the old isolationists.

Notwithstanding this little lesson from the Secretary for whose hide Republicans and Democrats alike are howling and will probably get after the first of the year, there is a great deal in our foreign policy that must be reexamined—and quickly, too.

This little lame-duck session of Congress that gets under way tomorrow will have as its initial task the voting of from five to ten billion dollars more in taxes. Its Members must also make sure that they and the taxpayers know where the money goes.

Congress must find out what we are buying with our money. We have spent around $20,000,000,000 in Europe since the end of the war. In spite of Mr. Acheson, we should lose no time in reexamining what has happened to it. What have we got in return for it, if anything?

NOTHING DONE ABOUT REARMING EUROPE

It was more than a year and a half ago that 12 nations signed the North Atlantic Pact and agreed that "an armed attack against one or more of them in Europe or America shall be considered an attack against them all." Since then there has been a lot of talk, but little action, about the rearming of Europe.

Herbert Hoover told the Nation in a notable speech that military authorities had agreed Stalin could put 175 mobilized combat divisions on the European front within 90 days—that the potential enemy has 30,000 tanks, thousands of planes and the atom bomb—that the iron curtain states have large armies poised for action.

Mr. Hoover went on: "In contrast we are told that the European nations now in the North Atlantic Alliance do not have available to Europe more than 30 active combat divisions, with some air and naval power, with which to meet this horde from behind the iron curtain."

In the face of this, our European friends have been asking that we send additional American troops over there to protect them. They are demanding more money to build up their own budgets, military and otherwise. They have shown few if any signs of wanting to help themselves. If there have been any political resolutions to stand firm against the spread of communism it isn't evident over here.

FEELING IN FRANCE

The feeling in France is difficult to describe and even more difficult to understand. Perhaps because around 30 percent of continental Frenchmen are Communists, another war is almost taken for granted. Correspondents there report nobody seems concerned over that probability.

Instead, the French seem far more concerned over the possibility of Germans rearming than they do in building up their own army to fight communism. Even the most radical of the global do-gooders cannot deny the necessity of reexamining the European situation and finding out what has happened to the money we have already sent and whether it is necessary to send more. Or whether the stand of Mr. Hoover is not correct: "We should say, and at once, that we shall provide no more money until a definitely unified and sufficient European army is in sight."

There can't be any effective defense of Europe unless both France and Germany participate. The former is in the doldrums and the latter, by the overwhelming victory of the Socialists in last week's election shows it is opposed to rearmament as presently planned.

It is very late, and if defense armies are to be effective they must be formed now. A little while ago everybody had assumed the German people would jump to arms to protect themselves. Now it is obvious they won't. France still is fighting against any German participation in Europe's defense, and still is not interested in raising a larger army of its own.

You certainly can't reexamine that double talk soon enough.

Our founding fathers provided that the National House of Representatives be completely turned over every 2 years and a third of the Senate at the same time. That was so they could reexamine freshly what was going on. The lame-duck legislators should not merely think of adjourning for the holidays without doing some real work.

FEELING IN BRITAIN

They should look into the hesitancy that has gripped Britain. Last summer the British agreed to spend around $10,000,000,000 on their defense set-up in the next 3 years as a part of the common effort. Now the top Socialists who are running the country think the sum is too big.

They think it might overstrain Britain's domestic economy. They are afraid new sacrifices might make Britishers vote the wrong way, and the labor government hasn't much of a margin. They are wondering if the United States can't carry a bigger percentage of the load.

The British situation is one that TAFT specifically wants to look into freshly—and only a man like Acheson would sneer at the necessity of reexamining "all our policies and all our programs," not only to guard the interests of the American taxpayer but to protect our lives.

Acheson since has protested that his original remarks were misinterpreted, but his explanation had a hollow ring. Arthur Krock in the New York Times last Thursday came to the conclusion that the Secretary believes "reexamination" is all right if it meets his own limited definition. He believes, Krock continued, it is all right for the President and himself to reverse foreign policies, as they have done. But the Secretary believes it is all wrong, and another form of "isolationism," if Congress reexamines policies to decide, in the light of events and results, whether they should be fundamentally revised or reversed.

After the election the professed liberals voiced fear that the "isolationists" were back in the saddle and tears ran down their cheeks in fear that our "bipartisan" foreign policy might be endangered, another phony fear.

NOTHING BIPARTISAN

Since the illness of Senator VANDENBERG there has been nothing bipartisan about our foreign policy. Republicans simply were asked to approve a program after the global planners had thought it up.

There is considerable evidence that with the first of the year we are to have real bipartisanship, which means, in the words of Senator FERGUSON, VANDENBERG's colleague in Michigan, "constructive cooperation in formulation of policy as well as in its execution."

In this coming session you will see TAFT and VANDENBERG working closely together, if the latter's health permits him to work at all.

And you will see both demanding that future programs be submitted to Congress for examination before commitments are made to foreign governments. That will require a change in attitude from Secretary Acheson, if he is around.

REAL LEADERSHIP

We had real bipartisanship during the Republican Eightieth Congress, when VANDENBERG and Secretary Byrnes worked closely together.

It was during that Congress—the one so often attacked by Mr. Truman—that all our big foreign policies were formulated. That Republican Congress first approved the Marshall plan. It first adopted the Greek-Turkish aid program. It voted the Vandenberg resolution that was the idea behind the entire North Atlantic Pact.

The Democrats would tell you that all those countries abroad that are looking for our help—and that are so careful not to overstrain themselves—fear the United States is likely to lapse back into isolationism. That is nonsense.

Republicans ought to stop criticizing old policies of Secretary Acheson and President Truman and get behind the wheel in formulating new ones. But there is no reason why they shouldn't reexamine the whole foreign set-up in the meantime. If they got any mandate in the last election it was to do just that.

Food for Yugoslavia

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. HESELTON
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, November 27, 1950

Mr. HESELTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following copies of letters I have sent to Secretary of State Acheson:

NOVEMBER 27, 1950.

Hon. DEAN ACHESON,
Secretary of State,
State Department,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: On November 18 I wrote to you with reference to the request by Yugoslavia for $105,000,000 worth of food to relieve drought conditions there and urged an immediate and full investigation of the possibility of using some of the hundreds of millions of Government-owned surplus food commodities for that purpose.

I have received no acknowledgment of or reply to that letter.

Since then the Department of Agriculture has published the reports of its holdings of food as of September 30. The facts contained in the report reemphasize the vital importance of such an investigation in fairness to the American taxpayers who are paying increased taxes and who face even larger increases of taxation.

In the six kinds of edible foods I mentioned—butter, cheese, dried eggs and milk, edible dried beans and peas—the cost to the taxpayers increased $29,233,958.94 to $432,524,915.71.

The carrying charges had jumped in 1 month $2,598,759.87 to $5,949,788.

The six items by no means exhaust the possibilities of wholesome foods held in storage in huge quantities at indefensible waste of the taxpayers' earnings and savings.

Let me mention a few others:

	Amount	Lost
	Pounds
Rice	464, 387, 000	$2, 476, 278. 87
Turkeys	3, 905, 821	1, 671, 213. 25
Mexican canned meat	64, 466, 487	15, 524, 878. 95

I cannot believe that your failure to acknowledge my letter of the 18th means that you propose to ignore this possibility or that you are indifferent to the best interests of the American people upon whom the Federal Government has placed so heavy a burden of taxation. But, in view of the current reports as to the executive department's plans and operations in this matter of furnishing food to Yugoslavia, I submit that action upon this suggestion is imperatively needed.

I enclose a copy of my letter of the 18th.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN W. HESELTON.

NOVEMBER 18, 1950.

Hon. DEAN ACHESON,
Secretary of State,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I understand from press reports that Yugoslavia has requested approximately $105,000,000 worth of food to relieve drought conditions there. You have been quoted as saying that you would have to go to Congress for funds to carry out any such program.

May I call your attention to the fact that as of August 31 the Department of Agriculture had in storage 1,833,550,826 pounds of six kinds of edible foods—butter, cheese, dried eggs and milk, edible dried beans and peas—at a cost to the taxpayers of $403,290,956.77. The carrying charges on the storage of these food commodities had reached the staggering sum of $3,351,028.13 and is continuing at an unknown rate.

The Department of Agriculture has hoarded away millions more pounds of other food commodities which are doing no one any good, running the risk of spoilage and costing the taxpayers totally indefensible sums of hard-earned dollars.

I urge that you order an immediate and full investigation as to how much of these surplus foods can be transferred to any program you are developing to aid Yugoslavia. I am certain that you will agree with me that the overburdened taxpayers are entitled to this much consideration in connection with any recommendation you submit to Congress when it reconvenes.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN W. HESELTON.

Know Your Waterways

OF

HON. HENRY D. LARCADE, JR.

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, November 27, 1950

Mr. LARCADE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to submit an article by the Marine News of New York, published in the Washington Post of August 25, 1950, as follows:

KNOW YOUR WATERWAYS

To the EDITOR OF THE WASHINGTON POST:

The editorial, Rivers-Harbors Forever, in your August 6 issue, has just come to our attention.

We do not presume the judgment to pass on the Nation's needs with respect to electric power, flood control, and upstream river development. We do feel qualified to publicize the value of harbor and channel improvements. We disagree wholly with your statement, when applied to such improvements, that there has been utterly no selectivity in the congressional approach to the bill. Procedure leading to authorization sometimes lasts for years. More than half of the proposed projects are finally disapproved.

A waterway system, like railways and highways, requires some continuous expansion and development when integration for maximum benefits and economical use is the constant goal. Maintenance also is necessary.

On March 29 we began publishing some educational articles in your paper and others titled "Know Your Waterways." The subhead of the March article is "The pork-barrel myth." We suggest that you read it; it deals largely with selectivity. Subhead of an article published on August 1 is "Only 6 percent of a total." This 6 percent, or only some $46,000,000, is the amount included for new work on coast and Great Lakes harbors and channels in the $731,546,000 total reported by the Senate Appropriations Committee in chapter IX of the general appropriation bill, 1951, for rivers and harbors and flood control, not for rivers and harbors only, as the editorial states.

Unawareness of their indispensability is responsible for much of the hostile criticism of harbor and channel improvements. A great part of America's commerce and all of its defense is vitally linked to waterways.

MARINE NEWS,
GEORGE H. PALMER,
President and Publisher.

The Mandate of the People

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. NORRIS POULSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, November 27, 1950

Mr. POULSON. Mr. Speaker, I am inserting in the RECORD an editorial dated November 10, 1950, taken from the Tidings, the official weekly newspaper of the archdiocese of Los Angeles. In my opinion this is one of the best editorials I have seen analyzing the recent election results. I commend it for your reading:

THE MANDATE OF THE PEOPLE

America girds itself with new resolution and strength. Over the land, up from the grass roots, in the reserves of common sense of the body politic has surged the unmistakable rebuke to a clamorous cabal, whose strident mouthings over the past decade prevailed, in the councils of a great political party, over the call of Christian conscience and the voice of the American past. There is no other meaning to be garnered from the sweep of the election returns.

This cabal attached itself as a parasite to the Democratic Party at the moment of its greatest opportunity. It was in a time of uneasiness, with the Nation in the throes of economic depression writhing in the shackles it had forged, that the noisy group deflected by artful propaganda the steady gaze of our leaders from the wellsprings of strength and focused attention on a monstrous evil which hitherto we had scorned. It is a long, sad story, but we read it well today to our sorrow.

This is what the electorate remembered: a government brashly encouraging the genius of technicians of free enterprise to perfect the industrial might of an enemy, which despite protestations of friendship, was vowed to our destruction; our professors heralding the excellence of this tyranny over our vaunted freedom, our journals of opinion coloring the news to gloss over Communist excesses, our statesmen and diplomats in undignified social contact, squadering the faith and freedom of Christian men over half the world for a mess of Soviet pottage, a collective lunacy aided and abetted by agencies in Washington which lulled the people into deepening aparity and failed to discern the web that was slowly being spun around us.

This was the political mood of the moment: The conscience of the people was troubled anew with the perfidy to our friends at Yalta, at Tehran and Potsdam. The deception of the State Department that the Chinese Communists were merely agrarian reformers rankled again with the news that 60,000 volunteeers had momentarily turned the tide of freedom in North Korea.

Remembered, too, was the vacant stare, the glib assurance, the outraged hurt, the careless dismissal of well-founded suspicions of Communist infiltration in the higher echelons of government, and Senator TYDINGS has his reward for underestimating the intelligence of the American people. And always and everywhere was the mounting concern that the State Department had rescued little from the debacle, surely not its self-respect, and only awaited a friendly Soviet word or gesture to be off again in the mad whirl.

This is the mandate of the American people to the new Congress: no matter what promises of amendment of way, no matter what avowals of friendship, no matter what overtures for understanding, no matter Litvinov's platoon of peace, no matter even years of profession of fidelity, we shall never again be fooled into acceptance of something evil, that must of necessity, of its very nature, focus all its thinking upon evil and pattern all its action toward evil, something dedicated by its philosophy to the evil of denial of God, to the rejection of man's God-given rights, and the destruction of our beloved America and the freedom-loving nations of the world.

It is because Mrs. DOUGLAS could not disown the words she spoke at Columbia University on January 14, 1946, and elsewhere and at other times, that with the assurance of peace Soviet Russia "will become the great world citizen she is capable of being," it is because up until recently she viewed this evil thing with steady sympathy and tolerance, that she along with Mr. Roosevelt have been relegated by the voters of California to political oblivion.

The Collapse of Postal Service

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, November 27, 1950

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, from the Sturgis Journal, published at Sturgis, Mich., by Mark P. Haines, permit me to quote an editorial which might well be given consideration by the administration:

THE COLLAPSE OF POSTAL SERVICE

The service rendered by the United States Post Office Department seems to have all but collapsed.

Is there any excuse for the deplorable condition into which this Government-operated business has degenerated?

Recently the Journal had occasion to order some supplies from a firm in New York City. It took 10 days from the time this shipment left New York until it was delivered in Sturgis. The old stage coaches would have done almost as well.

Is it possible that the Post Office Department is staging a deliberate slow-down in order to force bigger appropriations out of Congress?

The fault does not seem to be so much in local post office personnel as it does in the railway mail service. Air mail seems to function with great efficiency, but there is something decidedly wrong with ground transportation facilities.

Congress may be impelled to look into this in the near future. Suspicion that postal service could be markedly better with the funds actually appropriated by Congress is becoming widespread.

As has been remarked the discontinuance of directory service in post offices, except on special delivery and registered mail, is ridiculous in view of the fact that as many as 10

postal employees may handle a piece of mail being returned to the sender because the Postmaster General in Washington pleads lack of funds for one employee to consult a city directory.

Printers' Ink magazine remarks that "Selective Service wrote to a young waiter in the Advertising Club of New York ordering him to show up on September 12 for a discussion about possibly military service." He received the official notice 5 days late, on September 17. "While he was worrying about what to do," the magazine reports, "an FBI man appeared, asked him how come and wasn't at all convinced by his story about the delayed summons." Fortunately the frightened 21-year-old was able to recover the envelope with a New York September 17 postmark. "Yet," Printers' Ink remarks, "when people holler about Postmaster General Donaldson's ruthless reduction of postal service they are accused of picking on him."

Reduction of home deliveries of mail to one a day may be justifiable. Few, if any, householders are complaining seriously about that. But, on the whole, postal service is becoming unreliable and it is the duty of the Postmaster General to prove that the funds are insufficient or see to it that service is improved.

"Not snow nor rain nor heat nor gloom of night," is inscribed on the main post office in New York City, "stays these couriers from the swift completion of their appointed rounds." High postal service morale reflected in good service to the public is an old tradition.

Reluctantly many Americans are beginning to wonder whether good service is being sacrificed now to generate a public revolt against what appears to be relatively modest postal economy voted by Congress.

"No Place for Small Business," Symington

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRED L. CRAWFORD
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, November 27, 1950

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, it is a fact that many units of small industry, or small business throughout this country are now suffering and many more will suffer as a result of the defense program.

In the hope that some of this economic difficulty may be eliminated, I am presenting for the RECORD some observations made by Mr. George J. Burger, vice president of the National Federation of Independent Business:

"NO PLACE FOR SMALL BUSINESS," SYMINGTON

All indications are that direction of the business end of the Nation's war mobilization program is being turned over more and more to giant enterprise.

At best, so the signs are, small business is very much in danger of being shoved into a distant, relatively inconsequential back seat.

This is the opinion of many competent Washington observers long familiar with the inner workings of Government.

The tip-off, they say, came recently when W. Stuart Symington, National Security Resources Board chairman, appointed members of his Committee on Economic Mobilization.

The function of this committee is to consult with Mr. Symington and NSRB on all policies drawn to gear our Nation, and every segment of it, to the defense task ahead.

To this committee, as representatives of the whole business fraternity, Mr. Symington appointed men from the National Association of Manufacturers, the Chamber of Commerce, and the Committee for Economic Development.

Neither NAM nor the chamber have ever fought for any proposal not promising at least equal benefits for both large and small business, and they have always sided with big business when its interests conflicted with small business. The CED has steered a more moderate course. But it hasn't even gone out on a limb for small business.

When asked by the Senate Small Business Committee why he had failed to appoint an actual small-business-organization man on his committee to represent small business, Mr. Symington said:

1. "I believe that the business members of our committee from the Council for Economic Development, Chamber of Commerce, and National Association of Manufacturers provide representation for small business appropriate to the problems of the committee."

2. "Since the Committee on Mobilization Policy will deal only with the broad mobilization problems affecting the major segments of the national economy, it is important that the membership be representative of those large groups."

In short, small business is definitely secondary as far as the Nation's top war mobilizer is concerned.

All this in face of the Eightieth Congress' Senate Concurrent Resolution 14, requiring that small business be given equal representation with big business, labor, and agriculture, in all departments and agencies. All this in fact of the Eighty-first Congress' Defense Production Act of 1950, requiring that small business be given fair representation on all advisory committees appointed for the purpose of consultation "in the formulation of rules, regulations, or orders" issued under the act.

But, Mr. Symington says generously, he is very agreeable to the appointment of actual small business representatives to advisory committees in the next lower ranking defense agencies, such as in the National Production Authority and the Office of Economic Stabilizer.

In other words, small business may have a voice in deciding whether the execution is to be accomplished by hanging, electrocution, or the gas chamber. But it may say nothing about the decision to execute.

Continuing Waste in Time of War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. HESELTON
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, November 27, 1950

Mr. HESELTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following analysis of the surplus-food operations through September 30.

It is incredible that with this country at war any Federal agency would continue its indifferent attitude toward the waste of the American taxpayers' money. But an examination of the September report as to the inventory cost and purchases in the Department of Agriculture's food-hoarding program establishes that fact.

The following are the figures given in the Commodity Credit Corporation report of September 30 as to only six such items:

	Cost of inventory June 30	Purchases through Sept. 30	Total
Butter	$99,452,285.99	$26,410,075.73	$125,862,361.72
Cheese	19,706,623.64	19,376,995.68	39,083,619.32
Dried milk	45,718,460.06	13,490,314.97	59,208,775.03
Dried eggs	103,290,365.96	21,007,762.80	124,298,128.76
Dried beans	79,689,881.33	1,187,055.97	80,876,937.30
Dried peas	3,191,320.56	3,773.02	3,195,093.58
Total			432,524,915.71

The losses on these six items as stated in the report were:

Butter	$9,089,759.79
Cheese	2,592,011.06
Dried milk	6,405,485.01
Dried eggs	7,180,362.22
Dried peas	195,249.01
Dried beans	1,435,861.18
Total	26,898,728.27

Beyond that the Department paid out just to hoard these foods in warehouses between June 30 and September 30 the following:

Butter	$1,259,783.65
Cheese	850,499.44
Dried milk	1,353,300.45
Dried eggs	746,734.91
Dried peas	264,156.72
Total	5,949,788.00

These facts constitute an indictment of the executive head of any such agency. They convict Secretary Brannan of extravagent mismanagement and inexcusable disregard of the best interests of the American people. He should resign and the President should appoint some qualified person to head the Department who would cooperate with Congress in working out promptly a sound agricultural program. In any event, I hope that the House Committee on Agriculture will schedule immediate hearings to examine the full facts as to these surplus foods and to recommend the changes that are so obviously and desperately needed.

Needed: Labor Statesmanship

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAY LeFEVRE
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, November 27, 1950

Mr. LEFEVRE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an editorial which appeared in yesterday's New York Herald Tribune.

Mr. Speaker, I think the editorial really hits the nail on the head. For years in my own district I have felt that I had the support of the rank and file of labor. Conversations with members of unions, when the Taft-Hartley Act was a hot issue, assured me that a majority of the workers resented the tactics used by their leaders. Election results proved that the workingmen were not accepting the dictates of their leaders.

This year's election, especially the Ohio landslide for Senator TAFT, is a mandate to the labor leaders to alert themselves to a new and constructive program. All Americans are facing tremendous responsibilities. It means the cooperation of all the segments of our economy. Let us face the facts and cut out all petty selfish interests.

The anti-Taft-Hartley Act propaganda of the Congress of Industrial Organizations and the resolution passed at its national convention last week pledging continuance of the fight to repeal the law would be merely ludicrous if they did not betray such poverty of labor leadership. There were not enough industrialists determined to destroy labor unions in Ohio to give Senator TAFT his 430,000 plurality. The votes that reelected him were obviously from a cross-section of the population, including workers and union members. This was true in other election day upsets. If the labor leaders will really read the election returns they will recognize the futility of a campaign to repeal the Taft-Hartley Act.

Despite the mumbo-jumbo which labor spokesmen have mouthed since passage of the law, its terms and the protections it offers to the workers are beginning to be understood and appreciated by the rank and file in the labor unions. A constructive labor leadership would come forward now with a program for remedying those parts of the law which such friendly critics as Senators IVES and DOUGLAS agree should be amended. Above all, they would suggest a better solution for national emergency strikes than is provided in the law. The latter becomes especially important as inflationary pressures increase and we move into an accelerated national defense program.

Universal Military Training

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDITH NOURSE ROGERS
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, November 27, 1950

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter and circulars:

THE AMERICAN LEGION,
Indianapolis, Ind., November 20, 1950.

Hon. EDITH NOURSE ROGERS,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSWOMAN ROGERS: A permanent plan of military training is inevitable. Will it be the Old World method of conscription or the democratic plan of universal military training?

There are suggestions in the press and over the radio that a permanent draft (conscription) called universal military service designed to take the place of the present draft and of UMT is being advocated. This is causing considerable confusion in the minds of our people. This new idea of a permanent draft (conscription) should be carefully considered in light of the opinions of our military and civilian leaders.

Gen. George C. Marshall, Chief of Staff, in August 1944, issued a directive which contained the "General principles of national military policy to govern preparations of postwar plans." Remember World War II had not then ended. He outlined plans through which the manpower of the Nation might be developed.

General Eisenhower, while Chief of Staff, on April 24, 1946, in Circular 119, outlined the General Principles Governing Preparation of Postwar Plans. He directed attention to General Marshall's ideas as expressed in Circular 347, above mentioned, and quoted several paragraphs therefrom, for the purpose of emphasis.

The relevant portions of these two official statements are enclosed in your folder.

The expressions of these two great Americans have been the basis of the Legion's program on universal military training. On behalf of the 3,000,000 members of the Legion, I urge that your actions be guided by this thinking.

Sincerely,

ERLE COCKE, Jr.,
National Commander.

ORGANIZATION AND TRAINING

GENERAL PRINCIPLES GOVERNING PREPARATION OF POSTWAR PLANS

3. Fundamental structure of a sound Military Establishment: There are certain trends in warfare which have developed to the extent that they may properly be accepted as existing factors. The knowledge now available to all nations has provided practicable solutions for reducing the efficacy of distance, weather, and geographical features as military obstacles. This fact has created a capability for sudden attack that cannot be safely ignored in military planning. The fearfully destructive power of the most modern missiles, the economic capabilities to produce them by even the small nations, and the practicability of employing them against targets hundreds of miles distant without the progressive advance of large masses of sea and land forces have made it possible for any country possessed of scientific resources and ruthless purposes to inflict devastating blows against the most powerful nations. Since such missiles can be discharged from small, well concealed, and widely dispersed installations, it is probable that their effectiveness will continue practically unimpaired until ground forces have worked their way forward and seized or destroyed stockpiles, productive capacity, and the launching sites. These developments, together with the current ineffectiveness of the passive defense, indicate the importance of having the necessary strength in being to counter successfully a sneak attack and immediately act to wrest from the aggressor that initiative of action so decisive at the outbreak of hostilities. The ever multiplying complexities of the world's economy increase the probability that any war of the future will eventually extend to global proportions. To insure the readiness of reinforcements as required by a developing world war and of replacements for the heavy casualties to be expected in modern conflict, it is necessary to maintain a large reserve over and above the forces constituting strength in being. Such a reserve may be maintained in varying degrees of organization and training so long as there is assurance that its organizations and individuals would become progressively available as required. As a guide in all planning, it will be considered as essential that the fundamental structure of the Military Establishment include:

(a) Forces constituting strength in being: Forces of adequate size and composition to constitute in actuality strength in being.

(b) The reserve: A reserve of organizations and individuals so organized and trained that they would become progressively available as needed to meet the requirements of an expanding war.

4. Types of military organizations: The two general types of military organizations through which the manpower of a nation may be developed are discussed in section III, War Department Circular 347, 1944. The discussion sets forth in unmistakable language the official views of the War Department on the subject. In the first type of military organization, such as previously existed in Germany and Japan, the men of a nation are conscripted into the army for service in the lower grades. The function of the common citizen is ordinarily to be a private soldier or, at most, a noncommissioned officer in war. "Under such a system only the brawn of a people is prepared for war, there being no adequate provision for developing the latent military leadership and genius of the people as a whole. It, therefore, has no place among the institutions of a modern democratic state based upon the conception of a government by the people." Paragraph 2 (b) (3) of the cited section directs that "the basis for all plans for a postwar peace establishment" will be the second type of military organization:

"Based upon the conception of a professional peace establishment (no larger than necessary to meet normal peacetime requirements) to be reinforced in time of emergency by organized units drawn from a citizen army reserve, effectively organized for this purpose in time of peace, with full opportunity for competent citizen soldiers to acquire practical experience through temporary active service and to rise by successive steps to any rank for which they can definitely qualify; and with specific facilities for such practical experience, qualification, and advancement definitely organized as essential and predominating characteristics of the peace establishment."

The foregoing directive is repeated for purposes of emphasis. It is further directed that all officers familiarize themselves with the complete text of section III, War Department Circular 347, 1944.

Washington, D. C., August 25, 1944.

III. Military establishment. 1. Preliminary assumptions: (a) It is assumed that for some time after the defeat of the Axis Powers the United States will maintain such temporary military forces, in cooperation with its Allies, as may be necessary in order to lay the foundations for a peaceful world order. The plans for a permanent peace establishment, referred to in this circular, relate to a later period when the future world order can be envisaged.

(b) It is also assumed, for purposes of planning, that the Congress will enact (as the essential foundation of an effective national military organization) that every able-bodied young American shall be trained to defend his country; and that for a reasonable period after his training (unless he volunteers for service in the Regular Establishment of the Armed Forces) he shall be incorporated in a reserve all, or any necessary part of which, shall be subject to active military duty in the event of an emergency requiring reinforcement of the Regular Army.

2. Types of military organization: There are two types of military organization through which the manpower of a nation may be developed.

(a) (1) One of these is the standing-army type. In this type, the men of the nation are drawn into the Army to serve in the lower grades. The function of the common citizen is ordinarily to be a private soldier or, at most, a noncommissioned officer in war. Reserve officers are drawn from the better-educated classes but are generally employed in the lower grades and in subordinate capacities. Under this system, leadership in war and the control of military preparations and policy in peacetime are concentrated largely and necessarily in a special class or caste of professional soldiers.

(2) This is the system of Germany and Japan. It produces highly efficient armies. But it is open to serious political objections. In a nation maintaining such a system, intelligent opinion as to military policy (and the international political policy associated therewith) is concentrated in a special class. Under such a system, the people themselves are competent to exert only a limited intelligent influence on the issues of war and peace. Under such a system only the brawn of a people is prepared for war, there being no adequate provision for developing the latent military leadership and genius of the people as a whole. It therefore has no place among the institutions of a modern democratic state based upon the conception of government by the people.

(b) (1) The second type of military institution through which the national manpower can be developed is based upon the conception of a professional peace establishment (no larger than necessary to meet normal peacetime requirements) to be reinforced in time of emergency by organized units drawn from a citizen army reserve, effectively organized for this purpose in time of peace; with full opportunity for competent citizen soldiers to acquire practical experience through temporary active service and to rise by successive steps to any rank for which they can definitely qualify; and with specific facilities for such practical experience, qualification, and advancement definitely organized as essential and predominating characteristics of the peace establishment.

(2) An army of this type has, among others, the following advantages:

(a) First. While, as in all effective military systems, the efficiency of this system depends primarily upon expert professional control, its leadership is not exclusively concentrated in a professional soldier class. All citizen soldiers after their initial training are encouraged to develop their capacity for leadership to such an extent as may be consistent with their abilities, their tastes, and their civil obligations.

(b) Second. As a great majority of the leaders of the war army are included in the civil population in time of peace, an intelligent and widespread public opinion is provided as the basis for the determination of all public questions relating to military affairs.

(c) Third. As with a properly organized citizen army reserve, no officers or men need be maintained in the regular army to perform duties which can be performed effectively and in time by reserve officers and reservists, the dimensions and cost of the peace establishment, under such a system, are necessarily reduced to a determinable minimum.

(d) And finally, as all our great wars have been fought in the main by citizen armies, the proposal for an organized citizen army reserve in time of peace is merely a proposal for perfecting a traditional national institution to meet modern requirements which no longer permit extemporization after the outbreak of war. This is the type of army which President Washington proposed to the First Congress as one of the essential foundations of the new American Republic. This is the type of army which, in the absence of effective peacetime organization, had to be extemporized to meet our needs in World War I and World War II.

(3) Details of military organization change with changes in weapons, modes of transportation, and international relations. But the type of our military institutions was determined in the beginning by the form of our Government and has not changed since Washington's administration. It will therefore be made the basis for all plans for a postwar peace establishment.

Chief of Staff.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, November 27, 1950

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include the following splendid editorial entitled "Merchants of Misery," which appeared in the Boston Sunday Post, Boston, Mass., November 12, 1950:

MERCHANTS OF MISERY

The distinguished British historian, Arnold Toynbee, whose researches into the ebb and flow of civilizations provided a new if controversial approach to the ultimate fate of our present civilization, observed recently that the denunciations by communism of the faults of the western world may arouse the nations of the west to cure their own social ills.

If one approaches this viewpoint with a firm conviction that in any clash between the moral strength of our Christian civilization of the west and the moral bankruptcy of Communist totalitarianism the west would surely be victorious, Mr. Toynbee's observation begins to make sense.

The merchants of misery in Moscow have a genius for denunciation. They denounce for the purpose of distracting attention from the economic, moral, and intellectual squalor they have brought about in the lands and among the people they have brought under their sway.

The merchants of misery have not wrought a utopia in the Soviet Union. They have merely created a distant mirage toward which the enslaved people strain, dumbly submissive to the tyranny which promises much but produces nothing but misery and death.

There are social ills in the Western World, but the ills are not as grievous, nor the symptoms as alarming as those afflicting the body politic of nations serving under the hammer and sickle banner. The best proof that the Western World will have none of the nostrums prescribed by communism has been offered during the past 5 years.

Five years ago there was abysmal distress in Europe. On such distress the merchants of misery fatten and gather power. But, given the choice between blind acceptance of communism's tainted specifics, and a chance to work and strive as never before, Europe chose to work the poison out of its system.

Social and economic ills are cured only by long, drastic, and painful treatments. We started the cure back in 1775 and have been taking our medicine ever since. Thanks to the founding fathers who instituted the course of treatment the patient feels very much better, thank you.

No false flush of health deludes us. We know a couple of operations are indicated to rid ourselves of inward poisons. No amputation of our freedom, as advised by the Moscow merchants of misery, will be tolerated.

When we are denounced by communism with charges that we do not practice what we preach, the rejoinder is quite simple. If the Soviet Union would just try our treatment for social and economic ills for a year or two a remarkable improvement would be felt by the people of the Soviet Union.

Their vision would improve 100 percent. They would be able to see the merchants of misery in all their quackery. Even a few draughts of freedom would banish the mass delusion that Stalin is the be-all and end-all of existence.

In fact, with an immense continent crammed with undeveloped natural resources, with fertile lands, with physical toughness which has made it possible for the Russian people to endure maddening repression, a few draughts of freedom would give them a standard of living which would banish forever their feeling of inferiority.

The Western World did not need the denunciations of communism to realize that it had social and economic ills in need of curative treatment. Our realization of that goes back to Magna Carta and progresses through our Declaration of Independence and the four freedoms.

Internal Security Act—1

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, November 27, 1950

Mr. BIEMILLER. Mr. Speaker, Milwaukee is proud to have an outstanding independent newspaper—the Milwaukee Journal. This paper recently ran a series of 10 editorials dealing with the Internal Security Act. These editorials present such a penetrating analysis of this much-discussed act that I think it valuable to bring all of them to the attention of our colleagues. I will present them in numerical order. No. 1 in the series, from the October 24 issue of the Milwaukee Journal, follows:

THE INTERNAL SECURITY ACT—1

(This is the first of several editorials discussing the Internal Security Act of 1950, the so-called McCarran anti-Communist bill.)

Over a Presidential veto Congress passed into law the Internal Security Act of 1950—a catch-all measure intended primarily to curb activities of the Communist Party.

Supporters of the act called it vital to American security. Those who opposed the law, other than the Communists, believe that it adds little to our security, but that it does threaten some of our fundamental liberties and traditions.

It is this bill which has prodded the administration into new action to deport any known alien Communist. Some of them were ordered deported years ago, but were allowed to stay, apparently because they were useful to the FBI in its surveillance of Communist activities. These persons could have been deported under previous statutes.

The persuading argument for the bill was that it was "anti-Communist." Coming when the Nation was stirred up as never before by the threat of communism and when politicians were burning with preelection fever, this argument was enough. Many Congressmen admittedly voted for it because they did not want to go before their constituents without being able to say that Congress had done something about the Communists.

The anti-Communist feeling is understandable. Communism, here and abroad, has proved a major obstacle to peace and our way of life. Most Americans would agree that every constitutional means should be used to fight communism. But there is such a thing as carrying security to the point where it infringes on liberty and wrecks the very traditions on which our freedoms rest.

The President believes that the new Security Act will create conditions for Communists to revel in. Certainly the earliest effects of the new law indicate basis for that fear.

The Ellis Island immigration station already is in a mess. On the island are hundreds of vistors awaiting permission to enter our country—permission they had been granted before the new law was enacted. They are held, some of them, because Hitler Germany made them join Nazi youth groups as children. They are held because once they supported Mussolini. They are held because their home country is in the hands of totalitarian rulers—perhaps rulers they despise.

In this country are wives and husbands of Americans who face the fear of deportation because they, too, once belonged involuntarily to totalitarian organizations. There are groups worried because their objectives—for public housing, against the Marshall plan, for civil liberties, etc.—are similar objectives the Communists have or pretend to have. Under the law programs similar to Communist programs are basis for being labeled a Communist front.

Possibilities of violating the new law are endless. It is possible to give a man 10 years in jail for revealing relatively unimportant information to a representative of a foreign government, even a friendly government. An alien working for any ordinary book store or publishing firm could be deported if that store or company sold or published books on totalitarian forms of government—such as Das Kapital or Mein Kampf—standard in most any book store.

The law, however, is not all bad. Some of its provisions are worthy and should be kept on the lawbooks; some even strengthened.

Congress will reconvene on November 27. Members of Congress will be free of election haste. They should take a fresh look at this law they have enacted and redraft it. The Journal and most of the Nation's other leading newspapers feel that the law is bad. The Journal will, on succeeding days, discuss why the law is dangerous to the whole American tradition of freedom.

The Internal Security Act—2

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, November 27, 1950

Mr. BIEMILLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am pleased to present the second of a series of editorials from the Milwaukee Journal on the Internal Security Act. The following editorial appeared on October 25:

THE INTERNAL SECURITY ACT—2

(This is the second of several editorials discussing the Internal Security Act of 1950, the so-called McCarran anti-Communist bill.)

What President Truman has called the most "simple and attractive" idea in the Internal Security Act of 1950 is the provision that all Communist-action organizations be required to register and list their members with the Attorney General.

As a solution to "catching" all Communists it's like the system of catching birds by putting salt on their tails. It is, as the President said in his veto message, "about as practical as requiring thieves to register with the sheriff."

The registration plan raises two questions. First, is it desirable? Second, is it workable? A study of the law and its ramifications supports the conclusion that the answer in both instances is "No."

Admittedly, if we could get a central register of all Communists—those already known and those unknown—it would facilitate the job of keeping an eye on them. The same thing would be true if we could get a register of all bank robbers, known and unknown. But nobody would be so naive as to believe that the Communists would all register, any more than bank robbers would.

Under the law, Monday was the deadline for Communist organizations and their members to register. Not a single one did.

The most dangerous Communists are those who are not known to the authorities and may not even be enrolled members of the American Communist Party. Certainly they will not register and open themselves to prosecution under the Smith Act or other laws which would bring more severe punishment than conviction of failure to register could bring.

But registration is undesirable in itself—from the standpoint of our own security. It would drive the Communist Party underground. It would force the FBI and other agencies to divulge sources of information about Communists in the process of proving them Communists, in the effort to make them register.

Open existence of the Communist Party advertises to all Americans its allegiance to the Soviet Union and its incompatibility with American life. Underground, most Communists would be unknown and much more difficult to keep an eye on.

This is not simply a matter of our opinion. The undesirability of registration is testified to by the Department of Justice, by the Central Intelligence Agency, by the Department of Defense, by the Department of State, and by our various intelligence experts.

Registration could give us no information we do not have about known Communists. It would, on the other hand, require our law-enforcement and counterintelligence agencies to waste time, effort, and money to force known Communists to register. It would force these agencies to reveal their sources of information. It would destroy them as effective counterintelligence agencies.

Wake the Watchman

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT F. RICH
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, November 27, 1950

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Washington Times-Herald of November 26, 1950:

WAKE THE WATCHMAN

The most important and most immediate job before Congress today, more important than the war existing and the wars in prospect, is putting some life and force into the House Committee on Un-American Activities.

For the first time in its history, this absolutely vital institution has gone to sleep on its job, and at a moment when the national safety is in extreme danger, not from abroad so much as from within.

The reason the committee has gone to sleep is that it is now, also for the first time in its history, subservient to the executive departments which have so long hid the Communists and fought the committee.

For evidence, compare the volume entitled "Hearings Regarding Communism in the United States Government: Part 2," that record committee proceedings of August 28 and 31, and September 1 and 15, 1950, with the records of comparable inquiries any year from the committee's origin in 1938 down to 1949 when the present membership took over.

The witnesses who appeared before the committee in these latest hearings need no explaining. They were: Lee Pressman, Abraham George Silverman, Nathan Witt, Charles Kramer, John J. Abt, and Max Lowenthal. This handsome galaxy represents the very distilled essence of inside knowledge on matters that can help the people of this Republic understand why we are now wondering where Stalin is going to hit us next.

At least one, Max Lowenthal, is an intimate friend of President Truman, regularly in and out of side entrances at the White House.

Perhaps that accounts—of course, it does—for the arrogant assurance with which Lowenthal spit in the committee's eye when he was finally brought before it for a few feeble questions.

What also accounts for the arrogance of Lee Pressman? Here is a New Deal golden boy, one of the inside insiders, a master of action not only within our Government but also within the CIO.

For almost 20 years it has been common knowledge that Pressman was a Communist and obvious that his great influence had served communism.

SEE THE RECORD

On August 28, 1950, Pressman appeared before the House Committee on Un-American Activities. The inside story of how he happened to be there has not yet been dug out in full but this much can be stated with assurance. He did not come as a result of driving demand by committee chairman JOHN S. WOOD, Democrat, of Georgia, or WOOD's ranking Democratic associate, FRANCIS E. WALTER, of Pennsylvania, or—note well—Representative MORGAN M. MOULDER, Democrat, of Missouri.

As for his performance after he got there, the best evidence is the record itself, extremely instructive reading for anybody who wants to see the United States survive its entanglements with communism. In brief it was Representative RICHARD NIXON, now California's new Republican Senator, who carried the ball. With NIXON gone, from the committee, who is going to do the job now?

In respect to Lowenthal, a question quite reasonably might be asked: "Why was this friend of the President called?" Another question could be added: "Why not?" Lowenthal is an extremely shrewd and observing operator with many years' Washington experience.

He could hardly have spent his time here in the circles that he has, without being a potential source of important knowledge. Yet his testimony clearly shows how little help he gave the committee, just as it shows how feebly the committee pressed him for help.

In fact, nobody can read the Lowenthal record without seeing plainly that something was going on at the time which never came to the surface.

Well, the time for subterranean wrestling is over.

There is no middle ground. Either you have a driving urge to cleanse this country of communism or there is a reason why not.

COMMITTEE HAS TURNED TIMID

The House Committee on Un-American Activities was formed in 1938 under the compulsion of a driving urge to save this country from subversive forces of all kinds. It has done the greatest service of any congressional committee in this Nation's history, and all the way uphill against resistance from the Roosevelt and Truman administrations.

Never, until the Eighty-first Congress could it be judged to have slacked at its work. But it is an obvious thing to all who have known the committee from its beginning, that today it is gone soft, timid, and afraid to fight. Let's hope that in this coming Eighty-second Congress an aggressive and fact-finding Committee on Un-American Activities will develop. Such a force is essential to the U. S. A.

Profits in Surplus Peanuts

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. HESELTON
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, November 27, 1950

Mr. HESELTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include the following letter I sent to Secretary Brannan. As of this time, I have received no reply:

NOVEMBER 21, 1950.

Hon. CHARLES F. BRANNAN,
Secretary of Agriculture
Department of Agriculture,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I have had a brief opportunity to examine the report of the Commodity Credit Corporation as of September 30.

I think you will recall that the report for the month of August showed that 14,467,115 pounds of shelled peanuts had been bought for $2,174,067.50, had then been sold for $1,267,607.40 at an expense to the taxpayers of $906,417.84.

In the face of that experience, I now find that in September an additional 11,881,566 pounds of these peanuts were purchased for $1,261,635.69, were then sold for $1,213,408.17 and the taxpayers lost an additional $18,227.51 thereby.

This tragic waste of $954,645.35 is bad enough when the Federal Government is taking so much of the hard-earned and frugally saved money of the American people It is even worse with proposals now pending before Congress for additional taxation.

It is difficult for me to reconcile these reported facts with the position that has been taken by you and the Department that there is no authority for the disposition of the constantly increasing hoarding of such commodities as butter, cheese, dried milk, eggs, beans and peas.

In any event, it seems clear that some individual or individuals must have benefited substantially by the purchases and sales involved in these particular transactions. I request that you furnish me as soon as possible with full information as to the persons who sold these peanuts to the Department and the persons to whom those peanuts were resold by the Department.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN W. HESELTON.

Armistice Day, November 11, 1950

OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, November 27, 1950

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include a copy of the address I delivered on Armistice Day, November 11, 1950, at Lawrence, Mass., at the exercises held on the Common under the auspices of Lawrence Post No. 15, the American Legion:

The last roar of the guns died away, and all was quiet along the 800-mile line of torture that was called the western front.

Men crawled up from the mud of the trenches, leaned on their rifles, and listened to a stillness they had not known for 4 years. Somewhere a bird dared to sing, and then the men broke into cheers.

That was France on November 11, 1918.

The blast and flame and agony of war had ended, and men could walk upright again without hate or fear.

There was peace on earth and men rejoiced.

And when the news reached Lawrence the schools closed. Stores and factories were emptied as people poured into the streets singing and celebrating.

Informal parades started up in a dozen places and covered the city during a day and night of jubilation. Thousands of flags swarmed through the city carried by people who marched and shouted. Teams and automobiles were crowded with people, many of whom had never met before that day, but felt the need of getting together in spontaneous comradeship. At times there were more men, women, and children in the parades than on the sidewalks. It was a day of exultation that stands out in history. Nothing before or since could compare with the outpouring of human happiness that flooded our city on that first Armistice Day.

It danced and sang to victory in the war to end all wars.

And most of mankind shared in this greatest of all triumphs.

That was in November 1918.

During the fat years and the lean years, during Novembers of peace and Novembers of tension, we have met to commemorate the anniversary of that supremely happy and hopeful day of 32 years ago.

We did so in 1945, after the end of another global conflict more terrible than the first. Our casualties had been heavier and our faith in man's ability to win lasting peace had been shaken. Our hopes had soared in June of 1945 when the United Nations was born. Then came the atomic bomb to clinch our victory and, at the same time, fill us with dread concerning the future in which such destructive power might be turned against us. We recalled the old League of Nations and how it had failed because small and shallow men in our own Government had refused to support it.

With those forebodings in mind, we could not give way to unrestrained joy on Armistice Day of 1945.

Today, in 1950, we meet in an atmosphere that mocks those wonderful expectations of that first Armistice Day.

The guns are growling again on the other side of the world. Again, because short-sighted men had insisted that we economize in the wrong place, our young soldiers were thrown into the breach, few in number, ill-trained, and without the equipment needed. After a series of heart-breaking defeats, they were strengthened, went over to the attack and swept through almost to a complete victory.

But reinforcements from China, ordered in by Red Russia, have stiffened the enemy defenses. Our troops face the bitter prospect of prolonged action in the below-zero weather and rugged terrain of northern Korea.

And we at home have an uncomfortable feeling as we pick up our newspaper each night for fear that we will see more names of home-town boys listed as dead, wounded, or missing in action.

We pray that the near victory in that far-away land will be consummated quickly so that the suffering will be over and our boys can enjoy the warmth and glow and the "peace on earth, good will toward men" that should permeate the world this Christmastide. Even now we are sending the choice gifts and the cheerful letters to our men and women overseas, hoping that they will be able to relish them in the garrison life that will prevail in Germany and in Korea.

But we have our misgivings.

The Communist conspiracy against the free world goes on. Sometimes it applies pressure directly, as in the blockade of Berlin, which was an attempt to force us out by stopping all land- and water-borne transport. That failed because of the difficult but successful air lift that we engineered. Much to the Russian's surprise, but at considerable cost, both human and material, we were able to supply the isolated western zones of Berlin by plane. This accomplishment raised our prestige throughout the world.

Now the Reds try to mask their moves by operating through other nations that they control.

Take the case of France, for instance.

That nation, because of its position, must be the keystone of any western defense system. Yet the Communists make up the largest single political party among the various factions. They play up France's traditional fear of Germany, thereby making it difficult to incorporate even smaller German units in the combined military defense that is planned for Western Europe. Communists are found in the schools, on the police force, in the Government, are employed on atomic-energy projects, and even hold high posts in the Armed Forces.

Five and one-half million Frenchmen in that nation whose population is less than one-third of ours voted Communist in 1947. How they would sap France's will to fight in the event of war with Russia is a question of real concern.

I could point to unreliable factors in other nations who should be on our side if it comes to a show-down. I merely cite this instance as an example of the weighty problems that face our President, his Secretaries of State and Defense.

Not to mention the headaches of a friendly French Government that wants to cooperate with us in every way without losing the confidence and support of its own people.

There are other nations like France where most of the people have a genuine trust in and affection for us as we have for them. But they have very serious problems of their own. And they have little or no say in the policies of their governments.

The self-appointed leaders of Red China have sent troops into Northern Korea to oppose our men who are fighting under the authority of the United Nations.

Some diplomats and generals profess the belief that the Reds want to protect the dams and generators which the Japs built on the Korean side of the Yalu River to supply power for the vital industries in Chinese Manchuria.

I hope that this alone is the basis for Chinese intervention as UN forces approach the Yalu River boundary.

If it is so, the UN could give guaranties that such installations would be saved and the flow of power continued to Chinese industries. In that case, large-scale fighting in Korea would soon be over, and the Chinese Communist divisions would be recalled to their homeland.

If not, then this is the beginning of a long-range plan to tie down some American military forces in Korea, multiplied by incidents elsewhere that will cause us to thin out our strength all over the world.

Both in stockpile and in rate of production, the United States has a definite A-bomb advantage over Russia. While Stalin might give the signal for the withdrawal of Red Chinese soldiers from Korea in return for certain concessions, it is clear that communism is preparing for an eventual attack upon our Nation. If we could be conquered, then the rest of the world would fall under the hammer and sickle with scarcely a protest. But the Reds must first wear us down by causing us to expend our economic power in many different directions, drawn into small wars provoked by the Kremlin that do not involve the Russian armies.

When our human and industrial resources have been weakened, Russia will strike swiftly and with overwhelming force.

It may take years before this happens, but the blueprint for conquest, in spite of every attempt at secrecy, is known to exist by every competent observer.

These are the plans of communism designed for our destruction.

Although failing to conquer Korea by a whisker, the Russians overplayed their hand. The United States woke up with a jolt, and just in time.

Appeasement will not satisfy the Communists just as it could not compromise with the Nazis.

Generals MacArthur and Chenault, both of whom have lived in the Far East for many years and know the workings of the oriental mind, have given us fair warning.

Missionary work for democracy or handouts from the United States do not impress the oriental, and we must remember that a part of Russia is located in the Far East.

What they call "face" is all-important.

The prestige of power is the language they understand.

That is why the sudden and bold decision of the United Nations, encouraged and led by the United States, to resist aggression in Korea made all Asia sit up and take notice. The follow-through in terms of hard fighting that is leading to military success dealt Russia a stunning psychological blow. For everyone knows that the Kremlin planned, directed, and supplied the attack on South Korea from its position behind the scenes.

This did more to strengthen the UN and upset the Red timetable for conquest than any other decision we have made since the end of World War II.

There can be no let-down in that resolute and realistic policy.

The United States is beginning to build up its Armed Forces. It is helping other free nations to do the same.

Whether these and other measures yet to be employed under the Charter of the UN and for the purpose of making the UN strong enough to maintain the peace, whether they will succeed before the Communists attack on all fronts, is the question that history will answer.

We can help to shape that answer for the benefit of mankind.

The American Legion knows what must be done.

It is calling upon every American to help in every possible way.

Only as soldiers, farmers, industrial workers, or civilian defense volunteers, and by united and persistent effort, can we save and perpetuate the peace that is in such present peril.

Armistice Day, 1950, is a time for sober reckoning and solemn dedication.

The road ahead is long and there are many dangers along the way. But you and I and millions of freemen and women must travel it with faith and courage to reach the lasting armistice, that we must win.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALT HORAN

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, November 27, 1950

Mr. HORAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my own remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I am pleased to include a letter by former Ambassador Joseph C. Grew. It appeared in the Washington Evening Star of Monday, November 20, 1950.

The work of our American missionaries, whether they be educators, physicians, nurses, agriculturalists, engineers, or Christian evangelists cannot be overlooked. Per square inch, they have created more good will for America than all of the money we have expended through either political or diplomatic channels.

Almost without exception they are supported by private gifts and donations from the common purse of the United States.

Any expansion of appropriations for political purposes abroad by our Nation should be viewed in the exact and clear light of what it may mean to these privately endowed activities and institutions.

It seems to me that two questions, particularly, should be answered:

First. Will our political activities abroad diminish or distress them?

Second. Will our rising tax rate here at home dry up the source of their support?

We should remember that there is no "gravy" here—just a palatable American program, doing real good, au jus.

The letter follows:

CHRISTIAN UNIVERSITY IN JAPAN

More and more, and with each day's developments, the phrase "the Far East" becomes a misnomer. We cannot brush off such matters as the terms of the Japanese peace treaty, or the reconstruction of Korea, or the threat of militant communism in China as problems which are of no lasting concern to us. No matter how much some may wish to do so, we cannot withdraw.

It is important that this fact be faced, and its implications understood. Our concern must be as to how we can adjust to the relatively new concept that all men are, in a manner of speaking, our neighbors.

In any consideration of the problems of the Far East, Japan is the key. In the prewar years Japan was to Asia approximately what Great Britain is to Europe. Once a measure of peace is restored, it is likely that Japan will resume its old place as Asia's major mercantile nation. But can we anticipate that Japan will become the chief source of spiritual and intellectual power in the Asian area, as Britain was in the Western World?

Through the allied occupation our Government has done all that was possible to indoctrinate the Japanese in the ways of democracy. But inevitably the force of compulsion that is inherent in the word "occupation" is diminishing. We must depend more and more on the voluntary agencies which are at work in Japan.

One of the major voluntary programs already undertaken in Japan is the building at Mitaka of the International Christian University which is being sponsored jointly by about 20 of the principal Protestant denominations of the United States and Canada. The university proposes to build around a small model college of liberal arts a series of first-rate graduate schools, each of which will train leaders for service in a special field where such leadership is sorely needed in Japan and elsewhere in Asia.

The university definitely will not be another missionary enterprise, set up primarily to convert the Japanese to Christianity. It will maintain the highest academic standards and at the same time seek to implant in the students' minds the philosophy that true democracy must be built on Christian principles and based on a high moral code.

Initially the three graduate schools will try to meet the great challenges that now exist in education, social work, and public administration. The faculty of the university will be drawn from the ablest scholars of the east and west. Its students, who probably will be drawn largely from Japan, will be carefully selected.

Asia faces a heavy task and a grave responsibility in rebuilding its society along democratic lines. Those who have studied the problem at length believe that the International Christian University is the answer. The Japanese believe with us that it is their great hope, and have given substantially toward its founding.

Now the American people are being called on to contribute $10,000,000 over a 2-year period to provide buildings, equipment, and a modest endowment. No contribution to any cause will bring a greater immediate return, or a more lasting benefit to Christendom and democracy.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES I. DOLLIVER
OF IOWA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, November 27, 1950

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following poem by J. A. Swisher:

IOWA

(By J. A. Swisher)

If I could write as poets do
And make the words ring clear and true;
If I could sing as poets sing
And make the notes of music ring;
If I could travel far and wide
And have with me a trusty guide,
I would not seek climes far away.
I still would live in Iowa.

Oh, sometimes when the cold winds blow
I'd go down south a month or so.
Sometimes when things here fairly bake
I'd spend a week up at the lake,
And sometimes when I thought it best
I'd take a little trip out west.
But as for living, day by day,
My friends, just give me Iowa.

In Iowa the corn grows tall
It yields a harvest every fall.
In golden fields, oats, wheat, and rye
Are bumper crops by mid-July.
But Iowa has culture, too,
With schools and churches, not a few.
With boys and girls she, too, is blest
Of all that's good, she has the best.

If I could write as poets do
I'd write each day a verse or two
About the grandeur of the West
And of the State that I love best.
Then when my evening prayers were said
And I had started off to bed,
I'd pause a moment just to say:
"Thank God for good old Iowa."

Fifth Annual Meeting of International Monetary Fund and International Bank

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BURNET R. MAYBANK
OF SOUTH CAROLINA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, November 28 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a report to members of the Senate Banking and Currency Committee on the fifth annual meeting of the International Monetary Fund and the International Bank.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OCTOBER 10, 1950.

REPORT TO MEMBERS OF THE SENATE BANKING AND CURRENCY COMMITTEE ON THE FIFTH ANNUAL MEETING OF THE INTERNATIONAL MONETARY FUND AND THE INTERNATIONAL BANK

I. The fifth annual meeting of the Board of Governors of the International Monetary Fund and the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development was held in Paris at the new building of the Bank of France from September 6 through September 14, 1950. The United States delegation for this meeting was headed by the Secretary of the Treasury in his capacity as the United States Governor. The delegation included the Under Secretary of State in his capacity as Alternate United States Governor; the United States executive directors of the fund and bank; representatives of the executive agencies composing the National Advisory Council; and the undersigned members of this committee who served as advisers at the request of the United States Governor. The chairman and ranking minority member of the House Committee on Banking and Currency were also designated as members of the delegation. The chairman was unable to attend all the meetings because Senate business delayed his arrival, but was present at many meetings and presided at the session on the final day.

The other member countries of the fund and bank were represented by their governors, or alternate governors, who were generally finance ministers of heads of central banks in their respective countries. The meetings thus provided an excellent opportunity for the exchange of views and the discussion of matters of common interest in international finance and investment on the part of the governors and their advisers. These conversations were of considerable value to the members of this committee who were present at Paris.

In advance of these meetings careful preparations were made by the National Advisory Council and the agencies represented on it, as well as by the secretariat and staffs of the fund and bank. This careful preparation contributed to the smooth and efficient, and as a whole, harmonious proceedings of the conference. The United States position on the various matters of fund and bank business had been studied and prepared in Washington in accordance with the directives of the National Advisory Council. The general tenor of the United States position is, of course, familiar to the members of this committee from the reports submitted to the Congress by the National Advisory Council. The council's "Second Special Report to the President and to the Congress on the Operations and Policies of the International Monetary Fund and the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development (81st Cong., 2d sess., H. Doc. No. 611, May 31, 1950)" analyzes the basic problems confronting the fund and bank and reports fully on the policy which the United States has pursued in these institutions over the last few years. The positions taken by the United States delegation at the fifth annual meeting were based on the policies set forth in that report.

The day-to-day business of the fund and the bank is transacted by their respective boards of executive directors and staffs. The meetings of the Board of Governors, therefore, are concerned with the more general problems of the policies of these institutions than with the day-to-day operations. The meetings thus provided an opportunity for the Governors to discuss these issues in the formal and informal meetings and to raise questions with the administrations of these institutions in the course of the discussions centering about the annual reports of the bank and fund to their respective Boards of Governors. Some of the issues as they arose in the course of the meetings are reported here for the information of the committee.

II. CHINESE REPRESENTATION IN THE FUND AND THE BANK

At the opening session of the Boards of Governors Czechoslovakia introduced a resolution which called for the replacement of the Governor representing the Government of China recognized by the United States by a representative of the so-called Central Peoples Government of China. The United States strongly opposed this resolution and was supported by a substantial majority of the voting power of the bank and fund with only a few governments supporting the Czechoslovakian resolution, and a number of others abstaining. It may be noted also that Czechoslovakia subsequently abstained from participation in the election of executive directors of the bank and of the fund, and so will not be represented on the executive boards during the next 2 years.

III. THE INTERNATIONAL MONETARY FUND

The special problems of the International Monetary Fund were discussed in plenary sessions of the Board of Governors of the Fund, and in a number of special committees composed of Governors from various countries, or their deputies. The United States participated in all of these meetings.

The Managing Director of the fund in his speech presenting the Annual Report noted that the Korean crisis, which broke out after the fund's report had been completed and the necessity for rearmament under present world conditions, have greatly affected the world financial situation. The resulting danger of inflation makes the problem of attaining international monetary stability more difficult. He expressed the willingness of the fund to do all in its power to aid international stability and to continue its work in international financial cooperation, which would strengthen the solidarity of the free nations. He emphasized that one of the basic tasks of the present period is to stabilize and preserve the purchasing power of all currencies, and that governments should pursue policies in accord with the fund's objectives, despite the conditions prevailing. He also noted that the exchange rate adjustments of September 1949, approved by the International Monetary Fund, have been amply justified by subsequent events. International price and exchange relationships resulting from the devaluations are more in harmony with actual conditions, and would make possible better operation of the price mechanism, internally and externally, and so would enable international competition to resume to a greater degree its traditional role as the mechanism for directing international trade. He concluded that the fund has shown its effectiveness in the course of the last few years, and that it stood ready to give its full support to its member nations in carrying out desirable monetary and exchange policies in the future.

The articles of agreement of the International Monetary Fund provided for the use of its resources by member countries under appropriate conditions to meet temporary balance-of-payments deficits. The problem of determining the conditions under which these resources may appropriately be used in accordance with the articles has confronted the fund from the beginning of its operations. The executive directors of the fund have adopted a policy of scrutinizing individual requests for currencies so as to determine whether or not the particular request represents a foreign exchange requirement arising out of a genuinely temporary balance-of-payments deficit, and that the proposed drawing is consistent with the objectives of the fund. Any drawings from the fund are presumed to be for a short period and are expected to be repurchased from the fund within a reasonable period of time. In the light of the situation prevailing over the last few years, currency purchases have been moderate.

The prospective termination of the European recovery program and the improvement in the international financial position of the European countries, and indirectly of other countries, largely resulting from that program, have again brought to the fore the question of policy with respect to the fund's sales of currencies. Several governors argued that it would now be desirable for the fund to formulate more precise general criteria to determine the eligibility of member countries to purchase foreign exchange from the fund.

The United States position with regard to the use of the fund's resources as advanced at this meeting of the Board of Governors and previously at the meetings of the Board of Executive Directors, as well as the reports of the National Advisory Council, has favored a cautious approach to the use of the fund's resources, particularly since up to the present time the demand for the fund's resources has been principally a demand for the fund's holdings of dollars. Because the supply of dollars available to the fund is practically limited to the United States subscription to the fund—$2,750,000,000—the United States position has favored conservative use of the fund's exchange holdings in view of the generally great demand for dollars in the postwar period. This would conserve the fund's dollar resources for genuine monetary stabilization operations. As a result of the discussions at the Board of Governors, the executive directors were requested to give further and intensified study to the problem. The members of this committee present in Paris participated in the discussion of these policies in the delegation and are in accord with the position taken by the United States representatives.

The fund's first annual report on exchange restrictions and the portions of the Fund's annual report dealing with this question were given considerable attention during the annual meeting of the Board of Governors. Members of the Board commented favorably on the accuracy and adequacy of the fund's reports and expressed the hope of their countries that it would be possible at some future date to remove some or all of the present restrictions on international current transactions. They stressed, however, the peculiar difficulties with which countries were faced in this period of postwar transition and the particular difficulties of the underdeveloped countries which needed foreign exchange to assist in their economic development far in excess of their current earnings of foreign exchange. While agreeing with the objectives of the fund, they stressed the persistence of conditions affecting their particular countries, or the world as a whole, which they believed justified or necessitated the retention of exchange restrictions by law or administrative action.

It was recognized in the discussion that it would be scarcely feasible for the member countries to eliminate exchange restrictions immediately or completely under existing circumstances. But it is the view of the United States that probably in some instances controls have been retained beyond the period when circumstances required their imposition, and that a system of exchange controls may frequently lead to the perpetuation of conditions which militate against their removal by building up vested interests or directing the economies of the member countries in such ways as makes it difficult for them to operate on a multilateral-trade basis without considerable dislocation of their economic life. For this reason the United States at this meeting continued to urge the member countries to direct their policies along the lines contemplated by the fund agreement and to use all possible efforts to eliminate restrictions as soon as feasible and as completely as is consistent with the economic stability of the member countries.

At the fourth annual meeting of the fund held in Washington in 1949, the Board of Governors, after discussion of a proposal made by the South African Governor, adopted a resolution directing the executive directors to make a study of the fund's gold policy under which the member governments had been requested to take action to eliminate transactions in gold at premium prices by their nationals or by their fiscal agencies. In the course of the year the executive directors submitted a report, which came out strongly against any general revision of the price of gold and which reaffirmed the position taken by the fund previously that the member governments should not engage in, or permit their nationals to engage in, premium gold transactions.

At the fifth annual meeting, when the subject of gold was considered by a special committee, these issues were again raised but in less extensive form. There was no strong argument for the upward revaluation of the price of gold and United States determination to maintain the present gold value of the dollar was accepted without question. A few of the governors, however, did not agree with the Fund's policy on premium gold transactions. The "Report of the Executive Board of the International Monetary Fund on External Transactions in Gold at Premium Prices" was, however, accepted without dissent by the approval of the annual report in which it was included.

Among other actions taken by the Board of Governors were: The acceptance of the report of the auditors; approval of the budget; acceptance of the report of the executive directors; and the election of executive directors by those governors not representing countries which have the privilige of appointing of their own directors. There was no controversy nor any extended discussion about these matters.

IV. THE INTERNATIONAL BANK FOR RECONSTRUCTION AND DEVELOPMENT

The president of the International Bank, in presenting its annual report to the board of governors, called attention to the need for economic development in the underdeveloped countries, despite unfavorable conditions resulting from the Korean crisis. He argued that an improvement in the standards of living of the peoples of Asia and other underdeveloped areas was necessary to maintain peace and political stability. He pointed out the substantial progress which the bank had made during the first 4 years of its operations, a period during which it had made loans of almost a billion dollars to 17 countries. He indicated that the bank would continue the expansion of its loan program.

He also mentioned the favorable reception on the security markets of the bank's bonds, and the relatively favorable terms at which these bonds could be sold. As a result of the sound credit position of the bank, it was possible to reduce loan charges. He argued in favor of having a larger number of the members consent to the use of their capital subscription to the bank so as to increase its lending capacity. He pointed out that the bank had established sound lending standards in its operations, which would not only assure reasonable prospects of repayment, but would assist in the most rational development of the member countries. He called upon the member countries contemplating borrowing from the bank to give greater attention to the formulation of balanced development programs which would be within their capacity to service foreign debts, and which would make effective use of their resources without undue strain on the domestic economy. To this end he advocated the adoption of better fiscal policies. He concluded that "with the cooperation of our members, we can aid, I believe, in creating confidence and the kind of economic environment which will encourage productive investment, both local and foreign, private and public." He pledged the bank to play its part despite the trouble and disturbances of the present world.

The major part of the bank's meetings were devoted to a discussion of the bank's report and informal discussions of the bank's policies. In these discussions the president and members of the bank's staff invited questions and criticism on the part of the Governors, and explained the underlying reasons for the bank's policies.

As a whole, the Governors present expressed their satisfaction with the bank's lending policy and its achievements up to the present time. The Governors differed somewhat in the emphasis they gave to various aspects of bank policy, but there was evident a general agreement with the main policies of the bank. Thus, the representatives of the underdeveloped countries, as might well have been expected, strongly argued the case for a rapid expansion of the bank's lending activities in these areas. While they recognized many of the difficulties which the bank has stressed in negotiating loans quickly and successfully, they stressed the importance of quick action in this direction as an aid toward building up the standards of living of these countries which, it was argued, would give greater assurance of political stability and the maintenance of free institutions. The president of the bank gave assurances that the political conditions on the Asiatic Continent would not check the bank's lending for development purposes there, if appropriate agreements could be reached for making sound loans, and if the funds could be used economically and efficiently. In this connection both the officers of the bank and the representatives of the underdeveloped countries stressed the great value of the technical assistance programs of the bank and of the United Nations as means of assisting these countries to formulate sound development programs. In general there was agreement that the bank's missions to member countries, whether or not a loan was in immediate prospect, had been helpful to these countries and had given them much needed technical advice on the engineering and economic aspects of their programs, as well as more general matters of economic and financial policy.

A second matter of interest to the Governors was the problem of securing local currency to finance local costs of projects whose foreign exchange costs are met from International Bank loans. Some of the members stressed the difficulties which exist in their own countries and countries similarly situated in raising local currency to finance these costs and argued that the International Bank should provide larger amounts of local currency so as to avoid inflationary pressures on the country. This would facilitate more rapid economic development than would be possible if reliance had to be placed upon local sources to provide the local currency requirements either from locally floated loans, by taxation, or otherwise.

In this connection the bank pointed out that it might be unwise for countries which had a limited capacity to service debt to incur foreign exchange obligations to meet local currency costs. The bank emphasized that it believed that many of the underdeveloped countries had an inadequate appreciation of the degree to which local currency costs could be financed by voluntary flotation of loans in the country concerned. Thus, the interesting case of El Salvador was cited in which the bank had provided technical assistance to the borrowing country to enable it to float a bond issue on its own markets to provide the local currency needed to carry out a hydroelectric project whose foreign exchange costs are being financed by the bank. The bank pointed out that it was willing to consider individual cases on their merits, and that in accordance with the articles of agreement it would, under appropriate circumstances, finance local currency costs, and that it was willing to lend its technical assistance to countries to enable them to finance these local currency requirements from their own resources without increasing foreign exchange obligations.

The bank's management has also at various times stressed the importance of member countries giving their consent to the use of their capital subscriptions to the bank so as to broaden the character of the bank's loans, which have up to the present time been financed predominantly from the United States subscription to the bank. The permission of the member is required before the bank may use the capital subscribed by it. The United States has given the bank permission to use the entire amount subscribed, and some other countries have permitted limited use of their subscriptions. The bank has advocated more general permission so as to increase its resources and thus enable it to hasten the process of economic development. A number of the countries expressed their hope of being able to grant this permission at some time in the future, but explained that they were unable to do so at the present time in the light of their balance-of-payments position.

The United States has recognized that some countries are not in a position to permit extensive capital exports, particularly while they are in receipt of special assistance from the United States Government to meet their balance-of-payments deficits. It has supported the bank's position, however, as being ultimately the desirable objective in which the funds made available to the bank by the member countries should actually be used for loans and not merely to constitute, as at present, a potential source of funds in the future. It is recognized that this policy cannot be changed at once and that a number of years must elapse before the bank can fully carry out operations on the scale originally contemplated by the use of the currencies contributed by many of the member countries.

As in the case of the fund, the Board of Governors also approved the audit report, accepted the report of the bank, and carried out an election of executive directors for the next 2 years.

V. CONCLUSION

The members of your committee who were part of the United States delegation wish to record their satisfaction with this meeting of the Governors of the fund and the bank. They are satisfied that the Governors representing the majority of the countries of the fund and the bank support the policies which the United States has favored. They were impressed by the harmonious atmosphere which prevailed at the meetings and the frank discussion of matters of policy on the part of the Governors and of the officers of the two international institutions. They believe that both institutions have made considerable progress toward the achievement of their objectives, and that continued United States support of these institutions and their policies is in accord with the interests and policies of the United States. They have found these meetings helpful in adding to their understanding of international financial policies and problems, and have appreciated the opportunity of meeting with representatives of the other member governments. They believe their experience at these meetings will prove helpful to the work of this committee.

Your committee was also greatly impressed with the policies and the excellent management of the bank, a manifestation of which being the refusal by the Governors to liberalize credit terms and the good work that the bank has carried on in such an imaginative direction as assisting in the establishment of a domestic capital market in El Salvador. Without departing from strict banking principles, they have nevertheless done things that no private bank can do and they are fulfilling very ably the function that was in the minds of those who set it up at Bretton Woods.

The confidence of the people of the world is evidenced by the fact that it has sold its securities in the American market at practically the prevailing rate of direct government obligations and the same has been true in Switzerland.

We can readily appreciate after attending the meeting that so far it has been difficult to make as great a headway with the fund as they have with the bank.

BURNET R. MAYBANK,
RALPH E. FLANDERS.

Reexamination of Foreign Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HOMER FERGUSON
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, November 28 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD the script of a radio interview broadcast nationally last week, between myself and Bert Andrews, Pulitzer prize winner and chief of the Washington bureau of the New York Herald Tribune.

Mr. Andrews' interview followed a question that has assumed great proportions following the recent elections, as by and large it reflected considerable dissatisfaction with our foreign policies. That question is, What is meant by a reexamination of foreign policy?

In my answers to Mr. Andrews' questions I sought to express as frankly as I could my views on that subject.

Summarized briefly, they are as follows:

First, our future foreign policy requires a realistic view of world conditions, as they actually are, and plain speaking on them. We cannot afford to be deluded by any hazy ideals or double-talk about world cooperation.

Second, our foreign policy must be tested by results. Are our policies attaining the objectives of peace, security, harmony, and stability in world affairs, based on principle, which should be our common aim? Further, are the sacrifices we are willing to make to achieve results in proportion to the results themselves, or will those sacrifices engulf us to the end that none of our objectives are attainable?

Third, reexamination means that any policy failing the test of promised results should then be reappraised for possible redirection and greater results.

The sum total of such reexamination is to make our leadership in world affairs more effective. By no means does it mean making it less effective, by withdrawing into some sort of shell of our own making. In stating my views I honestly felt I was expressing the opinion of a great many of my fellow citizens, on the basis of my talks with them during the congressional recess. In the course of my discussion with Mr. Andrews I stated that I would like to have our listeners write me, to give me their reactions.

The interested response I have received to date makes me feel that I should supplement that request. To reach people who did not hear the radio broadcast, I intend to have this interview printed and sent to as many people in the State of Michigan as is possible. To them I repeat my request, that they write me at the Senate Office Building, Washington, so that I may have their reaction after reading this discussion, and the benefit of their guidance.

There being no objection, the interview was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Good evening. This is Bert Andrews, reporting by transcription from Washington.

One of the topics of greatest interest in Washington right now is whether there is going to be a congressional reexamination of the foreign policy of President Truman and Secretary of State Dean Acheson. With me tonight is Senator HOMER FERGUSON, of Michigan, one of the Republicans who has strong feelings on the subject. As we all know, the fuss about the foreign policy was heightened when Senator TAFT, of Ohio, said he thought there should be a reexamination. Then Secretary Acheson—in a speech which many observers regarded as being slightly ill-timed, in view of the Republican gains in Senate and House, sort of taunted the "reexaminists." He took the view that foreign policy was what he and President Truman said it was—and that it was silly to reexamine matters that had already been decided. But many in Congress—Democrats as well as Republicans—have a different view, and things may start popping when the lame duck session of Congress meets on Monday. Tell me, Senator FERGUSON, do you think Senator TAFT or Secretary Acheson is right on this reexamining issue?

Senator FERGUSON. There isn't any doubt in my mind, Mr. Andrews, that the remarks of Senator TAFT represent the opinion of Republicans as well as many of the Democrats and independent voters. When a policy has been unsuccessful, it demands immediate reexamination. The people back home have spoken their opinion about our foreign policy. They do not approve of the present foreign policy, for it was the issue in the Senate campaigns, in all of the States—and most of the States turned their back on Secretary Acheson, the man who wouldn't turn his back on Alger Hiss.

Mr. ANDREWS. Then, Senator FERGUSON, you really regard the outcome of the elections in the key States as repudiation of many of the steps that have been taken by the President and Secretary Acheson.

Senator FERGUSON. Emphatically yes. If you will consider the States of California, Colorado, Ohio, Illinois, Indiana, Pennsylvania—and don't forget Maryland—you can appreciate what public opinion is at the present time. Secretary Acheson's foreign policy was at issue. If he had been running for any office in any State, he would have gone down to defeat, and he would have realized the real opposition to his views.

Mr. ANDREWS. So you don't agree, Senator FERGUSON, with the Secretary's statement, made just after the election, that he had no reason to be concerned with the election results—that his job was above politics.

Senator FERGUSON. In this country, Mr. Andrews, nothing is above politics—if you are using the term in the sense that I think you are. For what is politics, and what is an election? An election gives the people of the United States the opportunity to say what they think—and the officeholders should abide by it. You know the old saying, the Supreme Court follows the election returns. Well, I say that the President and the Secretary of State are no better than the Supreme Court. They ought to follow the election returns, and I think that in this case they'll have to do that.

Mr. ANDREWS. Well, what do you think will happen if they don't follow the election returns, Senator FERGUSON?

Senator FERGUSON. Let me emphasize, Mr. Andrews, that it is not only the Republicans who are dissatisfied with the way our international relations have been run. Many Democrats—more than President Truman and Secretary Acheson would like to know about—feel exactly the same way. If they persist in their stubborn refusal to follow the opinion of the people, I think the people will speak up in 1952 at the polls, and speak in such a strong voice that there won't be any doubt in the world as to how they feel.

Mr. ANDREWS. Do I understand you to mean, Senator FERGUSON, that you are going on record now as predicting a Republican victory in 1952?

Senator FERGUSON. I certainly am. The people have indicated what they think about both the foreign and domestic policies of the Truman administration. In my mind, the results of the November 7 election showed only the beginning of a trend. I think the trend will increase in the next couple of years and will result in the Truman administration being swept out of office. After all, Mr. Andrews, you can fool only so many people for only so many years. And the years are running out on the Truman type of fooling.

Mr. ANDREWS. Let's go back to this matter of congressional reexamination of our foreign policy, Senator FERGUSON. Just what can the Congress do about it, granting that the people have had their say and want a change?

Senator FERGUSON. The President can do and does do many things without the knowledge of Congress He acts as the Chief Executive and many times—after he has acted—it is too late for the Congress even to debate the wisdom of what he has done. Congress can only act in its authorizations of appropriations to implement a policy. But reexaminations of these policies will allow Congress to determine whether or not they should be implemented, and whether they should appropriate the money—and how much—to carry out the policies.

Mr. ANDREWS. Are you suggesting, Senator FERGUSON, that the "lame duck" session—or the Eighty-second Congress which will meet on January 3—may tighten the purse strings as a method of getting a real voice in foreign policy?

Senator FERGUSON. I firmly believe that that is just what will happen, Mr. Andrews. In recent years, the Executive has practically eliminated the right of Congress to speak through the ratification of treaties. He has made what are known as executive agreements, where Congress has not even been consulted as to their terms.

Mr. ANDREWS. Do you have any particular examples in mind?

Senator FERGUSON. The one that stands out today more than any other relates to the division of Korea at the thirty-eighth parallel. That agreement, which was responsible for the present war in Korea, was made without Congress at any time having had an opportunity of saying whether the agreement was a wise one or not. Certainly the events have proved that it was not wise, and that our Chief Executives can make mistakes. In this case they made—as the late Fiorello LaGuardia would have put it—a beaut.

Mr. ANDREWS. You were saying, Senator FERGUSON, that Congress might tighten up on foreign spending as a means of regaining its voice on foreign policy. Do you have any particular appropriations in mind?

Senator FERGUSON. This is the way I look at it, Mr. Andrews. We have spent as a Nation some $42,000,000,000 to help other countries. Program after program has been initiated by the executive branch of the Truman administration. Each program was supposed to accomplish our aims, to implement our foreign policy, and to bring about peace. But what happened? All we did was to appropriate money without getting an agreement as to what other countries would do. Some of these countries just don't see eye to eye with us on the conditions that will bring about real peace in the world. Their socialistic philosophies are opposed to our capitalistic philosophy, and we don't find real cooperation from them. Sometimes I think, Mr. Andrews, that all we are doing by providing these handouts is to weaken our own system and tear down our philosophy.

Mr. ANDREWS. Do you have any evidence on that, Senator FERGUSON?

Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Andrews, let me read to you from a news story from Rome in your own newspaper. I clipped it out yesterday. Barrett McGurn, your Rome correspondent, says that Italy is making little progress in rearming. I would like to quote this paragraph, "Italy has been waiting for specific orders for weapons and similar supplies from other western countries but the latter, in turn—to a large extent—have given indications that they are waiting first to see how much the United States will supply to them free of charge." Let me repeat those last three words—"free of charge."

Mr. ANDREWS. Well, your point then, Senator FERGUSON, if we can put it in a crass, materialistic sort of way, is that you don't think we're getting our money's worth out of some of these arrangements.

Senator FERGUSON. Suppose I illustrate it by talking about the Atlantic Pact, Mr. Andrews. That was supposed to assure us of a common defense. The program and plan were supposed to be made in advance of the spending of the money. Because Congress insisted on putting that provision in the plan, we find this story in your paper to be true. And we don't find agreements to implement the Atlantic Pact as Congress thought it would be implemented.

Mr. ANDREWS. Of course you know, Senator FERGUSON, that such remarks are sure to make some critics attack you as an isolationist. Do you consider yourself to be an isolationist?

Senator FERGUSON. I certainly am not, Mr. Andrews. To me, to be a real internationalist you have to think of your own nation and the other nations so that you may accomplish something for the good of all rather than just weaken the economic and political standing of your own Nation.

Mr. ANDREWS. Do you think we are weakening our stand, Senator FERGUSON?

Senator FERGUSON. We are certainly in danger of doing that. But let me pursue my thoughts on the subject a little further. A true internationalist has to be a realist. He must work to bring about a better world in fact and not just on the fancy charts of the State Department. The test should be—will this, in fact, bring about a real world peace. Sometimes I think that the give-away boys at the State Department are thinking more about their pretty charts and their precious jobs than they are about the overriding question—will our program bring peace.

Mr. ANDREWS. I don't think Secretary Acheson is going to love you for that remark, Senator FERGUSON.

Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Andrews, it isn't a question of what Mr. Acheson and I think of each other. It's a question of accomplishing the aims of the American people in actually bringing about peace in the world. I think the American people want blunt language used in the present situation. I think they are tired of diplomatic double talk and of these proposals to spend and spend and spend without first finding out what we and the other nations are going to get out of the spending in a concrete way. We in Congress must speak out and be frank in all our discussions.

I've tried to be brutally frank in my answers this evening, and I'll say right here and now that I believe I am expressing the opinions of the vast majority of the people in my State of Michigan and in the Nation. If the people of Michigan or of the Nation don't agree with me, I'd like to hear from them. They can reach me with a letter or postcard sent to the Senate Office Building.

Mr. ANDREWS. I'll tell you what I'll do, Senator FERGUSON, I'll drop around in a week or so and see what your mail does show. It ought to be interesting.

Senator FERGUSON. The point is, Mr. Andrews, that we in Congress try to keep an open mind on these problems. And that—I am sorry to say—is more than the State Department and the President try to do, judging from the way they go after anyone who has the temerity to dispute anything they say. That's why I've been criticized for wanting to reexamine some of their programs and why I've been called a reexaminist.

Address by Hon. Henry Cabot Lodge, Jr., in Reply to Mr. Andrei Vishinsky, Soviet Delegate

OF

HON. HERBERT R. O'CONOR

OF MARYLAND

Tuesday, November 28 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. O'CONOR. Mr. President, during the session of the Political and Security Committee of the United Nations General Assembly at Lake Success, N. Y., the able junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], in his capacity as a United States delegate, made a reply to the slander which the Soviet delegate, Mr. Andrei Vishinsky, had been heaping upon the United States. I consider Senator LODGE as admirably suited for the all-important assignment he accepted and the country is fortunate in having a proven statesman of such worth and dependability at this difficult post. Apparently Senator LODGE found the weak place in the Soviet armor and left the Soviet delegate without a reply. According to the Associated Press correspondent, Mr. Vishinsky's face flushed red. This speech appears to have been such an effective way to deal with the Soviets that I ask unanimous consent to have this verbatim report of it printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY THE HONORABLE HENRY CABOT LODGE, JR., UNITED STATES DELEGATE TO THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY, IN THE POLITICAL AND SECURITY COMMITTEE

I realize that the hour is getting late, and I shall not detain the committee very long. I do want to say at the outset that this is the first time that I have ever served as a representative to the United Nations, and I want, first of all, to say how honored I am to be serving here in this assemblage of distinguished men from all over the world. Perhaps because this is my first time, my impressions may be typical of those of the everyday citizen. It is certainly as an everyday citizen and not as an expert that I speak.

Of course, you can understand that during the past years I have read carefully the accounts of previous sessions, and I expected, therefore, when I came here to hear my country accused of being a capitalist-dominated, crude, and illegal gang of warmongers.

But to expect to hear these things and to have read them in print is one thing, and actually to sit here and hear these things said is a very different thing.

I have spent substantially all of my life in the United States. I have traveled some. I have been overseas during the war, but for 25 years I have been active in journalism and in American politics, and all I can say is that the things I have heard said here today and during the last few days about the United States are just completely belied by my own experience.

Let me give examples of a few statements which struck me. I heard the representative of the Soviet Union (Mr. Vishinsky) say—this was 3 or 4 days ago—that he wants peace and understanding with the United States. But when you think, if only for 1 minute, of the insults which he saw fit to heap on the United States and the way in which he impugns and questions our motives, you cannot honestly believe that his speech was the speech of a man who really wanted peace. No one who really wants peace with someone else begins by insulting him.

Then he said—and I think I am quoting him accurately—that "force is the foundation of the American foreign policy." Yet he knows perfectly well that the United States at the end of hostilities in 1945 not merely demobilized but actually disintegrated its armed forces—and you all know that—thereby, incidentally, facilitating the territorial expansion of the Soviet Union, which is without precedent in all our human history. That is just as clear as the blue in the United Nations flag.

He spoke today of the use of Japanese troops in Korea, which I sincerely believe to be without any foundation whatever. I do not think he can produce proof of it.

Then I heard the representative of the Soviet Union and his colleague from Poland—Mr. Wierblowski—speak with a lump in their collective throats of the horror of the atomic bomb—which is certainly very true and very real—without ever uttering a word about the horrors of being stuck in the stomach with a bayonet or of being shot by a rifle bullet, or by an artillery shell, or of being overrun by a tank. I heard not a word about the horrors of drowning because your ship had been torpedoed by a submarine. Not even a syllable was uttered about the terrors of the concentration camp and the unspeakable slavery of a police state.

I also heard some interesting figures about the United States preparedness effort. We have a saying in the United States that there are lies and lies and statistics, and you can prove almost anything you want to by figures. If you want to take United States appropriations for military purposes as a percentage of the Federal budget, you can make it look very big. I think that if you take the percentage which the United States preparedness effort is of the per capita income of the everyday citizen, which is what he lives by, I think you will find that that is a much smaller percentage than is the case in the Soviet Union. I am quoting from memory now, but I think I could prove it accurately and will be glad to do so later: that about 5 percent of the per capita income of United States citizens goes into military expenses, and I think the corresponding figure is about 14 percent in the case of the Soviet Union.

But let us forget about those statistics because they are not what matters when one considers military affairs. What matters of course is not the dollars or the rubles; it is the military power. And everyone in this room knows that even if this preparedness effort that the free nations are engaged in attains its maximum potential way beyond what is planned—that even then it could never have any offensive capabilities against the Soviet Union. Every child knows that.

I heard the Soviet Union representative say that the Berlin railway strike of May and June 1949 was inspired by the United States. I understand that this strike was inspired by nobody other than the 16,000 strikers themselves who had a legitimate wage grievance. They were workers who lived in the western sector of Berlin but who were paid in East German marks. This currency was no good to them in west Berlin, and they asked to have their wages paid to them in west Berlin marks. The Berlin railway system, as you know, is controlled from the Soviet sector of the city. From what I am told, the Soviet Union authorities refused this demand of the workers, and the workers went out on strike. I do not suppose it is surprising that those who come from countries which do not permit workers to strike should blame the United States for starting a legitimate wage dispute. The fact is that the strike was eventually settled on the basis of a United States formula which guaranteed the workers payment in West German marks. That is just as illustration of what I have in mind by accuracy.

Then, I heard both the Soviet Union and the Polish representative speak of America as monopolistic, when actually, one of the great basic economic facts about America—and that is something which you can all verify for yourselves—is that it is a competitive country in which monopoly is actually against the law. If I were to choose one word with which to describe our American economy, I would use "competitive" rather than "capitalistic." I do not deny that occasionally Americans, like all human beings, do not seek to prevent competition; but in this country, when you try to prevent competition you know you are doing something illegal and will be punished if caught.

Now I know that we in the United States are not perfect. Perhaps I can tell the representatives of the Soviet Union and Poland things that are right in the United States and more things that are wrong than they know about. But in this country we are working all the time to improve conditions, and I know we have made progress.

I have cited just a few examples of some of the statements which have been made in this committee. The men who made these statements appear to be normal men who obviously must know that these particular statements to which I have just referred are absurd. It would be easy and perhaps natural, therefore, for me to dismiss these speeches as merely a cynical and insincere collection of deliberate lies. But I do not do that.

The strange thing is that I think the spokesmen of the Soviet Union and Poland and the Ukrainian S. S. R. (Mr. Boranofsky) actually believe parts of that strange grab bag of news clippings about the United States, from which they quote so constantly. I saw the Polish representative waving a copy of an American magazine here a few days ago which contained an article which happened to suit the argument that he was making at that time. He did so with an expression of triumph on his face. I think his sensation of triumph was genuine and real for the simple reason that he does not understand what it is like to live in a country where there is free speech. If that magazine had appeared in his country, I suppose its statements would have had the consent of the Government. But in our country the magazine simply represents the editor's opinion, and most Americans take full advantage of the privilege of disagreeing with the editor. In fact, the editor very often disagrees with the owner and the man who wrote the article disagrees with the editor and the reader disagrees with the man who wrote the article.

That is the way it is over here. We are a talkative people. We talk all the time. Perhaps we talk too much for our own good. But to pick out something which someone has said in Tampa, Fla., or out in Iowa, or anywhere else, and to say that that represents the United States of America is just fanciful.

I think that some of you representatives from the Soviet Union and Poland and the Ukrainian S. S. R. really believe that we are monopolistic. You believe it because you come from the world's greatest monopoly, and you just cannot imagine anything else. You also have a Politburo in which power is concentrated in just a dozen men, and you just cannot believe that power is so diffused in this country as it actually is. I believe that the ridiculous fairy tales about domination springs from the simple fact that you live in a dominated society and therefore cannot conceive of a society which is not dominated by somebody. You keep looking around all the time to see who is dominating this country. Well, there is no one.

You have made me wonder—and I say this in all sincerity—during the last few days whether you are not really frightened. Maybe you are frightened of us. Maybe you are frightened of the plain people in your own country. But I know that a frightened man can be dangerous. I am sorry there is fright, and I hope and believe that the time will come when fear will disappear, and that that time will not be far off.

I read recently in former Prime Minister Churchill's memoirs that when Mr. Molotov came to stay at Mr. Churchill's official residence during the war he had a pistol beside his bed at all times. Well, there is a certain amount of fear in all countries and in most individuals; but in many nations which are represented here—notably those nations composed of people who value their freedom—fear is not the prime motive of those who hold responsible positions.

Obviously the policies which you advocate here would be very bad for the world if it should happen to adopt them. But I cannot see how, in the long run, these policies will help the people in your own countries. The people of your countries need friends; every man needs friends. They need friends in the outside world, just as the people of our country and of all countries need friends. Now, I have been here since September 18, and I have talked with many earnest, idealistic, and sincere men and women—some of them in this room—who represent many different countries and who would sincerely like to have an efficient working arrangement with the Russian people. But you have rebuffed them; you have turned them down; you have made it impossible for people who would like to do so to cooperate with you. Your policies are certainly unpredictable, and there may be some tactical advantage in that fact, but I cannot think that the alienation of friends throughout the world is intelligent.

You may be here as members of the United Nations in a purely cynical spirit, so that you can destroy it from within and thus promote your own form of world government. I get the extraordinary impression, however, of a mixture of the conspiratorial and the childish.

As to whether all this helps your own ruling class, I cannot judge.

I believe it is unquestionably bad for the long-range interests of the everyday men, women, and children of the Soviet Union, Poland, and other countries which are now in similar circumstances.

I am confident that the condition which exists in the world is not going to last much longer, because the people of the free world whom you have finally aroused will, in a completely peaceful and orderly way, and within a very few years, create a quiet and peaceful world in which disputes will be settled by negotiation and other peaceful methods set forth in the Charter, rather than by the threat or use of force. I think that time is coming.

We hope the day will come when the oppression of religion in the Soviet Union will stop; when the creative energies of that brilliant and gifted Russian people will be released: when the Russian people will be able to mingle freely with people of other lands; and when the people of the rest of Europe will no longer live in terror of the Red army.

My advice is: Stop being afraid.

There has been some talk here of the great powers versus the small powers. We Americans are not a great power in the sense that we like power or that we have sought it. We are essentially little people whose ancestors came here from countries where they had been oppressed, so that they could get away from power politics and live quiet lives of their own. We are becoming powerful, but we are not going to use that power as some others have used it in the past. We will use it, with the other peace-loving nations, to create permanent peace, and, whether the dictators like it or not, that will be a blessing to all of suffering humanity, both in and out of the free world.

Statement by Hon. Henry Cabot Lodge, Jr., of Massachusetts, Before the United Nations Committee on Complaint of India Regarding Discrimination Against Indians by South Africa

OF
HON. LEVERETT SALTONSTALL
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, November 28 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], United States delegate to the General Assembly of the United Nations, before Committee I, on the complaint of India on discrimination against Indians by South Africa.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

We confront here in this committee of the General Assembly of the United Nations a complaint that persons are being discriminated against because of race and color.

The American position on this question was basic to the very birth of our Republic and is completely clear today.

It is found in the Declaration of Independence which proclaims that "All men are created equal."

It is clearly expressed in our Constitution which gives us the thundering mandate "to establish justice" and which says that no person, regardless of whether he is a citizen, shall be deprived of life or liberty without due process of law.

It lays at the heart of the issue for which we fought a 4-year civil war of unprecedented—and perhaps unequaled—bloodshed and suffering.

The wiping out of discrimination and the enactment of civil rights has been one of the most dynamic purposes of American society, which we have continued to pursue since the Civil War.

It is solemnly announced as a prime objective by both of our great political parties.

No one knows the race or the color of the unknown soldier who is buried in our national cemetery at Arlington. And everyone knows his sacrifice.

Of course, no nation and no people are perfect either as regards discrimination or any other social evil. Americans are not perfect. Possibly the Republic of India, is not perfect insofar as discrimination is concerned. But we Americans, to use the words which Mrs. Pandit applied to her own country, "work unceasingly to end discrimination in every form." The regrettable fact that there is still some discrimination in the United States or in India certainly does not debar us from saying that we deplore discrimination, wherever it may be practiced. Our American system contains a principle of correction. In our country racial discrimination has no future. The truth is that we have hitched our wagon to a star. We have not reached the star, but we move toward it.

This is not just a self-serving view. The people in the United States who are most closely affected—the colored people themselves—attest to the fact that while we have not gone far enough or fast enough, we have made great strides ahead. No less an authority than Mr. Roy Wilkins, administrator of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, stated on June 20 of this year, in Boston, Mass., "The people of America are responding. The tide is going our way. It is no longer fashionable to believe in inequality, or to be unconcerned about it. There have been changes—some of them revolutionary—in great organized bodies of citizens, in scores of organizations, and in hundreds of communities. The idea has caught on. The people are moving toward equality of opportunity."

We hope that our friends in South Africa, whose sons are now fighting heroically for the United Nations in Korea, will move with us in that same direction.

I am not going into the legal and technical questions concerning whatever actual and concrete powers the United Nations may possess in a matter of this kind and will not challenge in detail the well-expressed argument of the delegation of the Union of South Africa on these aspects. It does seem clear, as a matter of common sense, that discrimination on grounds of race and color are contrary to the spirit of the Charter, and that there is certainly nothing in the Charter which prohibits or discourages the United Nations from making a declaration of sentiment on such a subject. Indeed, the contrary could be cogently argued. It seems equally clear that common sense also indicates that the wiping out of discrimination cannot be effectively imposed by force from without, and that the best chance for progress lies in moving the hearts of men.

The United States delegation hopes that progress will be made and that it will be sure and steady. We will welcome all reports of progress from whatever part of the world they may come—from the United States, from the Union of South Africa, and from India, or elsewhere.

Whatever the legal flaws of any pending proposal may be, this is not essentially a legal question. It is a burning question which goes to the fundamentals of man's humanity to man. It is a spiritual question on which massive statements have been made in many of the world's great religions.

We are men of many faiths here. For us who are Christians, St. Paul said: "There is neither Jew nor Greek, there is neither bond nor free, there is neither male nor female; for ye are all one in Christ Jesus." In the Bible, the Book of Leviticus tells us: "But the stranger that dwelleth with you shall be unto you as one born among you, and thou shalt love him as thyself."

For you who are Buddhists, there is the declaration, "All men are equal."

For you who are Hindus the Bhagavad Gita says: "Those whose minds are thus set on equality have even here overcome their being. God is pure, and is the same in all. Therefore, they are established in God."

For you who are Jews it is written in your ancient books: "The heathen is thy neighbor, thy brother; to wrong him is to sin."

For you who are Moslems the Koran quotes God as saying: "We have divided you into tribes and nations for greater facility of intercourse and recognition among you; the most honored among you in the sight of God is the one who leads the most righteous life." The Prophet says: "Men are all equal like the fingers of a hand," and "You are all descended from Adam, and Adam was created out of clay."

Mr. President, these are voices to which the United Nations cannot turn a deaf ear.

I understand that representatives of all three parties have expressed their earnest desire to find a peaceful way.

The United States delegation favors the initiative by the delegation of Brazil, supported by the delegations of Bolivia, Denmark, Norway, and Sweden. As the distinguished delegate from Brazil pointed out in submitting his resolution, it is our concern to employ all our diligence and resources to bring about a permanent and satisfactory solution to this matter.

If we are to give real meaning to our obligations under the Charter, we must continue to encourage the parties to thresh out their differences in the light of the broad aims of the Charter, and to hope that with patience and understanding those persons, whether Indian, Pakistani, or South African, who have direct responsibilities for these matters will respond to the initiative of the Assembly in the same spirit which prompted it.

Address by National Commander of the American Legion Before Indianapolis Chamber of Commerce

OF
HON. HOMER E. CAPEHART
OF INDIANA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, November 28 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD the text of an address delivered by Erle Cocke, Jr., national commander of the American Legion, at the annual Indianapolis Chamber of Commerce appreciation luncheon, at Indianapolis, Ind., on November 13, 1950.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

My fellow Americans this annual luncheon given by the Indianapolis Chamber of Commerce to the leaders of the American Legion is always a happy occasion. It is founded on the great American virtues of friendliness and good fellowship. These are qualities desperately needed in our troubled world today.

It takes friendship to produce good fellowship. It takes good fellowship to make a good neighborhood. It takes good neighborhoods to make a good Nation. It takes good nations to make a good world.

Our common objective here today is to make the whole world a good neighborhood. In that cause all of us here are earnestly united. We all want human freedom enshrined in enduring peace.

But we are living in a world that has been split in two by evil forces—the forces of hatred, of greed and of lust for power—as represented by the sinister philosophy of communism whose chief apostle is Soviet Russia. The ruthless men behind this pagan doctrine of communism believe only in force. They consider good will and friendliness only as signs of weakness to be taken advantage of. By their own pronouncements they have declared that any means justify their ends and thus have removed all basis of integrity and trust in which free men of good will could achieve an area of peaceful understanding with them.

What I am about to say here today may come as a shock to some of you. My purpose is to shock you. My talk here can serve no better purpose than to wake up all the people. Do not consider the American Legion militaristic or me as an alarmist. Remember that we of the American Legion have a right to be more realistic. We know war at first hand. This gives us a clearer perspective of things as they really are. In talking about war and danger of war we do not concern ourselves with impractical idealism or wishful thinking. We deal with real conditions.

There are certain grim facts which every American must recognize today as the ABC's of American survival.

Soviet Russia is our deadly enemy.

Soviet Russia is also the deadly enemy of human freedom everywhere.

Soviet Russia is pursuing a master plan for world conquest.

The war lords of Soviet Russia are using communism only as a tool of world enslavement. It is the most effective tool ever used by any dictator because it is the most versatile tool ever invented. It can be made to mean so many different things to so many different classes and masses. That is why communism has been so successful in creating red fifth columns everywhere. But we must never forget that the driving urge behind communism is Russian imperialism.

Finally, every American must realize that the United Nations cannot save us from the perils of communism. But a strong America can save the United Nations.

Only a strong America—which means an America safe to be with—can serve as the international rallying point for free men and women everywhere in a united and a successful resistance to expanding world communism.

This, my fellow-Americans, is the logic behind the American Legion's 1951 peace through strength program.

In fighting for American strength for peace by compulsion—and that is the only way in which we can make sure of peace—the American Legion asks:

1. Enactment by Congress without further delay of a universal military training law as the manpower framework of a modern American defense establishment plus immediate total mobilization of our Armed Forces to a full war footing. We need the full draft to meet our immediate peril. We need UMT for the long pull as the most effective and least costly system of maintaining necessary national preparedness. The American Legion believes we are on the brink of world war III. We believe that only our immediate total mobilization will discourage Communist leaders from starting a total war.

2. Strengthening of our own internal security through the strict enforcement of the new Communist-control law to the end of at least immobilizing every Communist beachhead in the United States. If we are going to have to fight Soviet Russia, we don't want to be faced at the same time with the necessity of fighting a vicious red fifth column at home.

3. Curtailment or elimination of every possible public and private nonessential expenditure.

From now on national security must have first call upon our national wealth. Our Government must take the lead in drastic reductions in all non-defense costs. Our people must follow the Government's lead.

American dollars must become fighting dollars. They will have no business for a long time to come, jingling as spare cash in individual pockets.

We can never shrink from the cost of the defense of our freedom, however stupendous it may be. The only alternative is life upon our bended knees as slaves of an alien dictator.

It is part of Soviet Russia's master plan to increase the cost of our defense to ruinous proportions in the hope we will spend ourselves into disaster. Joe Stalin is counting on our economic bankruptcy. He believes fondly this is the surest and safest way of destroying America without the firing of one Russian gun by a Russian soldier.

This is a threat which can only be met by American willingness to undergo unprecedented individual and collective sacrifices. The American way of life has always been luxurious. We shall have to settle for an American way of life that can remain free only if it becomes frugal.

This is the rugged path that stretches ahead of all of us. We are facing record taxes, increasing Government controls, and growing civilian shortages. There is no relief in sight. If we escape total war in the immediate future, we shall face years of continuing international tensions and recurring national emergencies. We cannot pass this sternest of all tests of our patriotism on a basis of politics as usual, business as usual, pleasure as usual, and spending as usual. All of us must return to the old-fashioned American virtues of hard work, thrift, and sacrifice. We must not tolerate shirkers in our midst.

There are, I am sorry to say, not only shirkers in America today but actually men who call themselves Americans and yet who for a "fast buck" are willing to sell out our country.

I am referring to merchants, brokers, exporters and shippers who are trading with our enemies. They consider it clever to find loopholes in our laws and in our export license regulations to carry on commerce with Communist nations. These men may be within the law but they are traitors to America. They should be dealt with as enemies.

These renegade Americans are supplying Red China with copper, steel, oil, armor plate, machine tools, scrap, and other supplies which help build up Communist war machines. They are helping to load the guns with which American soldiers are being killed.

Government officials who connive with these blackguards or whose stupidity permits this criminal trading are guilty of diplomatic murder. Their excuse is, "Are we at war with China?" Such officials are morally bankrupt, intellectually deficient, and patriotically degraded. They should be instantly dismissed and branded for life as unfit for any public office.

The devious subterfuges by which these shipments are made to Chinese Communists and the manner in which bureaucratic knaves condone this trading were exposed in recent newspaper articles. Every loyal American should protest this arming of our enemies to his Senator and to his Congressman in strongest terms. Senator HERBERT R. O'CONOR, of Maryland, is opening closed committee hearings on this trading with Red China in Washington today.

This unscrupulous trading with Red China is particularly perfidious at this time. We are living in fateful hours. Red China has intervened in North Korea. The Kremlin gang's most fervent desire is to embroil us in a large-scale war with Red China. We have nothing to gain in such a war. Russia has everything to gain. We cannot match China's manpower. China is not our real enemy. Soviet Russia is. An all-out war with China can only bleed us to the point where the big Red army of Soviet Russia can flatten us like a steam roller. We could kill millions of Chinese and drop A-bombs on Chinese cities. The net result would be that we would only weaken China to make her more amenable to Moscow direction, lose countless precious American lives, spend hundreds of billions of dollars, and deplete our stock of atomic weapons. In the end, if we did win such a war, what would the victory profit us? We'd still have Soviet Russia to deal with.

Red China is only a symptom of world disease. No responsible surgeon would dare endanger the life of a critically ill patient by trying to cure the symptoms. No responsible businessman would attempt to solve a serious financial problem by quarreling with his chamber of commerce.

The intelligent approach to any problem, and particularly to the problem of survival, is to determine the exact cause of the problem and deal with the cause.

The time for that resolute and drastic action has come.

The sooner we serve notice on Soviet Russia that we will not fight any more satellites which she elects to "sick" on us but shall hold Moscow responsible for any further aggression and use all of our strength to destroy the breeding place of world trouble the better off we will be.

It is useless to make threats unless we can carry them out.

But this is a threat which our survival demands. We must build our strength to make such a threat good. That demands immediate mobilization of our Armed Forces to full war strength, immediate enactment of UMT, a tough policy toward all Communists and traitors at home, and a full realization and patriotic willingness to bear the burden of sacrifice which this "operation survival" requires.

We must condition ourselves for the most savage period in all of our history. But how many of us have given serious thought to the twilight which is descending on our American way of life? How many of you businessmen have discussed this at lunch, instead of business as usual? How many of our civic, fraternal, professional, business, labor, and other groups have pondered the immediate perils that beset us all? How many of us have made our opinions known to our Members of Congress?

Let's make it clear to the world that we are united on a resolute program of peace through strength.

America is a nation of free Americans. Here the individual counts. We are living in a land of the free because it has always been the home of the brave.

We can keep it that way, all of us together, with God's help. We can do it because the most important part of the word "American" always has been found in the last four letters, which spell "I can."

German Rearmament—What Do the Germans Really Think?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JACOB K. JAVITS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, November 27, 1950

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, the appended article from the November 19, 1950, edition of This Week reveals the necessity for proceeding with wisdom and discretion on the question of rearming Germany within the framework of a western European defense force. The author, William L. Shirer, is one of our best known and most experienced correspondents and commentators:

WHAT DO THE GERMANS REALLY THINK?

(By William L. Shirer)

Over the free world's continuing concern about the problem of rearming Western Germany hangs a cloud of questions. Will the Germans be dependable partners in the struggle with the east? Are their hearts really with the west? Have they finally shed their allegiance to nazism? How do they feel about having a new German army?

Summed up, the question comes to this: What do the Germans really think?

Recently, I spent hours on end, day after day, probing the minds of Germans in Berlin and the Rhineland, and I confess that I came away not only exhausted but confused. Fortunately, we do not have to depend on the findings of one observer, or even a handful of observers, to get a picture of what postwar Germans are thinking.

For 5 years the American Government has had a team of public-opinion experts exploring the minds of the German people. Set up in 1945 as the Opinion Surveys Branch, Information Services Division of Military Government, and later, when civilian rule supplanted the military, as the Reactions Analysis Staff, Office of Public Affairs, under the High Commissioner for Germany, this group has conducted over 100 full-scale public-opinion surveys in the United States zone. The method has been interviews by a staff of 120 trained Germans supervised by 4 American professional pollsters.

Public opinion polls, as we learned from the sad experience of Messrs. Gallup and Roper in the last Presidential election, may not be an infallible basis for predicting how people will vote. But we are concerned in Germany with what people think. To determine this, scientifically designed polls covering all strata of the population have, I believe, a good deal of validity. Careful study of the surveys made in Germany over the 5 years reveals some interesting answers to our questions about a people whose government has instigated two World Wars in the lifetime of every American over 35, and the people whom now we are courting—not without certain misgivings from some of our western allies.

The most important question put to the German people by our pollsters concerned their attitude toward nazism. Did they think national socialism was a bad idea, or a good idea badly carried out? A majority of all classes, our surveyors found, firmly believe that nazism was a good idea, but badly carried out. Moreover, this majority has been growing as the Germans have had time to think the matter over. Whereas from December 1945 to November 1947, 52 percent considered Hitlerism a good idea, today 59 percent see it in that light. Conversely, the first 3 years after the war 38 percent were definitely of the opinion that nazism was a bad idea. Today only 30 percent think it was bad.

FACTS WE SHOULD NOT IGNORE

The official report of the Reactions Analysis Staff concludes rather sorrowfully: "The fact that a majority of United States zone Germans are still unaware of, or choose to avoid analysing, the intrinsic character of national socialism should not be ignored."

Not to be ignored, too, is the German attitude toward democracy and freedom, those two glories of western civilization which we Americans are willing to fight for. In three visits I have made to Germany since the end of the war I could not find much interest in democracy. When our pollsters asked the people, "Do you believe that the Germans today could actually govern themselves democratically?" less than half answered in the affirmative. A third took an outright negative view, and the rest said they had no opinion one way or the other.

"Clearly," commented our surveyors, "a large proportion of United States zone Germans lack confidence in their ability to manage their affairs in a democratic way."

From my observations I would add that they lacked not only confidence but interest. And indeed this was borne out in another survey made by the analysis staff.

POLITICS? WHO CARES!

The question asked was, "Are you yourself interested in political affairs, or do you prefer to leave that to others?" More than 60 percent were quite content to leave politics to others.

What about freedom, which we of the west hold so dear? Freedom of speech, of the press, of religion, of elections?

Hitler took these freedoms away from the Germans and in return offered economic security. My own on-the-spot observations were that the Germans did not mind this exchange too much. I always hoped that my findings were wrong. So I was interested in the answer the Germans gave to the following questions:

"Which of these types of government would you personally choose as better:

"1. A government which offers the people economic security and the possibility of a good income?

"2. A government which guarantees free elections, freedom of speech, free press, and religious freedom?"

AN ARBITRARY CHOICE

Six out of ten Germans answered they would prefer economic security to civil liberties. The choice admittedly was somewhat arbitrary. But when the same question was put to Americans an overwhelming majority said they wanted basic freedoms rather than comfortable incomes.

Asked which rights they would give up in return for economic security, most Germans indicated they would relinquish first the freedom to vote for the political party of their choice; next the freedom to read what they pleased.

It would seem, then, that our present fight for freedom in a world whose liberties are threatened by the Communist tyranny does not arouse quite the same fire in German hearts as it does in ours.

It is not that communism holds any attraction for the Germans. In a free election even the Germans in the east would reject the Communist ticket by 10 to 1. But not having tasted much freedom in their lives or, one might add, in their long history, the Germans do not covet it as dearly as Englishmen or Americans, whose experience has been of another kind.

SUPER-RACISM DECLINES

What about anti-Semitism in Germany? Did it die with Hitler? One question the American poll takers have frequently asked of Germans is: "Do you think some races are inferior to others?"

Since there are virtually no Negroes in Germany, no Red Indians or Asiatics, it is a fair surmise that most people answering the question had the Jews in mind. In 1948, 43 percent thought some races were inferior, and 46 percent thought they were not.

Today, however, only 34 percent subscribe to the theory of racial superiority. More than half—56 percent—say they do not.

Our polls have also delved into the question of war guilt. The querry: "What do you really believe was mainly responsible for the last war—Germany, other countries, or particular circumstances?"

In 1947 only a relatively small minority—26 percent—admitted to any German responsibility. The majority—55 percent—blamed the war on particular circumstances.

Since 1947 there has been some awakening on this subject. Today 37 percent—still a minority, to be sure, but a sizable one—admit Germany's responsibility for the war.

"STAB-IN-BACK" THEORY

As to why Germany was defeated, 38 percent of all Germans, according to one of our surveys, believe it was because of treachery. Whether this state of mind will eventually lead to a general belief in a "stab-in-the-back" theory, such as Hitler exploited so successfully after the First World War, remains to be seen.

At the beginning of this article I posed the question: "Are the hearts of the Germans really with the west?"

We ought never to forget that frequently in history the Germans have allied themselves with the east and with Russia—twice between the wars with Soviet Russia. Stalin has suggested that a new Russo-German alliance might dominate the world. A. J. P. Taylor, the British historian and authority on Germany, argued recently that "whosoever builds up the military power of Germany is presenting Russia with an ally."

DOUBTFUL "NO OPINIONS"

Our polls, however, indicate that the German people favor lining up with the west. Six out of 10 Germans say they are for a union of west European states. Only a handful are flatly against it, though it is significant that nearly 40 percent have no opinion.

As for the Atlantic Pact, 6 out of 10 Germans at least have heard of it, and of these three-fourths believe Germany should participate in it.

A clear majority (63 percent in the United States zone, 90 percent in western Berlin, and 76 percent in Bremen) favored German participation in a western European defensive army within the Atlantic Pact. Forty-five percent opposed an independent German army, 43 percent favored it.

This is a fairly healthy sign, it seems to me, considering what we have experienced from German militarism in the past.

The youths of Germany, who would have to do the fighting, were, to judge from talks I had with young men, much less enthusiastic about any kind of army than their elders. This was borne out by recent polls at Munich University and at Erlangen University.

WANT TO BE SOLDIERS?

"Suppose Germany had an army again—would you want to become a soldier?"

Ninety-six percent of the students at Munich and 91 percent at Erlangen replied "No." Some 70 percent of the students were war veterans; they had had enough.

The pollsters' peep into the postwar German mind reveals a people who: (1) Have not shed their leanings toward nazism; (2) do not care much about the freedoms we Americans are fighting for; (3) scarcely share our confidence in the democratic way of life; (4) do not believe Germany responsible for the last war; (5) are inclined to throw in their lot with the west, though their youth would prefer to let others do the fighting.

"Know your enemy!" the Greek philosophers used to proclaim. Perhaps it is wise to know your friends, too. To know them may spare us later disillusionment, as we found to our sorrow in the case of one of our gallant allies in the late war.

The Long Island Rail Tragedies

REMARKS

HON. W. KINGSLAND MACY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, November 27, 1950

Mr. MACY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to amplify and add to the brief comment I made yesterday on the floor of the House when calling the attention of my colleagues to the stark disaster twise striking at travelers of the Long Island Rail Road which serves my constituency.

As many of you know, on November 22, a few hours before the advent of Thanksgiving Day, 77 persons died in Kew Gardens when two trains plowed into each other, and earlier, on February 17 of this year, 33 lives were lost at Rockville Center because a veteran engineer ran through a stop signal. Besides the terrible toll taken by death, both crashes shocked and pitifully injured hundreds of persons. Both caused great financial loss in rolling stock and damage suits to a company already bankrupt and seemingly unable to furnish to its 3,000,000 users the safe and expeditious service requisite to the greatest and fastest-growing commuter area in the Nation.

The catastrophes occurred within 9 months of each other—the second before the courts had had time to review the claims of those bereft and maimed by the first. The disaster in February outraged the people of my constituency when they learned it could have been prevented by an automatic tripper device halting the train made runaway by what its tragedy-weighted engineer, when charged with manslaughter, described as his "blacking out."

The three bodies to which my county of Suffolk had a right to appeal—the Congress, the State legislature, and its board of supervisors—moved concertedly for constructive relief. Attempt was made to attack the problem from two angles. Watchfulness against the ever-present shortcomings of the individual on one hand, and on the other hand provision for perfecting mechanical safeguards. Toward that end, after long consultation with me, Assemblyman Elisha T. Barrett, of the second assembly district of Suffolk County, introduced a bill into the New York State Legislature, and I offered House Resolution 508 here in the Federal Congress. Both bill and resolution were formally endorsed unanimously by the Suffolk County Board of Supervisors.

The Albany measure, introduced in the assembly on March 7, sought to amend the State statute in relation to the authority of its public service commission to make rules and regulations concerning the operating personnel of railroads. It provided:

> At least twice in each year the commission shall review the records of all operating personnel of railroads subject to their jurisdiction and shall also establish rules and regulations requiring periodic physical examinations of all persons whose duties are such as to render them responsible for public safety. Any person whose record of violations of company or commission rules or whose physical condition is such that his continued employment would jeopardize public safety may be suspended or dismissed upon order of the commission after a hearing before the commission, or a member or duly authorized officer thereof, at which such person shall have a fair opportunity to be heard and may be represented by counsel. In any case, where an order of dismissal may be made pursuant to the provisions of this section against a person who is eligible for retirement, an order directing and compelling retirement may be made in lieu thereof.

Both the senate and the assembly at Albany disregarded the strenuous opposition of railroad union lobbyists and passed the bill, but this life-saving measure was killed by the veto of Governor Dewey. It must be small consolation to the families of the dead, maimed, and injured that the Governor felt that the bill "would produce waste and unnecessary cost," particularly since the bill was designed to guard against the very element which, according to him, was probably the cause of this latest accident—human failure.

Although long ago the legislature created a powerful public service commission delegating to that somewhat sluggish body powers comprehensive in scope, session after session it meticulously perfects the State motor vehicle law until it is now a detailed blueprint governing the every movement of passenger car and truck. Or, as was pointed out by the bill's introducer in urging Governor Dewey to affix his signature:

> Our vehicle and traffic law confers upon the commissioner of motor vehicles the power and the duty to suspend or revoke a driver's license whenever the operator is involved in an accident causing personal injury. It provides for mandatory revocation when an operator is found in serious violation of the law three times within a period of 18 months. Revocation is mandatory under our law in cases of intoxication. The law even provides for suspension and revocation in cases involving property damage where financial responsibility cannot be shown. Under the general business law we suspend or revoke a barber's license if he is found with dirty finger nails or fails to wash his hands between service to two customers. • • •
> If the situation were not so serious it would, to my mind, be ludicrous to argue that on the one hand the State should and does, exercise these rights in connection with the use of automobiles and can exercise no rights whatever in the case of an engineer or motorman driving a train on which as many as a thousand or more people are riding.

While the hope of relief within New York State ended with Governor Dewey's veto, there remained still before the Congress my own resolution, introduced on March 13, requiring the Interstate Commerce Commission to review and assure safety devices on the Long Island Rail Road. Nothing has been done to implement it, although I believe since the tragic wreck of last Wednesday, November 22, the Interstate Commerce Commission has moved into New York to make inquiry into the wreck's causes, and further, the Interstate Commerce Committee of the House has also evidenced concern.

While I am understandably glad to learn that the Commission and Committee are now at work, I am most anxious that their findings be not a mere cataloging of horror but that they become part and parcel of constructive action to avert future disasters. To that end I hope to introduce a new resolution asking that the complete disaster findings of the Interstate Commerce Commission, lest they go the way of bureaucracy, be reported to this House so that it may be certain its legislative mandate in creating titles 43–50 of the United States Code is being carried out in conformity with the intent of the Congress.

The frightfulness of the two accidents occurring on the Long Island Rail Road has pointed up the operating inadequacies of the road itself. For time long past I have been reviewing the complexities of this problem in my own mind and have made some study of the possibility of the creation by the State legislature of a functioning agency, perhaps one modeled after that of Cleveland, Chicago, or Detroit, or one that would function along the lines of the Boston metropolitan transportation district with proportioned taxes paid by the five counties traversed by the road. It is my belief—and I throw it out only for studious consideration and not as a final conviction—that the Boston type of operation might be the more suitable. Corollary to this, it occurs to me that the New York Port Authority, a farsighted and sound body established by the legislature for the express purpose of getting people in and out of New York City, might expand its field of usefulness to include operation of the Long Island Rail Road, either directly or collaterally in an advisory capacity.

Inasmuch as Mayor Vincent R. Impelletteri, of the city of New York, is vitally interested in the problems presented by the Long Island Railroad, which pours hundreds of thousands of commuters in and out of Manhattan, Brooklyn, and Queens daily, I have laid my thought before him as the executive officer of three of the five great counties concerned, communicating with him under date of November 24, as follows:

> MY DEAR MR. MAYOR: The fact the Long Island Rail Road serves many governmental units has to date made it the headache of all and the responsibility of none. So long as the road could operate successfully as the venture of private capital, there was reason for the public's latent hope that some day, somehow, the railroad would improve. Since, however, the company has functioned under section 77B of the bankruptcy act since March 19, 1949, and there is no apparent rush of private investors to purchase it, it would appear that eventually it will be encumbent upon the municipalities interested to review at least the problem of the road's continuance.
> It is my belief that there should be created a metropolitan transportation district, with power to levy taxes apportioned countywise upon use. Inasmuch as the Long Island is geared principally as a vehicle for getting people in and out of New York City, the New York Port Authority, created for that very purpose, might be directed to study the feasibility of expanding its field of usefulness to include operation of the road, either directly or collaterally in an advisory capacity.
> Legislation fashioned perhaps along the lines of the Boston metropolitan transportation district might offer a workable solution for a worsening condition in traffic that cannot but adversely affect your two great counties of Kings and Queens as well as the counties of Nassau and Suffolk, to say nothing of creating a frightening situation where the very lives of the travelling public may continue in jeopardy because of management necessarily more limited in scope.

The conveyance of your opinion as mayor to me in this matter would be very much valued, particularly at this time when we are so shocked by Wednesday's disaster.

Faithfully yours,

W. KINGSLAND MACY.

Whatever solution is developed for the traffic problem involved in the continuance of the Long Island Rail Road, the first and foremost of the needs of the travelling public on Long Island is safety. To that end we must work tirelessly and concertedly.

Some Thoughts on United Nations Day

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, November 27, 1950

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, in connection with United Nations Day, which we celebrated on October 24, 1950, the thoughts of most people throughout the world turned to problems of peace and security now and in the future. While many of us think of such matters hopefully, few among us bother to put our thoughts down on paper. One of those who did is A. D. Whiteside, president of Dun & Bradstreet, Inc., the noted mercantile agency of New York, and the result was a most stimulating letter containing thought-provoking ideas. His letter follows:

GENTLEMEN: I have just come home from bass fishing on a small lake in Sudbury, Vt., where I have been going for years.

This year everything there seemed to be as it had always been, particularly at daybreak when the water was as usual glassy smooth under a gently drifting mist with only an occasional ripple where shiners surfaced over the weeds.

There is something about being alone in the early morning on a small, secluded lake surrounded by hills and dense woods which creates a sense of security and peace—something which made it unreal to think that the permanence we had always felt about our future could be in imminent and terrible danger with no apparent assurance of security for years to come.

While I was there I thought of all that I knew about which had happened since the First World War. And I came to the conviction that if we as a Nation profit by our past experience under war conditions and plan without fear or confusion, we will find, possibly without war, the way to even greater security and contentment for all people in the future than we have ever thought possible in the past.

For at the present time, only one nation in the world stands in the way.

Only Russia shuts the world out, and only our moral and military strength can save the free peoples until they are strong enough to defend themselves, or until the United Nations is functioning fully and able to enforce international justice and world peace.

We have learned from bitter experience in two world wars that we cannot win peace through military victories, and we know now, what we did not understand before, that we could never have won permanent peace until the people of all the nations on earth had become free to determine their own form of government and to enact their own laws recognizing the rights of minorities.

As it is now we can fight if we must for an ideal—for a world of free people working through a world organization dedicated to and able to maintain permanent peace and justice—not as conditions were when a League of Nations was conceived in a world of materialism and balances of power as in the past—not to punish an aggressor—or merely to defeat Russia.

Those two World Wars may not have been futile for they have brought about a world situation which makes it possible to realize that ideal and ultimate aim of civilization. With that purpose clearly and convincingly conveyed to all people, we will accept the sacrifices we must endure to make all people free, and to insure ourselves and the generations to come against another war or domination by Russia or any other nation in the future.

It is possible to win this struggle for world freedom without war.

For we are not opposed by inspired, clear thinking, farsighted men, by overwhelming economic or military strength or by a philosophy of life which will spread throughout the world unless supported by force or by our own failure to meet the issues before the entire world.

The men of the Kremlin may have already made irrevocable mistakes.

They have been constantly predicting an economic collapse in this country since 1946, and have calculated heavily upon that collapse to result in widespread unemployment and disorders, to be followed by cuts in our assistance to other free nations and reductions in our military program.

They have probably made a far greater blunder in instigating the Korean aggression. It may prove to have been an irreparable mistake, just as the Kaiser was defeated because he ordered unrestricted submarine warfare which forced us into World War I, and as Hitler was because he invaded and devastated Russia and encouraged Japan to attack us at Pearl Harbor.

The Russians unquestionably expected, by selecting small divided Korea for the first satellite move, that either we would not fight or if we did fight, be compelled to carry on a long-drawn-out affair which would result in our losing face in all Eurasia and in shaking the confidence of the western nations.

Our immediate defense of South Korea followed by our swift and brilliant, strategic counterattacks within 90 days after the invasion, have had the reverse effect on both the east and west, and undoubtedly have lowered the prestige of Russia and greatly added to our own throughout the world.

But far and away the most serious adverse result to Russia from the North Korean attack has been the effect on the people of the United States. Since the end of the last war until that attack, we had been apathetic toward our defense program, and we may have been on the verge of an inflationary rise followed by a reaction which could have influenced us to delay making adequate military preparations.

Those blunders of Stalin, or the Soviet Politburo or both, have convinced the world that Russian leadership is far from infallible, for they may have prematurely exposed their intentions and their pattern of tactics to the entire world.

Now that Soviet objectives are clearly understood, in self-interest we are compelled to assume the responsibility of joining others in protecting the rest of the free world from aggression, for we cannot indefinitely exist alone against a world dominated by Russia.

And as our military power is absolutely dependent upon our economic and productive strength, the soundness of our nonmilitary or civilian economy must be maintained irrespective of the length of time the Russian menace lasts.

With this imperative need of maintaining a sound economy, we must exert our ingenuity and resourcefulness to superimpose as much of the military programs as possible upon the civilian economy until our total productive capacity, material supply, and labor force is expanded to meet our combined requirements, for in the final analysis our civilian economy must support our entire military program, our Government expenditures of every nature both here and abroad and continue to maintain adequate civilian living standards.

Somehow I cannot believe that an all-out war with Russia is inevitable.

Before that could happen, we will have voiced to the people of the world, clearly and comprehensibly, the fundamental issues irrevocably separating us and all free nations from the Kremlin with its expressed attitude toward other nations.

When we make them, our statements should be comparable in simplicity and in spiritual values with our own Declaration of Independence and the Charter of the United Nations, and be directed specifically to each of our basic differences with Russian intentions as expressed through the Politburo in terms understandable to people in every walk of life.

Every principle enunciated in either document should be translated as to its effect upon the daily life of every person and every nation.

We have fought two wars to end war for all time, and now we are confronted with the threat of a war far more terrible than in the past, but if we are forced to fight again, we will not fight for a visionary or utopian ideal but a reality, and we will fight with the moral and tangible support of most of an organization, now in being, of most of 60 nations against which Russia now stands alone among her satellites.

Since 1776, to every American the Stars and Stripes have symbolized the destiny of the Nation. From 1950 on, to the people of the world, the United Nations flag will symbolize the destiny of all nations, as the flag of each member of the United Nations bears equal value with the flag of every other nation large or small.

It would seem at the moment that this generation will see what was a utopian dream of the past come true—universal disarmament, predicated upon free contact and communication between the people of all nations.

It is not unreasonable to believe that in the not distant future all nations, joined through the United Nations, will live in a period of unending peace based upon international justice. And every flag of every nation will be a symbol of progress toward a type of world civilization which up to this time could not have been sensibly visualized.

It may be that the date of the North Korean aggression will prove, in retrospect, to have been the turning point in the present world crisis.

Sincerely yours,

A. D. WHITESIDE,
President.

National Education Program on Behalf of the Congress of the United States

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALEXANDER WILEY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, November 28 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD information relative to a national educational program on behalf of the Congress of the United States and the work of its Members.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NOVEMBER 27, 1950.

MY DEAR SENATOR WILEY: You will agree that ours will be a stronger Nation if there is better understanding of our Congress and our Government. We have undertaken an educational project that will try to assist you in your work as a Member, and will create a better public appreciation of our Congress.

A group of veteran newsmen who have observed Congress in action for many years have pooled their ideas on how to help our legislators. The result is formation of the Committee for Congress, to sponsor a national study program on Congress, in schools, churches, colleges, clubs, factories, wherever people assemble who are interested in the national welfare.

The primary medium through which the Committee for Congress will work is Your Congress Magazine, a copy of which is enclosed with our compliments. Future issues will carry more articles but this copy outlines the present project on the cover pages.

Various segments of American leadership have indicated their willingness to head up this worthy endeavor. We have assurances of financial support. We will, of course, need your encouragement and moral support, and your active participation whenever possible. Would you kindly comment on this undertaking so that we can use your remarks as the basis for, or part of articles, in forthcoming issues.

Yours truly,

HAL J. MILLER,
Editor, Your Congress Magazine; Executive Director, The Committee for Congress, Sponsor of the National Congress Study Council.

COMMITTEE FOR CONGRESS LAUNCHES NATIONAL EDUCATIONAL PROGRAM—YOUR CONGRESS MAGAZINE IS DEDICATED TO CREATING A WIDER APPRECIATION AND UNDERSTANDING OF THE VITAL WORK OF THE CONGRESS AND THE GOVERNMENT OF THE UNITED STATES

Your Congress Magazine is the keystone of a new and much-needed educational and public relations program sponsored by the Committee for Congress, founded by veteran observers of the United States Senate and House of Representatives. This program will seek to strengthen and sustain our democratic, representative republican form of government.

COMMITTEE FOR CONGRESS

Founding members of the Committee for Congress are: Joseph Young, newspaperman and author; Duncan Aikman, author; Maj. Gen. Henry J. Reilly, former editor of the Army and Navy Journal; William A. Eddy, businessman; Russell McFarland, magazine writer; Homer Joseph Dodge, newspaperman and publicist; Felix Cotton, nationally known correspondent; Walter Green, newspaperman; and the publishers of Your Congress magazine, Hal J. Miller and Virginia E. Miller.

The permanent membership of the Committee for Congress will comprise leading representatives of all segments of the American economy.

It is a true but somewhat disconcerting fact that as our Nation faces the greatest crisis in its history, our people are actually apathetic about Congress and its work.

This indifference is one of the greatest problems confronting our country today. We must protect this greatest bulwark of our American system of government with a permanent, sustained, and carefully planned educational and public relations program.

The ignorance that prevails about our Congress and Government is appalling. Our schools and colleges teach civics, yet these teachings are not always reflected in an alert, informed electorate that understands Congress and our Government.

AWARENESS LACKING

The press, radio, and television do good jobs in their fields, yet the number of people who vote in proportion to the number of eligible voters shows that our citizens lack an awareness of the compelling, personal importance of understanding Congress and its work.

Because of this situation, a committee for Congress has been formed by a group of veteran observers of our congressional system, who believe that one of our national weaknesses is the failure of many Americans to understand their Congress, its Members, and how they can make a direct contribution to the success of its deliberations and enactments.

The Committee for Congress has launched a Nation-wide educational and public relations program for our Congress that is designed to bring home to every American the realization that our representative, democratic, republican form of government is the best in the world.

While our troops are engaging the enemy on foreign battle fronts, our citizens must oppose insidious enemies of democracy, ignorance of and apathy toward our Congress and Government, with the twin weapons of education and sound public relations techniques.

CONGRESS STUDY COUNCIL

The committee for Congress has sponsored the formation of the National Congress Study Council, which will endeavor to set up individual study groups throughout the land, in schools, colleges, women's clubs, service clubs, business and labor groups, community and social groups, and for men and women in the Armed Forces, at home and on foreign battlefronts.

Your Congress magazine and the study program will also be available to industrial firms for employee education.

One medium through which the committee for Congress and the National Congress Study Council will work to achieve better understanding of our legislative processes is Your Congress magazine. This is a brand-new, independent publication, patterned after the 30-year-old Pictorial Directory of Congress. In addition, radio, television, and motion pictures will be used in this educational work.

The publishers of Your Congress magazine have offered to donate the publication to any foundation or qualified educational organization that would finance or carry through this project on a nonpartisan, public-service basis.

NEGLECTED STEPCHILD

Strangely enough, our Congress is a neglected stepchild in the field of philanthropic, educational enterprises set up to aid humanity. Millions are spent on great inspirational projects aimed at explaining the democratic system, without getting down to cases and telling the American child and adult how he himself has the answer to his own fate through his Congress and his Government.

The Committee for Congress proposes to fill this gap in what is being done to inform and educate our people about our most sacred institution, the Congress and the American governmental system.

NEED IS RECOGNIZED

Congressmen, educators, newspapermen, workingmen, housewives, students, and other citizens have stressed the need for a wider and better working knowledge of Congress.

True, there are fine organizations working in different ways to make democracy work. The League of Women Voters is a notable example. The national political parties do their share, within the limitations of political partisanship. Business, labor, agriculture, and other groups present their viewpoints.

Our leaders in Congress have done commendable work. The Honorable WRIGHT PATMAN has performed a great service to the Nation by publishing his question and answer book on Congress. Senators KEFAUVER, MONRONEY, and WILEY, and some of our great political economists have recommended congressional reforms.

TO AID REFORMS

The plans of the Committee for Congress, when implemented, can help to put into effect some of these vitally needed reforms.

Your Congress magazine will be expanded to include biographical data as well as the pictures of all Senators and Representatives. There will be photographs of Cabinet and Supreme Court members, heads of agencies and departments, committees of Congress in order of seniority. The written text will include articles explaining how bills are introduced and passed, how committees work, what Congress is doing, and what legislation is coming up.

UNDERSTANDABLE TO ALL

Editorial content will be written clearly and graphically to be understood by plain citizens and students. The relationship of Congress to everyday problems and experiences of people will be stressed, such as the prices of food and clothing, the part of the family in the defense program, and so on.

The former Pictorial Directory of Congress had a limited audience, as it was largely distributed to Members of Congress and legislative and governmental officials and employees. This function has been taken over by a pocket-sized booklet being produced by the Joint Committee on Printing of the House and Senate. Some 8,000 copies are being printed, which will take away the primary, basic market served formerly by the Pictorial Directory of Congress.

While this is a clear case of a Government-sponsored publication supplanting a privately produced medium, the Nation will benefit as Your Congress magazine becomes a national instrument for interpreting Congress and government to the American people.

Your Congress magazine will be published monthly, bimonthly or quarterly as needs warrant.

We will continue publication of the Pictorial Directory of Congress, and are proceeding with plans to publish the larger Book of Congress.

COMPLETELY NONPARTISAN

Your Congress magazine will continue as a completely nonpartisan, independent publication, devoted to the service of the American people.

Stating the issue in business terms, the Committee for Congress believes that being a member of the board of directors of the greatest corporation on earth, the United States of America, through membership in the United States Senate or House, is a sacred trust.

Or in the language of the trade-unionist, there is no greater honor than to represent the greatest union of free peoples the world has known.

A SACRED TRUST

The Committee for Congress believes that its program will help every American to recognize his responsibility to understand and support and guide our Congress in its work, and to help Members of our great Senate and House of Representatives to honor that sacred trust.

Mr. Young, acting vice chairman of the committee, stated: "A better understanding of Congress and Government by our own people is essential to the future of America."

He suggested use of this slogan: "Strengthen our democracy with better understanding of our Congress and Government."

If you, or your organization, wishes to know more about this worth-while endeavor to arouse a greater national interest in our Congress and Government, please communicate with the Committee for Congress, sponsor of the National Congress Study Council, 1060 National Press Building, Washington 4, D. C., Metropolitan 2214.

New Mexico's Report to the President's Water Policy Resources Commission

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLINTON P. ANDERSON
OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, November 28 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement made by Mr. Robert McKinney, chairman of the New Mexico Economic Development Commission and the New Mexico Water Resources Development Board. This statement was made by Mr. McKinney on October 13, 1950, in presenting New Mexico's report to the President's Water Resources Policy Commission.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF ROBERT MCKINNEY, CHAIRMAN, NEW MEXICO ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT COMMISSION AND NEW MEXICO WATER RESOURCES DEVELOPMENT BOARD

WASHINGTON, D. C., October 13, 1950.

To the Honorable Chairman and Members of the President's Water Resources Policy Commission:

This statement has been prepared for New Mexico, in accordance with the request of the President's Water Resources Policy Commission, by the New Mexico Economic Development Commission and Water Resources Development Board, which welcome the opportunity to express the views and recommendations of New Mexico concerning Federal Government participation in an over-all program directed toward the full development and proper use of the Nation's water resources.

New Mexico agrees that confused attitudes, inconsistent policies, and the resulting accumulation of unsolved problems regarding national water-resources development call for a thorough review of the situation at this point, and most certainly the various matters raised in your questionnaire demand our serious consideration.

Especially in need of review, New Mexico feels, are the economic criteria used to determine who pays how much for what on a Federal project. For example, using surplus revenues from hydroelectric power development to help finance irrigation projects might not be considered a good idea by everyone. Not that New Mexico would recommend any radical departure from the present practice—at least, without some suitable alternative policy. We do not overlook the fact that in New Mexico, as well as in other Western States, many irrigation projects would simply die without outside assistance. But how do we determine the extent of that assistance? And under what conditions is such assistance justifiable?

Let us take a concrete example: An irrigation project is set up by prospective irrigators specifically for irrigation purposes. However, if a community (or a State, or a nation) derives incidental benefits from that project—fish and wildlife, recreation, sediment and salinity control, flood control, navigation, and so forth—why should that community (or State, or nation, as the case may be) not bear its share of the project's cost? Why should the irrigators carry the financial burden alone?

As a specific instance of this sort, the Alamogordo Dam and Reservoir, a part of the Carlsbad irrigation project, were constructed primarily for irrigation purposes. Yet, the reservoir provides some flood and sediment contol for the community; it forms a lake which has provided pleasure for fishermen and other recreation-seekers; but these incidental beneficiaries enjoy their gains at the sole expense of the irrigators, and at no cost whatever to themselves.

It is New Mexico's view that all beneficiaries of any type of water development project should be assessed an equitable portion of the total costs. Thus, the assistance would be rendered by those who themselves are being assisted—a fair arrangement all the way around. And it would, of course, be important that policies for such assessments contain an absolute minimum of inconsistencies.

New Mexico is happy to report that it has not experienced any serious difficulty in operating within the 160-acre limitation, as has been the case in some other States. However, as a matter of policy, we feel that any restrictive limitation defeats its own purpose if it is made so inflexible as to hold back desirable developments.

New Mexico unequivocally favors a coordinated Federal-State inquiry into all water-resource development possibilities. New Mexico wants a plan that will utilize our limited water supply to the State's greatest advantage. And although New Mexico sees the need for the development of plans on a comprehensive basin-wide basis, it believes that the need for many individual projects is too pressing to await the maturity of such basin-wide plans.

In a State where the water supply has not been increasing in proportion to population growth, we have considered it necessary to initiate rather extensive water-resource studies and the Economic Development Commission and Water Resources Development Board have assumed leadership in speeding the formulation of a State-wide water plan based on these studies. However, EDC has been something of a lone wolf by necessity, not by choice. It earnestly solicits the cooperation of interested Federal agencies, State water-use organizations, and local interests, with a view to further study and eventual completion of a long-range plan for the fullest development and most efficient use of the State's resources. Anyone even slightly familiar with New Mexico's economic situation will realize that the State's future growth and prosperity—and, in some cases, even the bare maintenance of present conditions—depends largely upon the crucial matter of water-resource control.

The steady increase in New Mexico's population has been above the national average ratio, and there is every indication that this trend will continue. Per capita income has also increased in the last 10 years, but it is still below the national average. Population pressures on the one hand, and the desire for an improved standard of living on the other, require an enormous increase in economic activity within the State. In order to raise the per capita income to the national average level, the total income payment to individuals would have to be increased about 50 percent.

The safe limits of agricultural production by dry farming and by irrigated farming as supplied by presently developed supplies of irrigation water, have already been reached or exceeded. In New Mexico mining cannot be expected to provide much opportunity for increased employment. Much of our future growth must be achieved through increased manufacturing, through the processing of agricultural and mineral products, and through expanded trade—particularly the tourist and resort trade, since the State's climate, scenery, and historical background are among its principal resources. An increase in the Federal activities connected with atomic energy and national security (e. g., Los Alamos, Sandia, White Sands) would provide additional employment for a time, but this should not be relied upon as a permanent gain.

All our growth possibilities are dependent upon additional water supplies and their most efficient use; for irrigation, for municipal and industrial needs, for flood control, for hydroelectric development, for fish and wildlife, for recreation, etc. Closely allied problems are watershed management, erosion controls, and more efficient farmland use.

Surface waters are available for new development in the basins of the San Juan River, some of the tributaries of the Canadian River below Conchas Dam, and to a lesser extent along the Cimarron River. In the Canadian River Basin above Conchas Dam and in all other New Mexico river basins, additional water developments will be possible only by using every available means of cutting down water waste, or by importing water from other basins. The only substantial source of water by transfer is from the San Juan River to the Rio Grande.

New Mexico uses a considerable amount of ground water, obtained from artesian or pumped wells. Until the total safe yield of the ground-water supplies are better known, it would be unwise to plan on any other premise except that the withdrawals of underground water are equaling or exceeding the recharge.

A considerable quantity of water—amounting to as much as 50,000 acre-feet in the Pecos River Basin and 200,000 acre-feet in the Rio Grande Basin—can probably be salvaged by channeling or bypassing the reservoir delta areas, controlling or eliminating salt cedars and other water-consuming plants, and constructing whatever drainage works are necessary. Storage of floodwaters will permit more efficient use of water now lost to us during flood periods, but under present conditions in most of the basins of New Mexico, prior appropriations or interstate compacts preclude such floodwater storage. The largest quantity of water can be made available through full utilization of the San Juan River under the terms of the Upper Colorado River Basin pact. The waters of this stream can and should be used to increase agricultural developments by both white and Indian farmers in the San Juan Basin, but it is essential that a reasonable portion of the San Juan flow be exported into the Rio Grande Basin, to meet the urgent requirements for water to supplement the insufficient amounts now available for irrigation; to provide supplies for municipal and industrial needs; to develop power on the Rio Grande and its tributaries; to replace water which will be consumed in any soil-erosion prevention or revegetation measures in the Rio Grande watershed; and to permit, through exchange, the transfer of water to the Canadian and Pecos River Basins.

In supplementing the supply for irrigation the requirements of small projects must be given first consideration. Throughout the north-central portion of the State there are any number of small communities irrigated by simple community ditches. In such communities, characterized by very small holdings and low-income subsistence farming, population pressures have forced the extension of the water supply to the last acre of land that can be served with traditional irrigation practices. A considerable portion of our fine native population is thus being pauperized or forced to migrate from homesteads which have been in their families for centuries.

Aside from the social and economic problems which occur in low-income groups, our small communities are faced with physical problems in natural-resource control which are simply too great to overcome. In making derperate efforts to meet their minimum subsistence needs, people have often overgrazed, overused their timber, or indulged in other unwise land practices. As a result, streamflow characteristics have changed, and areas that once had a sufficient irrigation supply from perennial flows now suffer damaging floods, followed by midsummer water shortages. Floods repeatedly destroy the small-ditch temporary diversion dams, and each time more labor, time, and materials are required to replace them. Some land has had to be abandoned. Our next State legislature will be asked to establish a State forestry organization for better supervision of State lands.

It is certain that no currently existing State or Federal agency has a plan that will adequately deal with this land problem. The small communities cannot pay back loans; they cannot comply with the provisions of either the reclamation laws or the water-facilities program. It seems to us that, in order to conserve our land and water resources, the State will have to provide funds for small-projects programs that will improve the community-ditch system. In helping the small communities we will help ourselves.

One reason for lack of a more definite program for the fullest development of the water resources of New Mexico is that we simply do not know enough about the available water supplies in many basins, nor do we have sufficient data on precipitation, evaporation, sedimentation, stream flow, ground-water use, recharge, etc. Under EDC's guidance, representatives of State and Federal agencies are now preparing a long-range program for obtaining just this information.

Before we can really say with any degree of definiteness just what opportunities do exist for further economic development, studies must be made of population growth, mineral resources, agricultural and industrial potentialities, recreational needs, etc. EDC is now in process of compiling an almanac and guide to New Mexico resources which will contain precisely this sort of information.

We are glad to say that State and Federal agencies, operating under present laws and policy procedures, have accomplished much excellent work in the development of the water resources of the West. We urge, however, that laws and policies which lack clarity be clarified; and, in cases where conflicting policies hamper actual building, that these conflicts be immediately resolved, either by agreement among the agencies involved, or by executive or legislative action.

We strongly urge completion of the following specific water development projects:

AUTHORIZED PROJECTS

Fort Sumner project: This project would provide for the irrigation of 6,500 acres of land. Construction is now well underway.

Middle Rio Grande project: This project would stabilize the water supply of 98,000 acres of land, and would provide drainage, flood control, channel improvement, water salvage, and reorganization of district finances. Construction of one of the flood-control dams has been started.

Vermejo project: This project would provide for the rehabilitation of 7,200 acres of presently irrigated land and would furnish a small amount of flood control.

PROJECTS UNDER STUDY

Water-salvage measures in the Pecos River Basin: This project would salvage, for beneficial use in New Mexico and Texas, water now lost in the McMillan Reservoir delta by transpiration and evaporation. It provides for development of recreation, fish, and wildlife.

Navajo Reservoir: This reservoir, formerly called the Martinez Reservoir, would provide reregulation of the flows of the San Juan River and make them available for use within the State. Hydroelectric power would be developed and the dam would be the point of diversion for the Shiprock and South San Juan projects.

San Juan-Chama project: The San Juan-Chama project offers the greatest opportunity for the economic betterment of the north central section of New Mexico. It would furnish water for municipal and industrial purposes, hydroelectric power, fish and wildlife development, and recreation. It is the only assured means by which water can be obtained to supplement the inadequate supplies now available to the many small community ditch systems throughout the north central portion of the State. Some of the water would be used to replace that required for watershed conservation measures throughout the Rio Grande Basin.

San Juan Basin project: The Hammond shiprock, South San Juan, and Animas-La Plata projects are located in the San Juan Basin and are interrelated. They should be developed as quickly as possible in order to utilize the remainder of New Mexico's allocation of water under the upper Colorado River compact.

Flood control on Rio Hondo: A plan for flood control on the Rio Hondo in the vicinity of Roswell is in the process of preparation. Such a plan is vitally needed.

Flood control on the Pecos River and Rio Grande Basin watersheds: Flood-control reports by the United States Department of Agriculture are near completion for both the Pecos River and the Rio Grande watersheds. Programs for run-off and water-flow retardation and for soil-erosion prevention are vitally needed in both watersheds.

CANADIAN RIVER PROJECT

This project for the development of municipal water for cities in the Texas Panhandle has been the subject of disagreement among members of New Mexico's delegation in Congress. Consequently, a useful purpose would be served by our conveying to your body the views of the various State and Federal officials in New Mexico most conversant with the project, including the Governor and the State engineer. We recommend the proposed Canadian River project as not adverse to New Mexico, provided that construction be not begun unless and until a Canadian River compact be negotiated and ratified by New Mexico, Texas, and Oklahoma, and consented to by the Federal Congress; and further provided that the project be constructed and operated in accordance with such compact. We believe that development of the West can best be furthered by cooperation between all Western States, and believe no useful purpose would be served by our preventing the cities of the Panhandle from working out with the Federal Government the preliminary plans for the Canadian River project.

At this point I submit to your honorable body a report on the water resources of New Mexico, which I believe is one of the most, if not the most, outstanding presentations of this nature obtainable on any of the United States. It was prepared for the New Mexico Economic Development Commission, under contract, by the Bureau of Reclamation of the Department of the Interior under the direction of Wesley R. Nelson, Assistant Commissioner. Completed only last month, September 1950, the data in this encyclopedia of all that is now known of the water resources of New Mexico should be of great usefulness to the President's Water Resources Policy Commission.

In conclusion, I should like to summarize the additional studies we believe necessary in order to give us full and accurate knowledge of the water resources of New Mexico and their most efficient application to the agricultural, industrial, municipal, and other requirements of our people:

ROBERT MCKINNEY,
Chairman, New Mexico Economic Development Commission and Water Resources Development Board.

SANTE FE, N. MEX., October 13, 1950.

To the Honorable Chairman and Members of the President's Water Resources Policy Commission:

New Mexico's report and recommendations to your honorable body have been prepared, at my request, by the Water Resources Development Board of the New Mexico Economic Development Commission. Mr. Robert McKinney, chairman of these two agencies, will discuss the economic and social potentials of our semiarid State in relation to our limited water resources and will outline our plans for future growth by better utilization and further development of our surface and subsurface waters.

In the preparation of this program New Mexico gratefully acknowledges the collaboration of the Bureau of Reclamation of the United States Department of the Interior and the cooperation of the Fish and Wildlife Service, Geological Survey, Bureau of Indian Affairs, Bureau of Land Management, Bureau of Mines, and the National Park Service.

New Mexico is proud of the contribution of its scientists in the fields of cloud physus, artificial precipitation and the application of geophysical methods to the location of new underground supplies.

Dr. E. G. Workman, president of the New Mexico School of Mines and vice chairman of the Water Resources Development Board, will report to your body on recent activity in these fields in New Mexico.

In conclusion, Mr. McKinney will present the preliminary draft of a proposed bill for Federal regulation of activities aimed at the inducement of precipitation by artificial methods.

Great as is our need for moisture in New Mexico, we are aware that in our State or adjoining States, indiscriminate cloud-seeding activities may often result in excessive and damaging rainfall, as well as in the diminution or prevention of rainfall. In New Mexico we are considering the establishment of State controls over these activities, but in the view of the inter-State nature of the problem, we respectfully urge your body to lead in the development of a national policy.

Sincerely yours,

THOMAS J. MABRY,
Governor.

Reexamining Mr. Acheson

OF
HON. OWEN BREWSTER
OF MAINE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, November 28 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "Reexamining Mr. Acheson," written by William Henry Chamberlin, and published in the Wall Street Journal of November 27, 1950.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

REEXAMINING MR. ACHESON—HIS RECORD OF SO FREQUENTLY CHANGING HIS OWN BELIEFS SUGGESTS EXAMINING HIS QUALIFICATION FOR JOB

(By William Henry Chamberlin)

Secretary Acheson must have forgotten an old proverb about glass houses and stones when he recently struck out against critics who wish to reexamine American foreign policy.

Mr. Acheson's own record as a reexaminer is second to that of no man in public life today. He would not turn his back on Alger Hiss. But he has turned his back on so many ideas and assumptions which he once espoused that the ordinary citizen may be pardoned for feeling a trifle giddy at the spectacle of so many gyrations.

Mr. Acheson has been prominently identified with shaping the course of American diplomacy for many years as Assistant Secretary of State in the Roosevelt administration and Under Secretary, and more recently, Secretary of State in the Truman Cabinet. During his period of service virtually every major assumption of American foreign policy was not only reexamined but drastically changed.

HOW ABOUT APPEASEMENT?

What remains today of Roosevelt's assumption that Stalin could be charmed and appeased into becoming a cooperative do-gooder in the cause of world peace? Are we thinking any longer in terms of keeping Germany perpetually disarmed? How about the idea that China under Chiang Kai-shek would be a stable, friendly power and a pillar of postwar stability in the Orient?

It is doubtful whether any country at any time has backtracked so fast from so many dead-end roads as the United States has done during the last few years. And Dean Acheson has been pretty much at the steering wheel both in taking dead-end roads and in trying to back out of them. There is nothing to indicate that he raised any warning voice against the policy of appeasing Stalin which prevailed at the Tehran, Yalta, and Potsdam Conferences. There is considerable evidence to the contrary.

Some time ago one of Mr. Acheson's colleagues in the State Department during the war, Mr. A. A. Berle, testified that in the fall of 1944 there had been a difference of opinion in the Department.

"I felt that the Russians were not going to be sympathetic and cooperative," said Mr. Berle. "I was pressing for a pretty clean show-down when our position was strongest. The opposite group in the State Department was largely the men—Mr. Acheson's group, of course—with Mr. Hiss as a principal assistant in the matter. * * * I got trimmed in that fight and, as a result, went to Brazil and that ended my diplomatic career."

A PLATFORM APPEARANCE

As late as November 1945 Mr. Acheson appeared on the platform with such familiar ornaments of Communist-front gatherings as Paul Robeson and the Red Dean of Canterbury under the auspices of an organization which has been placed on the Attorney General's subversive list, the Council of American-Soviet Friendship. Mr. Acheson assured a sympathetic audience that there was no reason to suppose that the vital interests of the American and Russian peoples would clash and endorsed the idea of friendly governments along the Soviet frontiers.

Judging from Mr. Acheson's more recent pronouncements on the subject of American-Soviet relations, he has engaged in a good deal of reexamination of this subject since he was willing to lend State Department prestige to the harangues of the Dean of Canterbury and Paul Robeson.

With the active participation of Mr. Acheson's friend, Alger Hiss, the Charter of the United Nations was worked out at Dumbarton Oaks and finally ratified at San Francisco in the summer of 1945. A key point in this Charter was the requirement of unanimity among the great powers, including the Soviet Union, before the organization could be committed to enforcement action.

The Assembly of the United Nations has just recently accepted a project, proposed by Mr. Acheson, which transfers the right to authorize enforcement action, under certain circumstances, from the Security Council, where the great power veto operates, to the Assembly, where it does not. Reexamination would seem rather too mild a word for this change. Repudiation would be more accurate.

SO OFTEN ON TWO SIDES

Mr. Acheson has been for and against German rearmament, for and against crippling restrictions on the German and Japanese economies, for and against the Chiang Kai-shek regime in China, for and against the support of South Korea. He has been so often on two sides of so many questions that perhaps what is needed is not so much reexamination as examination of just what his policies of the present moment really are.

On the question of Formosa it is difficult to keep account of the shifts and zigzags of the foreign policy for which, over a period of more than a year, Mr. Acheson has been the responsible spokesman. A State Department bulletin of June 3, 1945, states that, with the exception of Singapore, no location in the Far East occupies such a controlling position as does Formosa. But in a secret memorandum which was communicated to American diplomatic representatives abroad late in 1949 it was intimated that Formosa was of no strategic value.

At that time Mr. Acheson publicly took the position that Formosa was part of China, and that there should be no American interference with what seemed to be the course of nature—a successful Communist invasion of this last stronghold of Chiang Kia-shek's regime. But within 6 months there was another reversal; American naval and air power was committed to the defense of Formosa. Apparently the disposition of the island was regarded as a matter of some strategic concern. At least that is what General MacArthur believes.

In view of his own numerous reexaminations, Mr. Acheson might be more tolerant of those who wish to take a closer look at present-day American policies and their implications, and in view of the Secretary's numerous shifts of attitude and the curious contrast between his apparent softness toward pro-Communist infiltration in his own Department and his fulminations against communism abroad, it is not surprising that there should be a substantial current of public opinion calling for a reexamination of Mr. Acheson's qualifications for the office which he holds.

Address of Ambassador James G. McDonald

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER
OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, November 27, 1950

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, on October 10, 1950, Hon. James G. McDonald, United States Ambassador to Israel, delivered a brief but interesting address at the opening of the 1950 campaign of the Brooklyn division of the Federation of Jewish Philanthropies of New York. The campaign was opened at a dinner in honor of Mr. Max Abrams, a long-time and outstanding leader in city-wide communal endeavors. The entire community paid tribute to him that evening for his untiring efforts in the field of philanthropy.

Ambassador McDonald was in the United States at the time for consultations and has since returned to resume his post in Israel, which he has held for the past 2 years. His comments on Israel are of more than passing interest. The text of Ambassador McDonald's address at the Waldorf-Astoria on October 10, 1950, is as follows:

Hon. Jacob H. Livingston, Mr. Emil Baar, Mr. Harry Zeitz, Justice Edward Lazansky, and my dear friends, this, my only public address during my home leave, is being made because I could not refuse the request of my friend, Max Abelman to whom I owe so much, nor decline to share in your tribute to my friend, Max Abrams. Moreover, as a former Brooklynite, my old borough loyalty is compelling.

You will not, I know, expect me to discuss any controversial aspects of the situation within Israel or of its relations to its neighbors. I am still in office and have been asked by the President and the Secretary of State to return to my post late this month on the expiration of my leave. Under these circumstances I trust that you will not be too disappointed if my brief remarks are lacking in sensational disclosures.

In my work in Israel during the past more than 2 years I have had the inestimable advantage of the personal interest of President Truman and the unstinting cooperation and support of the Department of State. Whatever fears some of my friends may have had that I, not being a career foreign officer, might have been disadvantaged, have been proved to be wholly groundless. I could not have asked for more support than has been given me by all of those in Washington with whom I have had to deal. Indeed, from the very beginning of my mission, it was evident that the Department in full accord with the President was determined to strengthen my hands. Illustrative of this spirit was the appointment as my first counselor and right-hand man of Charles H. Knox, a brilliant Foreign Service officer. His ability was matched by his charm and complete loyalty. Under his helpful guidance I learned much sooner than would otherwise have been possible the mechanics of my job both in relation to the Government to which I was accredited and to the officials at home. Always I shall be grateful to the Department for thus simplifying my initiation into practical diplomacy. And during the ensuing 2 years Washington has been invariably sympathetic and understanding in its attitude toward my colleagues and me in Israel.

My first impressions of Israel have been strengthened as I have watched with intense interest its achievements during its first critical formative months—its existence heroically defended, its statehood brilliantly vindicated, a workable government improvised out of near chaos and then firmly established by democratic processes, the ingathering of more than 400,000 of the homeless, together with the preparation of plans, now far advanced, for welcoming during 1951, 1952, and 1953 hundreds of thousands more. And to all these accomplishments has been added an encouraging start toward laying the basis for peace with its neighbors. Those initial gains have gone beyond the expectations of even the most optimistic among Israel's friends abroad. Only in Israel itself were these achievements confidently expected. Only there was there a common conviction that, despite the seemingly insuperable obstacles, a new state would emerge with the capacity to meet its obligations at home and abroad and thus fulfill the millennial hopes of millions of Jews.

I am happy to add that I was among those confident ones. There in the midst of this vibrant people, in daily contact with their able and devoted leaders, I would have been blind not to see that Israel has indeed a rendezvous with destiny—the destiny foreseen by the prophets. As Isaiah exclaimed: "I will bring thy seed from the east and gather thee from the west, I will say to the north give up, and to the south 'keep not back'; bring my sons from far and my daughters from the ends of the earth." As I have watched at Haifa, Lydda, or Tel Aviv the arrival of refugees, many of them wholly inadmissible to other countries because of physical defects or age, I thought of Jeremiah's words: "Behold I will bring them from the north country and gather them from the coasts of the earth, and with them the blind and the lame, the woman with child, and her that travaileth with child together."

But the prophets foresaw in Israel reborn more than a home for the outcasts; they foresaw Israel as a center of spiritual and moral leadership, a center from which would radiate blessings of peace and progress. Israel's leaders today intend their state to be not just one more small political unit concerned only with its own security and advancement. They foresee Israel as a center from which the gifts of modern science and technics, modern agriculture and industry, modern medicine and public health, will be available to all Israel's neighbors. They foresee Israel not as a rival but as an ally of its neighbors in the common struggle against poverty and disease.

In proportion as Israel achieves this goal of mutually advantageous cooperation with its neighbors, the world will come to see through the new Jewish state that the age-old prejudices against the Jews are meaningless. Jews in Israel will increasingly demonstrate that as a people they have capacities comparable with the most advanced peoples of the west, and that, given the opportunity, they cannot only rebuild their national life but through it give rich gifts to our common humanity.

And not the least of these gifts will be to bring to more and more millions of non-Jews in the United States and elsewhere the conviction that anti-Semitism is as outmoded as witchcraft. Israel will not only make more secure the future of your children; it will also help to save us other Americans from the grievous sin of group prejudice. Israel will thus help us all, Jews and Christians, to be better Americans.

My pleasant special duty tonight is to express on your behalf and on that of the whole Jewish community of our greatest and most progressive borough warmest thanks for the untiring and brilliant leadership in the Brooklyn Jewish Federation of Max Abrams. He would not wish nor is it necessary for me to extoll to this audience in detail his creative work. Indefatigably he has utilized his excellent capacity for organization and his gift for inspiring others to make the Brooklyn Federation an example to the other boroughs and to the whole country. Never has he sat on the side-lines and limited himself to cheering on his workers in the field. Nor has he ever been satisfied to take the honors and to permit his fellows to bear the brunt of the hard job of following up in their offices and in their homes those who had not responded to less personal appeals. In every respect he has been an effective leader.

Max Abrams' devotion to the harsh task of finding the means to alleviate human suffering and to restore men, women, and children to health and happiness amply explains your decision to present to him this token of your esteem and of your love. It is for me a great honor to be given the privilege of handing it to him in your name. May this beautiful silver tray be not only for him but for his children and his children's children a precious remembrance of the role of mercy which he has so generously played and which has so justifiably won for him the gratitude of his people and of his city.

Need for an Emancipation Proclamation for the Russian People

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MARGARET CHASE SMITH

OF MAINE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, November 29 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mrs. SMITH of Maine. Mr. President, in this critical hour in world history, I think that all of us in Congress could well pause and read an article by William I. Nichols entitled "Needed Now: An Emancipation Proclamation for the Russian People," appearing in the October 1, 1950, issue of This Week.

It is with that thought that I ask unanimous consent that this article be inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

NEEDED NOW: AN EMANCIPATION PROCLAMATION FOR THE RUSSIAN PEOPLE

(By William I. Nichols, editor of This Week magazine)

HERE IS A WAY TO WIN THE SOVIET MASSES AS AMERICA'S MOST IMPORTANT ALLY

It was a refugee from Riga who first suggested the program outlined on these pages. Tall, gaunt, intense, he stood before his barracks in a West German displaced persons camp and looked out toward the Communist east. It was as if he could still see the home, job, and life from which he had just escaped.

"Listen," he said, "there's no doubt about it now. We're headed for a world showdown. In the process, your country is now in a frantic scramble to line up foreign friends and allies.

"Only sometimes I think you're being too frantic. With all your Marshall plans and your Atlantic Unions, you're overlooking the most important ally of all."

"Which is?" I asked.

He looked at me intently, and said, "The Russian people."

Since then I have talked to scores of refugees with first-hand knowledge of conditions inside Soviet Russia. The plan they propose is a fateful challenge to the leaders of both United States political parties. If developed and put in action, it could, literally, turn the vast Soviet population into democracy's most important ally.

Viewed overall, that may seem a hopeless prospect. Since the fall of China, Soviet Russia and her satellites control one-fifth of the earth's land mass. The 800,000,000 people under Stalin's rule represent close to a third of the world's population. In many ways it is a sinister and threatening power bloc lined up against us.

But look more closely and you see sharp cracks in the structure. Of the grand total, only about 200,000,000, or 25 percent, represent the original prewar U. S. S. R. The others are restless satellites.

And even the hard core has soft spots—plenty of them. Only about one-half, or 100,000,000 people, are Great Russians, that is, the historic Russian nation which is centered on Moscow. The balance is a weird and often hostile mixture of over 100 subject races and nations, eager to be free.

Again, this is not the whole story. Also cleaving through the Soviet population is a deep social split. At the top is a small ruling class, less than 5 percent, which has life-and-death power over the others. What that means to the subject 95 percent is by now an old, old story which needs no repetition here. It is the sickening story of MVD torture chambers, of Siberian slave-labor camps, of confiscated property, subhuman living standards, stifled churches, broken families.

Talk to anyone who has suffered under Soviet tyranny and you soon discover that there is a ground swell of bitterness, hatred, and latent revolt throughout the Soviet world.

In fact, it is this potential disloyalty of the Soviet masses which is the greatest soft spot in Stalin's empire. Last time, it almost cost him the war. In June 1941, when the Nazi armies invaded Russia, hundreds of thousands of Soviet soldiers threw down their arms and surrendered. It has now been fully documented that the civilian population in the Ukraine and other areas met the German invaders with open arms. It was only the brutal stupidity of the Nazis which finally turned this welcome into bitter hatred.

Since World War II the Kremlin has never forgotten the ominous lesson of such revolts. Hence, the almost hysterical efforts to nail down safety valves and keep the population in check—through police terror, the drug of local propaganda, and, most important of all, iron-curtain separation from explosive contacts with the outside world. It is certainly not an exaggeration to say that Stalin fears an eruption of his own people as much as he does the atom bomb. It happened in World War II and it could happen again.

"WHY DON'T YOU TALK TO THEM?"

It is against this background that most Soviet refugees view United States policy toward Russia today. To us in America, the Russian problem may seem just an area on the map, compact and coherent, a neat X in a political equation. But to them it represents a seething ferment of millions of human beings oppressed, repressed, thwarted, and persecuted in every normal aspect of human life. And so they say again and again:

"Why doesn't America speak to them? Why don't you break through and touch the hearts of these men and women?"

Such comments became doubly passionate during the recent Washington debates on an expanded program for the State Department's Voice of America program. Newspapers were full of proposals for more appropriations, for new broadcasting towers to outshout the Soviet's 100 jamming stations, even for the manufacture and distribution of special $2 short-wave listening sets which were to be smuggled across the borders.

"All that is well enough," the exiles said. "Of course, you need the means of speaking. But it's even more important to have something to say. In any war, hot or cold, there is no substitute for ideas and ideals."

Too often, they say, our broadcasts to the Soviet are nothing but rosy descriptions of United States life which become tantalizing fairy tales to imprisoned Russians. Or they are lofty essays on "freedom" and "democracy"—words which mean little to minds deadened by propaganda.

THEY WANT POSITIVE STATEMENTS

It is in contrast to such unrealistic messages that they cite Woodrow Wilson's 14 points or the Atlantic Charter and the "four freedoms." Both were cases where the eloquent, purposeful statement of peace aims, during war, helped mobilize the energies of men and bring converts to democracy.

An even sharper example was supplied during our own War Between the States. In that conflict the aims were to establish human liberty and a peaceful, lasting Federal Union. It was to achieve those aims that early in the war Abraham Lincoln issued his famous Emancipation Proclamation.

From one point of view, that proclamation was "just a statement." But history shows that it electrified the imagination of all those who loved liberty, and was indeed a mighty factor in restoring peace, freedom, and a lasting Union.

The proposal now, in this time of "undeclared war," is for a new emancipation proclamation, to be voiced by the highest leaders of America, and aimed squarely at the Soviet population. Its purpose is to hold out clear hope of what their world would be like following the overthrow of Stalin's regime.

"It is a simple and fundamental truth," an ex-Soviet official told me, "that Stalin can never be overthrown without the active help of his own people. For psychological reasons that help must be enlisted right now before coming conflicts fan the heat of wartime passions."

To any technical objections as to the "diplomatic propriety" of such a program, ex-Soviets have a ready answer: On November 16, 1933, the Soviet Union made a specific agreement with the United States in which the pledge was given that there would be no attempt by the Russian Government to foster Communist organizations or individuals inside the United States. We all know how well that promise has been kept in the past 17 years. It was only No. 1 in a long series of broken pledges.

FOUR RULES WE MUST FOLLOW

In discussing such a program, the men and women who know Soviet psychology set up certain very specific requirements:

1. The proclamation must be an official declaration coming (like the Monroe Doctrine, the Emancipation Proclamation, or the Fourteen Points) from the responsible head or heads of state.

2. The proclamation must be addressed primarily to the rank and file—the 95 percent who are the subject people. As for the ruling 5 percent—the Communists and their immediate followers—there is always the chance of creating division. Some can be converted; others, like the Nazis before them, will feel that their destinies are wrapped up in the survival of the regime. They must either win or go down with it in flames.

3. All proposals must be clearly labeled as subject to the will of the Russian people as expressed in free and honest elections. There must be nothing to suggest a program which is being imposed or decreed by a would-be conquering power. Soviet people have had enough decrees in the last 30 years.

4. The statement of peace aims must be simple, clear, and understandable, and well within the experience of the Soviet masses. At no point can there be any big, vague, windy pronouncements about freedom, democracy, or the rights of man. Among all mass audiences a concrete statement is always more powerful than an abstract one. But in the Soviet world there is an added consideration. One of Lenin's first, and deadliest, rules was to "confuse vocabularies." Thus, after thirty-odd years of Bolshevik propaganda, the freedom words have lost all meaning. All we have left to work with are the simple, concrete picture words—the names of objects and things and actions which are part of everybody's everyday life.

BUILD AN IMAGE OF FREEDOM

The problem, then, is to find the right picture words to reconstruct an image of freedom in minds which have been dulled and distorted by a generation of propaganda.

The seven points given here are a first approach to the problem. Each stands for one of the basic freedoms in our free, democratic way of life. But each point is expressed in words which also apply to the daily lives of Soviet subjects, and are understandable in terms of their own experience. As an added test of concreteness, only those points were chosen which could be translated directly into pictures, as shown here. Thus the proclamation is adapted not only to broadcasting but to printing on thin rice-paper sheets, easily concealed and smuggled across frontiers by anti-Soviet underground workers. This procedure was employed often and successfully during World War II. Another method, recently tested, would be to send leaflets over the border by small free balloons.

The whole problem is best summed up in this comment from one Soviet refugee:

"Technically," he writes, "we know that your broadcasts are getting through. Of course there's always the jamming. And besides that, only a few non-Communists have both the receiving sets and the courage to listen in. But even a few is enough. In any sealed-in society, really important news always goes like lightning over the grapevine. And hundreds of escaped Russians like myself are ready to go underground and across borders, to help spread the word.

"But you must have something to say. Russians will not risk their lives to listen to broadcasts that only talk of freedom in remote and general terms."

Here then is the question—and a fateful one—for the American people. Will our western world produce some great leader now, as it has in every crisis of the past, to speak the words of freedom in such a way that they will echo round the world and stir the hearts of men? Today the words and the idioms and the method of transmission may differ from the past—but the inner meaning remains the same.

When will such a leader—or group of leaders—step forward?

The need today is greater than ever.

This time our job is to smash through the iron curtain and give the Soviet people, in words and symbols which they can understand, America's great, time-tested and ever-thrilling message. It is the message of malice toward none and charity for all, of government of, by, and for the people, and, under God, a new birth of freedom—around the world.

SEVEN POINTS IN A NEW EMANCIPATION PROCLAMATION FOR THE RUSSIAN PEOPLE

1. "You can travel where you please." Today Soviet citizens can't cross frontiers. Even inside Russia they are chained to local communities. Sometimes people of a whole area, like the Crimea, are uprooted and transported forever to distant locations. Families are broken up and sent to faraway provinces. Free citizens could travel, or stay home, as they pleased.

2. "You can buy more things." Soviet living standards are pitifully low. The reasons: Production of war matériel, plus Communist incompetence in making and distributing consumer goods. Russian soldiers who saw western Europe, or used United States lend-lease goods, dream of the day they can buy foreign products, and when their own factories will work for them.

3. "You can own your own land." The desire to own property is a basic human instinct, frustrated by the Communist regime. Reports indicate Soviet food supply is threatened because 40,000,000 peasants balk at working solely for the state on collective farms. Factory workers have no incentive to produce except fear. "Freedom to own" is a magic slogan.

4. "Your churches will be open." Suppression of religion was one of Lenin's first aims. Churches were turned into granaries or antireligious museums. Except for a puppet state church, religion has been driven underground. But memories of the church are still strong, particularly among the older people. Freedom to worship God retains a powerful appeal for them.

5. "No more slave-labor camps." The dread of slave labor hangs over every Soviet home. Estimates of the number doomed to killing labor in MVD terror camps range from 12,000,000 to 15,000,000. The strongest appeal of any new Emancipation Proclamation should be to those suffering—or whose relatives are suffering—from this barbarous form of slavery.

6. "Your nation will be free." Even excluding satellite states, the U. S. S. R. is not one nation but a collection of over 100 restless races and nations. These nations should be free, and their citizens allowed to choose their own leaders in free elections. The subject people will welcome independence, either as separate nations or within regional federations.

7. "World peace through UN." No one has more reason to dread war than the Russians who saw their country torn to shreds in World War II. Above all, any appeal should make clear that, without Stalin, their newly constituted governments, freely elected, would share in an era of world-wide peace and security, within the framework of the United Nations.

Campaign Address by Hon. Robert S. Kerr, of Oklahoma

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. ERNEST W. McFARLAND

OF ARIZONA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, November 29 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a radio address delivered by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. KERR] on October 25, 1950.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

My fellow Oklahomans, on November 7, you will choose many of your State and national leaders for the years just ahead. You not only choose between candidates, you choose between political parties.

The only hope of the Republicans is to find or to create division among the Democrats. Otherwise, they have no hope of victory.

The Democrats want to do more for the people. The Republicans want the people to do something to the Democrats.

I pay tribute to each of our nominees on the State and national tickets.

Johnston Murray is a native Oklahoman. He has worked successfully as a farmer, as a laborer, as an educator, and a lawyer. By ability and experience, he is amply qualified to make a great governor for all the people of Oklahoma.

MIKE MONRONEY, likewise, is a native Oklahoman. He also is a product of Oklahoma schools. He also has been a successful businessman, and MIKE MONRONEY has had 12 years of outstanding and successful service in the Congress of the United States. He will make a great United States Senator.

The Republicans have chosen as their nominee for governor one whom I have previously referred to as the oldest and coldest reactionary I know.

I was astounded a few weeks ago when, in a radio speech, I heard J. O. Ferguson make the following statement: "I have the viewpoint of the men and women who have seen Oklahoma fall from her greatness to where we are the poor relation of the other 47 States."

Now, isn't that ridiculous? Oklahoma is the envy of the Nation and the pride of her 2,300,000 citizens. Aunt Eller in the world-famed musical show Oklahoma, expressed my sentiments to a "t." She said, "We don't claim to be no better than anybody else, but we dern sure 'air' jest as good."

A few days ago, I was reminded of just how wrong Jo Ferguson was when he thus slandered Oklahoma. An Oklahoma farm boy, Walter Cummings of Freedom, was elected national president of the Future Farmers of America. Mary Ellen Ash, Oklahoma A. & M. College senior from Muskogee, was chosen queen of the American Royal Livestock Show at Kansas City. A group of Oklahoma farm boys and girls made almost a clean sweep of victories and honors at the same American Royal show. The livestock judging team from Oklahoma A. & M. beat out all competition, including Kansas, Nebraska, Iowa, and others for the first prize in the intercollegiate judging contest.

In California, Mrs. Hope Reed, of Vinita, was chosen as national president of the American Legion Auxiliary.

On the other side of the continent, in Washington, D. C., an Oklahoma banker, Elmer Harber from Shawnee and Seminole was drafted by the President of the United States to become the directing head of the RFC, the greatest multibillion dollar banking business in the world. And then, an amazing Oklahoma University football team, already acknowledged to be at least the third best in the Nation, defeated the Texas Longhorns before 75,000 roaring fans in the Cotton Bowl at Dallas.

During the brief period in which these historic events were happening, an even more notable occurrence took place. The junior Senator from Oklahoma became the grandfather of a 7 pound 11 ounce boy.

Does anyone believe that these wonderful things could happen in a State that is the poor relation of all the other 47 States? I want to say that any Oklahoman who thinks this is downright ignorant, and anyone who says it is outrageously impertinent.

Now, my friends, the Republicans also have a nominee for the United States Senate. I must say, however, they haven't had him very long. For a while, the Democrats thought they had him. But the hand was quicker than the eye—and one day, between sundown and sunup, Bill got away. I quote his own words from the Tulsa World of Sunday, October 15: "I want your support. I don't care if you are a Republican or a Democrat. I have been both."

Frankly, I doubt that Bill Alexander is either a Republican or a Democrat. I know that no man can be both.

Of course, being on both sides of a question is no new experience for Bill. I have heard of those who wanted to dance every set. I have heard of those who wanted to run with the foxes and hunt with the hounds.

Bill tries 'em all, with equal ease and equal failure.

He was an original advocate of world federation. He made speeches for it for 1½ years. He has now been against it for nearly 3 months.

When I first knew him, he was an ardent dry. He then became a militant advocate of repeal. At last reports, he is both.

Here is a statement he has made dozens of times, quote: "The blundering inefficient Defense Department has spent more money in the last 4 years for travel than for new military equipment." Now, every eighth grade school child in Oklahoma knows better than that. The record shows less than $889,000,000 spent for all the travel of all our fighting forces since the end of World War II. The same record shows nearly $9,000,000,000 spent for new military equipment. This proves that Bill was speaking either from ignorance or something worse.

About 10 days ago somebody put out the rumor that Senator THOMAS would take a walk in this campaign. Anyone who knew ELMER THOMAS knew better. Anyone who was even curious could have found out better. But Bill, in his characteristic irresponsible impetuosity, issued a flamboyant statement, claiming the world with a fence around it. He said, "MONRONEY has been unmasked by a man who sat in the same Congress with him for 12 years—a man of his own political allegiance—Senator ELMER THOMAS." Senator THOMAS promptly and completely repudiated Alexander's false claim.

The truth is that his primary opponent, the Reverend George T. Balch, has taken the mask off of Alexander. In a blistering radio speech, Balch said, "This candidate (Alexander) may say he is a Simon-pure, dyed-in-the-wool Republican. That I deny. He is not a Republican. He is not a Democrat." Continuing, the Reverend Balch declared, "He is an out-and-out, hand-made, boss-bought mugwump, politically. He has treated the regularly elected Republican Party officials as if they were dirt under his feet."

Actually, my friends, it wasn't necessary for Alexander's primary opponent thus to unmask him. He dropped the mask from his own face when he changed from a Democratic candidate to a Republican candidate.

Now, Bill says the United States Senate needs one man who will stand up and say, "I am a Christian." Actually, my friends, more than 80 Members of the Senate are members of the church. Every Senate session is opened with a prayer, first, of thanksgiving, and, second, for continued divine guidance. Almost all Members are Christians, Bill, but they are too humble to make their Christianity a national issue.

Now, actually, folks, Bill wouldn't like it in the Senate nearly as well as he thinks he would. He would do all right as an out-and-out missionary. He would not be bad at holding a revival for any who would listen. But Bill would be greatly disappointed when he learned how few Senators listen to other Senators talk. And he would be positively heartbroken when he found that under no circumstances would he be permitted to take up a collection.

Of course, Bill has taken up collections at all his political meetings. He puts on a great show. He makes the people laugh, then he makes 'em cry, and then he makes them pay. He tells them he has to have more than their votes to win.

Now, most candidates would be glad to settle for votes. Bill asks for dollars, too. He tells each new group about the ones who gave him money at previous meetings. He refers to kind old women and to what he calls horny-handed farmers who press dollar bills into his hand.

My friends, there are no horny-handed farmers in Oklahoma. Roosevelt and the Democratic Party changed all that. And I haven't seen an old woman since I started to run for office 10 years ago.

This brings me to the most important part of this speech or any other speech. November 7 is not the nominee's day. It is the party's day. It is not the candidates' day. It is the people's day.

Many remember and none should ever forget the 12 long years when we hardened under Harding, cooled under Coolidge, and hungered under Hoover. If there are those whose hearts yearn for the boom-and-bust, the privation and want, the hunger and despair of those days, they should vote for the Republicans, because we were rescued from all that by Democratic national administrations, and the Democratic Party is pledged to prevent its ever recurring. If you, my fellow Oklahomans, want to keep the abundant prosperity and the impregnable national strength and security which we now have, then you should vote for the Democratic nominees.

We know that we have won two World Wars under Democratic leadership. We know that we are winning the present world-wide struggle against the powers of darkness under Democratic leadership. We know that our Nation has been rebuilt. We know that we have marched up out of the valley of gloom and depression. We know today that our farmers and our workers are the most prosperous they have ever been. We know that American business which thrives or suffers, in direct relation to the purchasing power of farmers and workers, enjoys today the most abundant prosperity it has ever known.

The Democratic Party believes in keeping all the security and all the progress we have made. We are pledged to their constant improvement. We are resolved to work always for the betterment of all the people.

To all of you who rejoice in the great prosperity of our people at home; to all of you who approve our invincible military strength that insures our security among the nations of the world; we ask your support. We ask that you join us on November 7 in rolling up an overwhelming Democratic victory.

Wisconsin Editorial Comment on November Election

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, November 29 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, it has been exceedingly gratifying to read the very fine editorial expressions which have appeared in Wisconsin newspapers following the November 7 election. I am humbly grateful for the many gracious comments which have appeared regarding the endorsement which I was personally given at the polls.

I was particularly interested in reading the editorial analysis which appeared on the subject of the exact meaning of the election, not so much in terms of personalities who won or lost, but in terms of exactly what our people decided on the basis of the issues. Their opinion of the basic issues of our times was, of course, the most decisive factor in the election.

I believe that certain editorial comments which have appeared in various Wisconsin papers will be of interest to folks in other States as an index of grassroots opinion in the Badger State. I therefore ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD excerpts from the following newspapers: From the Vilas County News Review of November 9, 1950; from the Wisconsin State Journal of November 8; from the Oshkosh Northwestern of the same date; and from the Wausau Record-Herald, also of the same date.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Vilas County (Wis.) News Review of November 9, 1950]

GOD BLESS AMERICA

This is a great country, and never greater than on election day.

Nowhere in the world can the people go to the polls and say what they think, except right here on the North American Continent.

This writer has always had great faith in the people. The people are patient. There seems to be no limit to their patience. They endure and endure, until one wonders if they will ever protest.

Suddenly, one day they go to the polls. They speak with a might and an authority that cannot be denied. When it is over, definite things have happened.

In some cases, men are smashed. The public, patient too long, finally strikes a mighty blow. It annihilates. It bruises and batters. Sometimes the bruising and battering is so terrific the politician never recovers. Sometimes he gives up public life. Sometimes, when necessary, he is brought to justice for his misdeeds.

Let us never forget that the Democrats wanted this election. They wanted it so badly they were willing to spend plenty of money to get it. In some States, as Ohio, they brought in their top publicists, their top publicity men, their outstanding orators, the virtual cream of the crop. These were rushed in and turned their high-price talent on, then rushed out and a new corps was rushed in.

In some cases, as in Wisconsin, a captain of the Pendergast machine, the smartest political machine in the country, the machine that has for its motto "feed 'em and vote 'em," was brought in. In other places the Veep, the genial, champion story-teller, BARKLEY, himself, went to the rescue with a number of talks.

All this was because the Democrats wanted an endorsement of their policies which have resulted in the Korean war, in high prices, in confusion and extravagance and in the wasting of good food. They wanted an endorsement of socialized medicine, which would put the politician in your doctor's office and the ward heeler in your hospitals, and the Spence bill. They wanted approval of leaving the Communists in high places.

The people listened. That, vast conglomerate force of doctors and lawyers and housewives and teamsters and clerks and engineers and ditch diggers that make up the people endured the bombardment, then didn't give approval.

In State after State the people expressed their dissatisfaction, their disgust, their fear, and their righteous indignation.

Oh, it's a great, mighty, wonderful thing to see the people, at last, make up their minds. It is an awe-inspiring thing to see them go to the polls and let it be known that they demand a change in policies.

The ballot box, more than anything else, has made America great. A strong and intelligent and capable people expressing their wishes without fear or favor, in control of their own destinies, is what has made America great. The patience of these strong people, their endurance and their tolerance is mighty, too, but it runs out.

It ran out November 7. The people took over, unswayed and unmoved by high-price spell-binding and expensive letters, posters, advertisements, and the costly experience of publicity agents who are versed in knowing how to sway people. The people had made up their minds over the months when the Korean war started and when the casualty lists came in. They went to the polls and they administered a stern and relentless rebuke to the men they felt responsible. They warned others that they would tolerate no more bungling.

This is a great country, and never greater than on November 7.

God bless America, and keep her safe.

[From the Wisconsin State Journal, Madison, Wis., of November 8, 1950]

THE MEANING OF KOHLER AND WILEY

The election of Republicans, Walter Kohler as Governor, and ALEXANDER WILEY as United States Senator, and the defeat of their down-the-line Fair Deal opponents provides Wisconsin political philosophers with food for thought.

Mr. Kohler's victory is, certainly, a vindication of and vote of confidence in the Republican Party that has given this State excellent, clean government for more than a decade.

His victory was a repudiation of the Madison-controlled-and-directed Wisconsin Democratic Party, which sought to bring the questionable blessings of deficit spending and autocratic government to the State.

The Wiley victory points to many things:

Wisconsin citizens want men in Washington who will vote to curb the power of Federal Government. Wisconsin citizens want to decide—themselves—how the dollars they earn will be spent.

And this is most important: Wisconsin citizens want men in Washington who will have the courage, honest intention, and willingness to expose and drive from high places the Communists and fellow travelers who have wormed their way into positions of power and influence.

[From the Oshkosh (Wis.) Northwestern of November 8, 1950]

WILEY RETURNED AS UNITED STATES SENATOR

Riding on the strong Republican tide that swept Wisconsin's rural counties in Tuesday's election, United States Senator ALEXANDER WILEY, Republican, won in the bitterly contested race in which Attorney General Thomas E. Fairchild, of Verona, Democrat, was his opponent.

WILEY took a large early lead in the vote battle, particularly in the rural areas, and Fairchild was unable to overcome that advantage gained in the farm counties, even in the late returns from Milwaukee and other industrial points regarded as Democratic strongholds.

Oshkosh and Winnebago County voters gave WILEY a splendid endorsement, compared with the totals made by his political foe, Fairchild.

The Wiley victory was an important factor in the Nation's congressional contests, in which the Republicans slaughtered the Democratic leadership, but apparently fell short of seizing control of the Eighty-second Congress.

Evidently the majority of the voters had decided emphatically that they were tired of what the Democratic administration has been doing to them and wanted a change.

One of the biggest upsets, affecting organized labor's effort to wipe out the Taft-Hartley labor-control law, was in Ohio, where Senator ROBERT A. TAFT was reelected, defeating his Democratic opponent, Joseph T. Ferguson, who was backed by a Truman-labor coalition that spent a huge amount of money and conducted an intensive campaign in the hope of ending TAFT's brilliant career in the Senate.

[From the Wausau (Wis.) Record-Herald of November 8, 1950]

MUCH TO CHEER ABOUT

The voters of Wisconsin reaffirmed their confidence in the kind of government—good government—they have been getting under the Republican administrations at Madison by decisively electing a full slate of GOP State officers in Tuesday's election.

And they expressed their displeasure over the type of government offered by the Democratic administration at Washington by returning United States Senator WILEY to office and increasing the Republican representation in the House of Representatives from 8 seats to 9 out of the State's 10 seats.

The Republican gains were substantial enough, we believe, to give the party reason to eye the 1952 elections with confidence, but not spectacular enough to give them the fatal overconfidence of 1948.

Chinese Reds Enjoying United States Luxuries While Our Soldiers Are Dying In Korea

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ZALES N. ECTON
OF MONTANA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, November 29 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. ECTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a very thought-provoking article entitled "Chinese Reds Enjoying United States Luxuries While Our Soldiers Are Dying in Korea," written by Constantine Brown, and published in the Evening Star of November 28, 1950.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THIS CHANGING WORLD—CHINESE REDS ENJOYING UNITED STATES LUXURIES WHILE OUR SOLDIERS ARE DYING IN KOREA

(By Constantine Brown)

At the very time when officials of the Chinese Communist Government are enjoying the luxuries of the Waldorf Astoria in New York, American soldiers are being killed in North Korea by Chinese Communist troops.

Our men are not there as representatives of the United States Government. They represent the same United Nations which is receiving with utmost courtesy and smiles the spokesmen of the so-called Peiping government.

What would the American people have said if in 1942 a batch of Hitlerites had arrived in New York or Washington, not to discuss peace but to accuse the American Government of such "crimes" as giving help to Britain and invading North Africa

INTERNATIONAL TERRITORY

Technically the situation is not the same. Lake Success is international territory because it houses the United Nations. New York by implication, has somewhat the same status, inasmuch as it offers accommodation for those who attend sessions of the United Nations regularly or on special invitation.

The Chinese Communists are not here to discuss ways and means of halting the Korean holocaust. They have come for the specific purpose of accusing the American Government of "intervening" in Formosa. If they allow themselves to be drawn into any discussion of Korea, it will be only to denounce the "crimes" of General MacArthur and the American soldiers under his command.

The nine-man delegation was taken in hand, as soon as it set foot on American territory, by the representative of China's bosses, Soviet Deputy Foreign Minister Jacob Malik, who awaited them at Idlewild Airport. He is making doubly sure that the Chinese do not change a comma in the instructions drawn for them by the Kremlin.

Mr. Malik, however, has permitted some representatives of Britain and India—two countries which have recognized the Chinese People's Republic—to talk to the new mandarins. These, together with the French, Yugoslavs, and some others, are scraping and bowing in the hope of winning the favor of the Russian dictators' newest Charlie McCarthys.

COST IN AMERICAN LIVES

The Chinese Communists made their charges of American intervention in Formosa last summer, before their divisions actively entered the battle against the UN forces in Korea. There might have been some reasonable grounds for permitting these men to come to America at that time to press their trumped-up charges against our Government. But since that time not only the UN supreme commander in Korea, but also the representatives of his command, have confirmed the fact that the Chinese Communists have thrown a large force into a fight to prevent the unification and pacification of Korea. The intervention of these troops has cost America alone nearly 1,000 lives and at least three times as many other casualties.

The Peiping delegation is not here to discuss how to stop the bloodshed in Korea. Their only purpose is to discuss the crimes of the imperialistic warmongering American Government. The Peiping delegates are on American territory—where they are enjoying the protection, courtesies, and services of Americans, some of whom may have had sons or other relatives killed in Korea—to blast us and not to talk peace.

The wishful-thinking British and Indian diplomats whisper in the ears of American delegates at the UN that if we leave matters to them they may be able to obtain some compromise in Asia. They still advocate firmly the Russian thesis that Peiping's stooges should be given the seat held at present by the Nationalists at Lake Success.

A situation far more dangerous than the 1938 Munich agreement will threaten us if our diplomats plunge headlong into the compromise which some of our allies now are preparing at Lake Success.

EXTFNSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JACOB K. JAVITS
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, November 27, 1950

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, at the present juncture of the critical situation in Germany which will determine whether Germany will or will not take its part in the defense of freedom of western Europe, the appended editorial from yesterday's New York Times on German youth should be of the deepest interest to every Member:

GERMAN YOUTH

A disquieting feature of the current parliamentary elections in Bavaria is the political apathy revealed among young Germans. As Jack Raymond reported in this newspaper, many young people are cynically distrustful of politics and politicians. Apparently they feel helpless to influence the course of events by political action.

This attitude is not surprising. Unlike their older compatriots, these young men and women have experienced little except Hitlerism and the horrors of war. Five years of Allied and German efforts at reorientation have not succeeded in filling the vacuum left by the collapse of the Reich with an understanding of the workings and meaning of democracy. The tremendous task of physical reconstruction used up much of the mental and material resources which might have been employed in efforts to show German youth that it has a stake in the democratic way of life. Again, disclosures of aberrations such as former Nazis being permitted to teach in German schools are not calculated to imbue young people with an ardent faith in western liberalism. Yet it is precisely the schools on which the reorientation program depends most heavily.

The lesson of this sidelight of the Bavarian elections should spur Allied and German authorities, teachers and youth workers in their effort to develop the potential of German youth in the constructive cause of freedom. History has shown that there is no richer, easier prey for the would-be dictator than a youth drifting without aim and ideal. It is a danger neither the Germans nor the rest of the Western World at large can afford to ignore.

Address by Hon. Burnet R. Maybank, of South Carolina, Before National Association of Real Estate Boards

OF
HON. BURNET R. MAYBANK
OF SOUTH CAROLINA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, November 30 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered by me on November 14, 1950, before the forty-third annual convention of the National Association of Real Estate Boards, at Miami Beach, Fla.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REAL ESTATE AND GOVERNMENT

I have often had the occasion, as chairman of the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency, to welcome the very able representatives of your organization when they appeared before our committee to testify on housing legislation. Today I am grateful for the opportunity to return those visits and to renew pleasant associations.

Real estate is your business, and I certainly cannot hope to tell you anything about that subject which you don't already know. Since, however, we share common aims and face common problems, I think it would give you who build our homes a better understanding and appreciation of the role Government plays in helping you carry out your job if I explain briefly how the Banking and Currency Committee came to deal with housing legislation, our accomplishments, and our objectives.

The provision of adequate homes for all of our people has long presented a number of very difficult problems. At the root of these problems was the simple fact that a house, unlike other products of our very efficient system of production and distribution, could not readily be mass-produced, and neatly packaged, and shipped hundreds of miles. A house, even a simple one, is necessarily an expensive product, and one which very few people can purchase except on credit. In a free-enterprise system housing problems therefore resolve themselves in large part into questions of finance and of credit. It is for this reason that the Committee on Banking and Currency, both in the House and in the Senate, have been entrusted with jurisdiction over housing.

On a number of occasions within our own generation, housing problems have reached a point which made it necessary and inevitable that Federal action be taken. During the depression in the early 1930's hundreds of thousands of American families faced the loss of their homes through mortgage foreclosure. This threat carried with it the further threat of insolvency to banks, insurance companies, and other lending institutions, and of ruin to their depositors and policyholders and shareholders. Our entire social and economic structure was then in danger of serious and lasting harm. The part which Federal legislation played in meeting this crisis forms the background against which more recent legislation must be viewed in order to be understood.

The Home Owners' Loan Corporation—the HOLC—which was authorized by the Congress in 1933, made it possible for about 1,000,000 families to have their homes from mortgage foreclosure. This temporary agency also saved thousands of lending institutions from bankruptcy.

It was the HOLC that popularized the single, long-term, low-interest-rate mortgage. Many of you here, of course, remember that at one time two or three separate mortgages were customarily placed on even a small home. These mortgages generally expired in about 5 or 6 years and often sooner. Legal and recording fees contributed materially to the cost of housing when first, second, and third mortgages were periodically renewed. In addition, interest rates were high, especially on second and third mortgages. The HOLC, along with the FHA which was authorized in 1934, were largely responsible for eliminating this cumbersome and expensive system for financing residential real estate.

The mortgage insurance guaranties of the FHA brought a steady flow of credit into the home-construction field. The operations of the Home Loan Bank Board and its regional home loan bank system served the same purpose, as did the insurance operations of the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation. Incidentally just before the end of this session our committee reported and the Congress enacted legislation which permits the FSLIC to insure share accounts in an amount up to $10,000 each, instead of $5,000 as was formerly the case.

These various Federal programs all take the form of financial aids. These measures have greatly strengthened our private lending institutions and have enabled the residential construction industry to maintain a high level of production. This in turn has contributed to the profits and prosperity not only of lenders and builders but also of real-estate brokers and appraisers and managers. It has also made it possible for bank depositors, shareholders in savings and loan associations, and other investors to receive a fair return on safe and sound investments. All these results are very desirable, but none of them, and I wish to emphasize this, represents the primary reason why the Congress and the Government is concerned with residential real-estate financing or residential construction.

The major reason and the only justification for Federal housing legislation is the ultimate aim which the Government shares with the real-estate industry to provide decent housing for all our people. In the final analysis, the FHA, the Home Loan Bank Board, and the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation have justified their existence by the fact that they have helped to bring more and better housing within the reach of more American families, including those of low and moderate income. By itself the real-estate industry did not and could not hope to provide the opportunity of a decent home for all our citizens.

Let me give you a few illustrations. One problem which clearly could not be met through normal financial aids to private industry was the problem of housing for defense workers and military personnel during and immediately prior to World War II. Starting in 1940, there occurred vast migrations of families to industrial and other military centers. Lack of housing at that time represented a serious threat to the production of the tools of war. In order to encourage the greatest amount of construction by private builders through private financing, title VI of the National Housing Act was enacted, making FHA mortgage insurance available to private lenders and builders on more flexible and advantageous terms. This title was particularly effective in providing urgently needed rental housing through private financing. However, in remote areas and in other areas where the housing needs were thought to be temporary and where private industry could not undertake the job, the Government resorted to direct Federal financing. Even here, however, the actual construction was, of course, done by private builders.

Then there was the problem of our returning veterans and their inability to find a place to live. Many of our boys had given up their homes on entering military service. Very few had any opportunity during their war service to compete for existing homes then available at lower prices and rents. In recognition of these facts and of the severe postwar housing shortage, the Congress made special financing aids available to veterans wishing to purchase or build homes. The FHA title VI program was extended to veterans on the same terms as it had before served war workers, and the GI bill of rights provided for the home-loan guaranty program of the Veterans' Administration.

The health and welfare of our people, the status of family life, and the very structure of our communities are affected by any widespread failure to provide decent homes within the financial reach of our people. These are the considerations which help to shape legislative aids which are designed to meet consumer needs. However, there has been a consistent policy in all of our legislation to channel Federal aids through private financing to the very fullest extent possible.

Public housing, upon which some of you and I have sincerely differed, was resorted to as a means of meeting a real and a very desperate need, and one which was not being met, and which, according to the best and most expert evidence presented to our committee, could not be met by private enterprise. But even this program is carried on for the most part by private enterprise. No one can deny that the real-estate industry has benefited greatly from the Government's activity in the field of housing and home financing, even from the very programs it opposed.

Members of the House and Senate are not and cannot be expected to be experts on many of the questions they must legislate on, but they are experts on democracy and determining what is in the best interests of the majority of our people. Be assured, therefore, and have faith in our decisions, especially when we finally make up our minds on a controversial subject. You can be sure that we are convinced after exhaustive investigations and hearing all sides that we, a majority of your Congress, are only adding strength to and enhancing our system of competitive private enterprise.

It is not necessary for me to detail our record of housing achievement these last few years. You helped to make it possible. But it could never have been made were it not for the financial aids provided by the FHA, the Veterans' Administration, the Home Loan Bank Board, and the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation. Indeed, since the end of World War II, almost half of the dwellings started have been insured or guaranteed by either the FHA or the Veterans' Administration, and many of the others have been aided less directly by credit made available through the Home Loan Bank System. In June and July of this year, for instance, 35 percent of all the privately financed housing units started were insured by the FHA and 13 percent were guaranteed by the Veterans' Administration. Thus 48 percent of all private residential construction during these 2 months received major Federal financial aid. This 48 percent figure is not unusual. Rather, it is typical of the period since World War II.

In spite of the headway we have made in meeting our housing needs and in spite of the prosperous conditions prevailing in the real-estate industry you will be confronted by the challenge of fulfilling a huge housing need for many years to come. In 1940 our population was about 131,700,000. Today our poplation is about 150,500,000. The percentage increase is over 14 percent. The number of our dwelling units has increased from about 37,300,000 in 1940 to about 46,150,000 at the present time. This is a percentage increase of about 24 percent. In the meantime, however, the number of our households has increased by about 25 percent and our per-capita income, even after allowing for higher cost of living, has increased by about 80 percent. Thus the economic demand for housing has increased more rapidly than the supply. Furthermore these figures do not take into account the need to replace the many substandard units which are a blot upon our local communities and which a Nation as rich and as powerful as we are ought not to tolerate.

With building starts for 9 months of this year estimated at 1,105,000 we were really beginning to catch up on some of the backlog of housing demand when unfortunately the international situation took the unhappy turn it did. We could not, and cannot even now, although the military and international outlook is much brighter than it was a couple of months ago, permit current civilian demand to siphon away the materials and products needed for defense purposes, nor could we afford to allow prices to skyrocket and unstable economic conditions to develop.

Thus, the construction industry being the key industry it is, in peacetime or wartime, was naturally one of the first industries to feel the effects of our shift to a semiwar economy. It would not be fair to the home buyer, the real-estate industry, or to our citizens generally to allow the economic forces resulting from the international and military situation to have full and free play. A severe cutback in the record-breaking level of home production was not a pleasant thing to aim for. Yet, it is necessary if our defense effort is not to suffer. It is necessary also from a housing viewpoint, since the economic demand for new housing cannot long survive inflation in the cost of construction materials.

I am convinced that the need for reducing construction was proven beyond dispute. The only real problem remaining was how to devise credit regulations which would balance essential civilian needs against essential defense needs, and which would result in a fair apportionment of the necessary sacrifices among all those in need of housing, including veterans and their families and low-income and moderate-income families.

The Government has taken a major step in its attempt to solve this difficult problem. However, no one can fully evaluate the many factors involved, nor foresee the many new developments which arise. Therefore, it now remains for all of us to watch closely for the actual effects of the recent credit restrictions under changing conditions. I know that your industry, as well as the Housing Agency and the Federal Reserve Board, are doing just that. I am sure, also, that the credit controls will be modified from time to time on the basis of actual experience, in order to enable the housing industry to make the greatest possible contribution to our civilian and defense needs.

The National Association of Real Estate Boards and the whole real-estate industry has a tremendous responsibility in the period immediately ahead. Controls by themselves cannot do the job. We need the cooperation, above all, of industry. If we don't have it in this key industry where else can we expect it, and imagine, if you will, the consequences.

If you as an industry and we as a Nation make the small sacrifices that are required in the months ahead, your industry and our Nation can look ahead with assurance to a peace and prosperity the like of which you hesitate to dream of, but for which I feel confident we shall continue to work and pray.

The Strength of Unity

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LEVERETT SALTONSTALL
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, November 30 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Close Ranks," published in the Boston Herald of November 17, 1950. This is an excellent editorial in the present emergency situation.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CLOSE RANKS

Where is the strength of America? We are planning an army of 3,000,000 men. But Russia plans 12,000,000. We have the atom bomb. But so probably has Russia. We have allies. But so has Russia, allies with limitless manpower like China. We have amazing productive capacities. But Korea has shown us that Russia, too, can build formidable tanks and effective jet fighting planes. We have right and justice on our side. But the Russians hold the mastery of the technique of the big lie, to make the bad look good.

Where is our strength? How do we stand against the greatest adversary in all history? Do we even know the peril we are in?

Our strength must lie in an aroused unity, in a consciousness of the danger and in a mighty determination to meet it with all the force we have.

Somehow we haven't achieved that concentrated purpose. We do not even show signs of achieving it.

It is true that the crisis has come gradually. There has been no Pearl Harbor to stir the national consciousness. Instead we have passed from one grave incident to another only a little graver, and we could easily become engaged in a full scale war with China without realizing it.

But by this time the diabolical purpose of the Kremlin is certain. The real test of strength may come soon or late, but come it will.

In the meantime America must close its ranks. It must attain the same unity, the same fixed purpose that it would have if the armies of the two worlds were totally engaged. There must be a patriotic willingness to defer those domestic issues that divide and weaken us. The telephone strike that drags on over a difference of less than 4 cents an hour is a fantastic contrast to the bitter fighting in Korea and the uncertainty ahead. This is no time for the kind of politics that seeks the selfish advantage of one class or one group. The rivalry of business with business or union with union or management with union must be subordinated to the national security. No one wins if America loses.

The American people need to be alerted. They need to know that 4,798 Americans dead in Korea are not the end of the sacrifice that must be made. They need from Washington a true report on the state of the Nation. They need to have what we spoke of in our editorial from Washington yesterday, great targets to shoot at, bold objectives to reach, the call to close our ranks.

The Situation Confronting Us in Asia

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KENNETH S. WHERRY
OF NEBRASKA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, November 30 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, the leading article in the current issue of the national weekly news magazine, Pathfinder, is a most thoughtful discussion of the fateful situation momentarily confronting us in Asia. It is timely, but inasmuch as it was written several days ago, it may well have the virtue of a more calm viewpoint than is possible in the light of developments during the past 48 hours. Therefore, I think it is worthy of consideration by Members of the Senate, and for this reason I ask unanimous consent that it be inserted in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NO WORLD WAR IN ASIA—WHY UNITED STATES STRATEGY PREFERS A "DEAL" WITH RED CHINA TO PLAYING RUSSIA'S GAME

"So far as the United States is concerned," said the President last Thursday, "I wish to state unequivocally that because of our deep devotion to the cause of world peace and our long-standing friendship for the people of China, we will take every honorable step to prevent any extension of the hostilities in the Far East."

Upon these 51 words the balance between peace and a possible world war III teetered sickeningly this week. If a nine-man delegation from Red China to the UN will accept Harry Truman's words in good faith—and open the way to "honorable" steps—then the Korean war can soon end. If, however, Gen. Wu Hsiu-chuan and his Moscow-schooled delegates degrade their case at Lake Success to vituperative harangues, then the war will drag along interminably.

Of that, President Truman, Secretary of State Dean Acheson, and the Joint Chiefs of Staff were certain. But that was about all they were certain of on the eve of the conversations.

It was unpleasant to admit, but the United States was at war with China, if not with Soviet Russia itself.

Though the war was still limited to the Korean-Manchurian border area, they didn't know how long it would remain localized there.

Though they had plenty of theories, they didn't know why China had entered the war in the first place.

WELCOME TO AMERICA

Yet out of this dismal fog of ignorance, firm hopes of ultimate peace continued to grow. It is cheering that the Chinese delegation is coming to UN to talk—even though they come by way of Moscow. For more than a month prior to the delegates' departure from Peking, the United States had worked—sometimes through the Security Council, sometimes through Sardar K. M. Panikkar, Indian representative at Peking—to bring about these talks. If Wu Hsiu-chuan will talk—and talk about more than the United States Seventh Fleet in Formosan waters—these are the points around which the conversations will revolve, and the probable United States answers:

Question. What assurance have the Chinese that the United States does not have imperialistic designs on Manchuria?

Answer. The United States will refer to its role as a member of UN and state emphatically that its sole purpose in Korea is to establish peace in a free country. It will state just as emphatically that it does not have, and never had, any intention of crossing the Manchurian border.

Question. What guaranty do the Chinese have that the United States does not intend to seize giant hydroelectric plants along the border, built mainly by the Japanese, and turn them over to a United States-dominated Korea?

Answer. The United States will promise Manchuria continued Yalu River power rights. Doubtful ownership of any plant will be a matter for whatever commission the UN designates for the job.

Question. When peace comes to Korea, what share will the Chinese have in the reestablishment of a free Korean government?

Answer. The United States recognizes the fact that China should have some voice in the government of postwar Korea—from the standpoint of geography if no other. If the UN decides that China should have a seat in whatever commission is set up to supervise the creation of a new government, the United States will not object. However, the United States will oppose any move to establish a partisan control of a segmented Korea, such as was tried in the setting up of quadpartite zones in occupied Germany.

Question. Does the United States intend to support Chiang Kai-shek in Formosa?

Answer. The United States will insist that Formosa be neutralized as long as the Korean war continues. The United States does not care if Chiang stays in Formosa or gets out. The United States will support any government the Formosans adopt for themselves—so long as that government is freely chosen and not the product of external influences from Communist China—or any other nation.

Question. Does the United States oppose the admission of Red China to the UN?

Answer. More than a month ago United States Security Council Delegate Warren Austin said the United States would not veto a UN membership for Red China if other Council members voted approval. This week the United States will repeat this stand. (As a matter of fact, the State Department regards recognition of Red China and its admittance to UN only as a convenience, not an honor to China. Inasmuch as Communist control of China is a fait accompli—and since none of the United States allies in the west oppose recognition of China—State officials see no real reason for delay. However, from a negotiating viewpoint, it is good sense to hold out as long as possible.)

Question. If China were admitted to the UN and recognized by the United States, would the United States extend to China the same advantages of trade, point IV aid, and possible ECA help as it does to other nations?

Answer. To this the United States would give a limited "Yes." The hitch would be a Chinese guaranty that United States goods sent to China would not leak to Russia. (The United States expects that the guaranty would be given but not lived up to.

So, to match duplicity with duplicity, whenever any question arose the United States would apologize, say the limited quantities of the product make trading impossible and glibly point to the fact that we even withhold some goods from Britain.)

These demands and responses are based on the assumption that Red China entered the war primarily to improve its bargaining position. If, however, China's entry is the first step in an effort to involve the United States in a long, exhausting war, another answer will be given by this Nation's spokesmen:

The United States will not be enticed into a war with China at the expense of losing every gain it has made in Western Europe.

If the Chinese should turn loose the estimated 300,000 troops just behind the Manchurian border, hoping to drive the United Nations forces completely out of Korea or lure them into China, current strategy provides that:

1. Gen. Douglas MacArthur's forces will drop back into North Korea, establish a line at some arbitrarily selected point, possibly the fortieth parallel.

2. The United States will not quit in Korea until the peace is won, provided that peace can be won with the 7 American divisions and 12 Korean divisions MacArthur has now. (The Joint Chiefs of Staff has told MacArthur definitely that he can get no more.)

If this week's talks fail, President Truman may have to make this unpopular disclosure perhaps to Congress when it reconvenes on November 27. Bad as it will be for the thousands of wives and mothers who have lost husbands and sons in what then will appear as a fool's errand, every circumstance seemed to dictate that he could do nothing else.

His generals and his diplomats—and the President himself—have not budged 1 inch from their earlier conviction that if the showdown must come between Russia and the United States, it will come where the United States wants it and where it is best able to meet it: in Western Europe.

For the first time since the end of World War II, the State Department, the Defense Department, and the White House are in complete agreement on major policy matters.

They are convinced that the United States cannot fight in every part of the globe without destroying the strength needed to maintain its own security. If it is patently impossible to hold the line everywhere, it is only common sense to hold it among nations who in turn can befriend the United States, and who now are at least sympathetic toward the goals of freedom the United States seeks.

As Gen. Omar N. Bradley stated it in Atlanta, Ga., last week, "The means of Communist aggression are unlimited. * * * The means open to freemen are limited to worthy ones."

The United States cannot use Soviet techniques of international banditry, nor can it suppress free nations by totalitarian methods of conquest. It must fight with what it has—free people, free industry, and respect in the world family of nations. And its fight must necessarily be limited to the weapons it has.

This doesn't mean that the United States will fight an aggressive war on one hand and appease on the other. Nor does it mean that the United States will meekly take every slap in the face or stab in the back Russia chooses to make. It simply means that this Nation will struggle for peace—and for time—so long as national honor isn't jeopardized in the struggle.

Should that time come, Russia will get slapped and knifed in turn. But at a spot where she is most vulnerable.

Attack on the FBI—Book by Max Lowenthal, Reviewed by Walter Trohan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE A. DONDERO

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 30, 1950

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include therein an article appearing in Human Events November 22, 1950, on the book recently published by Max Lowenthal entitled "The Federal Bureau of Investigation." This book is an attack on the FBI. Walter Trohan, of the Chicago Tribune, reviews the book, and his statement follows:

THE FEDERAL BUREAU OF INVESTIGATION, BY MAX LOWENTHAL, REVIEWED BY WALTER TROHAN

By mysterious design, best known to the author and publisher, copies of this book sprouted on the desks of Members of Congress and Federal jurists on the heels of a letter from a Sloane official stating "this unbiased and profoundly conservative approach" would lead to some startling conclusions on the FBI. The dust jacket hails Lowenthal as "a conservative in the most profound sense" and asserts he does not "color his material, editorialize, or draw conclusions."

Now, because the book adds up to an attack on the FBI, which can be expected to be a standard reference for years, it is fitting that these claims to conservatism and objectivity be examined. It is altogether proper and conservative to fret over the possibility that a Federal police force can grow into an arm of terror in a police state. When such fears parallel Moscow radio attacks on the FBI and writings of notorious Communist-fronters, one can ask, "Who's conservative now?"

Mr. Lowenthal is a wealthy New York lawyer, who has been weaving in and out of Washington in various capacities for 30 years. The most detailed biography of Harry S. Truman to date, The Man of Independence, identifies him as the man who weaned the President from the realistic thinking of Pendergastism to the rarefied liberalism of the late Justice Louis D. Brandeis. Last September, Lowenthal acknowledged varying degrees of intimate acquaintance with 22 known Communists, Red spies, and notorious fellow travelers, including Alger Hiss, John J. Abt, Charles Kramer, and Lee Pressman, who is even now seeking to identify himself with conservatism. Lowenthal told the House Un-American Activities Committee: "The number of people I didn't know were members of the Communist Party is something that makes my hair stand on end." So much for the new conservatism.

And now to objectivity. The jacket claims that for every quote questioning the practices or efficiency of the FBI, Lowenthal quotes the FBI reply or replies of FBI defenders, "including, of course, J. Edgar Hoover." This reviewer learned that not one question was addressed to Hoover or the FBI by Lowenthal, and it is difficult, if not well-nigh impossible, to find a kind word for that FBI in the book. However, it reeks with criticism, most carefully traced to source in the most elaborate set of source notes in many a year, and these are most carefully edited to fit the slant against the FBI.

Much is made of an investigation of the FBI by Robert H. Jackson when the Supreme Court Justice was Attorney General. Not one word is included from his report, which emphasized the fact that the acts of every FBI agent are subject to examination by defense lawyers. Jackson said that if civil liberties are "in danger in this country, it is not by the FBI," and reported that with a record of 96-percent convictions in cases brought by the FBI "not one case has been reversed by an appellate court because of 'third degree' or other improper treatment of defendants." Among many other editings against the FBI there is a quotation of an attack by former Senator Carl Hatch, but no mention of a virtual retraction 2 days later. Thus, kind words for the FBI die under the Lowenthal scissors.

Lowenthal belabors the FBI as a menace to freedom of speech and freedom of thought. At the same time he criticizes the FBI for not being efficient enough, holding that the atomic-spy case and the case of his friend Hiss should have broken sooner. In his brief, which is heavy reading, he cites a gamut of cases from Sacco-Vanzetti and the World War raids of A. Mitchell Palmer to the Judy Coplon affair as offering evidence against J. Edgar Hoover and the FBI today.

The verdict of this reviewer on Lowenthal is not guilty of conservatism and guilty of objectivity against the FBI.

Tragedy in the Far East

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD J. THYE

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, November 30 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "Tragedy in the Far East," written by Walter Winchell and published in the Washington Post of November 30, 1950.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

WALTER WINCHELL IN NEW YORK

The failure of peace-loving nations to detect the manifold symptoms of war until it becomes an international contagion is one of history's supreme tragedies. Ironically, communities have learned to quarantine scarlet fever, but counties have neglected a far more disastrous epidemic called war. If the democracies had disinfected nazism when it was merely a rash in Munich beer halls, the lives of 40,000,000 people might have been saved.

During the 1920's when every throw of the dice on Wall Street turned up seven; when prohibition served as the theme of the Nation's leading controversy; when we thought the hip-flask was the most perilous threat to the Nation's youth—Communist Russia already succeeded in infiltrating China on the political, financial and intellectual fronts. The velvet-gloved aggression against China was under the direction of the Comintern. And this operation was masterminded by a Communist leader who was then almost unknown—Joseph Stalin. * * * Some Americans, who were born during the 1920's, are soldiers today being killed by Chinese Communists.

Washington is now discovering what it should have known three decades ago. Never were so many fooled for so long. The Communist master plan in Asia was based on involving the United States in a catastrophic struggle with China. This was made known with fiery clarity during September 1920, when Grigor Zinoviev, chairman of the Third International, proclaimed: "The real revolution will blaze up only when 800,000,000 people who live in Asia unite with us, when we see hundreds of millions of people in revolt. Now we must kindle a holy war against British, French, and American capitalist."

Lenin dispatched agents to organize the Chinese Communist Party over 30 years ago. While renouncing aggressive intentions and giving assurances of amity, the Comintern in 1919 set up a school in Shanghai for the study of Communist strategy. Since Communists, like rodents, operate in the crevices, this school was the initial Red crevice which later split China wide open:

One of the agents who established the school attained influence within the Chinese Government and managed to have a Chinese leader appointed as director of the government's vital propaganda committee. That chief is now the dictator of China—Mao Tse-tung.

The devilish candor of Chinese Communists and their Russian cohorts is as incredible as the gullibility of Washington. In January 1923, China's Reds gathered in Canton and publicly announced: "The Communist Party of China under the guidance and with the aid of the Comintern succeeded in drafting a concrete political and tactical line." The ideological allegiance of Chinese Communists never wavered. During 1944 a book written by Mao Tse-tung was published by the Communist Party in the United States. It included this: 'The world now depends on communism for its salvation and so does China." The Communists later withdrew this book from sale here.

But as late as 1946 the Truman administration believed it could bring peace to China by effecting a conciliation between the Reds and Nationalists via a coalition government. Its vision of amity turned out to be just another mirage. That diplomatic blunder could be mildly described as naiveté—and truthfully described as ignorance.

Despite the 30-year open alliance between China's Reds and the Soviet Union—proof of this alliance was still considered news in the United States on November 21, 1948. On that day the New York Times offered reams of evidence in an effort to prove the close and definite connection between Red China and Russia. The Times added: "The Chinese leaders make no attempt to conceal the identity of interests with the Soviet Union. The overwhelming evidence, therefore, is that the Chinese Communists are pursuing policies identical in aims with the policies of Moscow." That scoop must have raised guffaws in the Kremlin.

The streets of Canton were stained with blood in 1927 when Communist-inspired riots exploded. Yet the isolationist mentality in the United States was so rigid at that time, most editors here either buried the news or ignored it.

The evidence is mountainous that Red China is merely a Russian satellite. Furthermore, the State Department's secret files show that the Department knew it as early as 1945. But it plowed through its own intelligence warnings like a Long Island Railroad engineer opening the throttle through a red light. The Wedemeyer report is still a state secret, but its contents are not. It foretold the Far East catastrophe to the opening rifle shot. The State Department's white paper on China will live in history—as the greatest outright fraud the State Department ever tried to perpetrate on the American public. But the adminis ration is about to reverse itself on that, too. The Nation is so close to war that even Acheson is considering calling on Chiang Kai-shek for aid in Korea.

It takes a split second to pull the trigger which signals the start of armed srife. But the first shot on the battlefield is always preceded by years of ignorance, hypocrisy, and skulduggery in the diplomatic field. War itself is not inevitable. It is the impact of countless blunders during peacetime which produces a war's inevitability. The price of our past diplomatic mistakes is now being paid with the lives of Americans in Korea. Communism is on the march from Indonesia to Indochina; from the Malay Archipelago to the Philippines. If communism conquers Asia—it will have enslaved over half or the world's population.

Publisher M. Cowles (Look, Flair, Quick and newspapers in Des Moines and Minneapolis) at the Saints and Sinners event the other day spoke about newsmen who failed to recognize the Red menace: "Too many of us," he admitted, "were fooled. Too many were fools. Too many have realized too late. Only a few spoke out early."

Thanks for the ad.

It's Your Congress Magazine

OF
HON. WAYNE N. ASPINALL OF COLORADO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, November 30, 1950

Mr. ASPINALL. Mr. Speaker, with the feeling in mind that any publication which tends to diffuse accurately information concerning the National Congress, its membership and procedures, is something to be desired very much, and believing that I express the opinion of the Members of the House when I state that each one of us was personally gratified to receive upon our return to Congress from the recent recess the December 1950 issue of Your Congress magazine, I am pleased to have inserted under my name the following letter from the editor of the magazine in which letter Mr. Miller expresses the hopes and plans of his organization in the preparation and use of future issues of this publication:

WASHINGTON, November 29, 1950.
Mr. BERTRAM M. GROSS,
Executive Secretary,
Council of Economic Advisers,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. GROSS: I was pleased to receive your inquiry through Miss Cantor today about the Committee for Congress and the Congress Study Council.

This project, as outlined in the statement in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, is the culmination of almost 2 years' study of the best use to make of the Pictorial Directory of Congress, 30-year-old picture book of the Members of Congress which Mrs. Miller and I own.

A year ago September, Mrs. Miller had the honor of presenting a special White House edition of the Pictorial Directory of Congress to President Truman at the White House when she outlined some of our plans.

In the past, the Pictorial Directory has been used at the beginning of each session as an identification book for Members and officials. This function is now being supplanted by an officially published booklet. The secondary market has been the sale of the directory to Members with their pictures or biographical data specially imprinted.

I am a writer and editor by profession but I have had an intensive and extensive experience in the field of professional public relations. I wrote a course outline on public relations and taught the first course on the subject used in the distributive education program.

This combined journalistic, public relations, and educational background naturally gravitated me to a search for the best means of utilizing the Pictorial Directory. I believe we have found it in the committee for Congress and the study council program.

One of my closest advisers and confidants on this project, although his name is not publicly identified with it, is one of our greatest authorities on Congress and its Members. The other members of our founding committee are virtually all established newspapermen or correspondents listed in the Congressional Directory.

From my research I know there is a definite need for the program we have launched. One of the great foundations may sponsor the project.

Meantime, however, Mrs. Miller and I are carrying the load of laying the groundwork for the program, revamping the pictorial directory for the Eighty-second Congress, preparing the 1952 edition of Your Congress Magazine.

We have offered to present the publication to a foundation or nonpartisan organization or group that will carry through this program, and make a down-to-earth, practical and realistic method of learning about Congress and its Members available to every school and college student, every factory worker, every union member, housewife, clubwoman, teen-ager.

There are the broader implications, such as the need for keeping Congress strong and alert, so that it will hold its own with the Executive or the bureaucracy in the effort to keep our democratic Republic free and representative. However, we are basically interested in letting every man, woman, and child in the Nation know that they have a direct personal interest and stake in Congress and its Members and what they do and how they do their job.

I could cite numerous authorities to prove that this is a vital need for such an educational and public-relations program. I think, perhaps, one of the most convincing pieces of evidence, was a letter received in today's mail, which reached me about the same time as the telephone call from your office.

The letter is from Alta M. Leach, executive secretary in the office of the Honorable WAYNE N. ASPINALL, Member of Congress for the Fourth District of Colorado, a member of the important House Public Lands Committee. I have her permission to quote it to you in its entirety and to publicize it. The letter follows:

DEAR MR. MILLER: I noted with interest your letter addressed to the Members of Congress dated November 7, in which you refer to the educational project, now under way, which will acquaint our public with the legislative machinery.

Upon returning to the State during this last campaign, it was absolutely appalling to note the large number of individuals who are thoroughly unacquainted with the operations of Congress and the many citizens who do not even know the names of their Representatives and Senators.

Although the press makes a valiant effort to inform the public, apparently the newspaper reader often turns to the sports page, society page, or cartoon strip, rather than absorb articles pertaining to Capitol Hill.

I think you will be doing a great service in sponsoring a national study program in schools, colleges, clubs, factories, and other assemblies. Good government can be attained only when we have a well-informed electorate.

Sincerely,

ALTA M. LEACH.

I can assure you, Mr. Gross, that the receipt of this letter, entirely unsolicited as it was, was a source of great inspiration to us.

At this stage of development of the combined educational and public-relations project for Congress and its Members, we are similarly grateful for the interest shown by individuals or organizations.

This is not a personal project, but an activity in which the whole Nation must participate if it is to be successful.

One of our initial objectives is to place in the hands of every Senator and Representative quantities of Your Congress magazine and related publications for distribution to schools, colleges, and other interested groups. We are developing material for radio and television use. We already have motion-picture films available for immediate use, as Mr. Allan Dibble, of the March of Time, has offered the use of the March of Time Forum films, The Life of a Congressman and The Congress, to the program.

Our feet are solidly on the ground in this endeavor. We have planned long and carefully and know that we are on the right track.

It's worth while, this attempt to expand the knowledge of and personal participation in the Congress and our Government, of every citizen. It's especially important at this time in history, when our free system is faced off directly with the fight-to-the-finish challenge of totalitarianism.

The writer or others of our founding committee will be happy to discuss the program with you in person at your convenience.

Yours truly,

HAL. J. MILLER,
Editor, Your Congress Magazine,
Executive Director, Committee for Congress, Sponsor of National Congress Study Councils.

Economic Aid for the Philippine Islands

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHESTER A. CHESNEY
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, November 30, 1950

Mr. CHESNEY. Mr. Speaker, in reading the Washington Post of November 25, 1950, my attention was directed to conditions presently existing in the administration of the government of the Republic of the Philippines.

In view of these existing conditions, I recommend that the Eighty-second Congress carefuly scrutinize any legislation brought before it to continue economic aid to the Philippine Islands.

I also highly recommend that Members of the Eighty-second Congress do not hesitate to make a thorough and sweeping investigation of the conditions set forth in the editorial of the above mentioned issue of the Washington Post.

Our national economy is now undergoing drastic changes to meet the demands of an adequate defense program to protect ourselves against the growing threat of communism, communistic influences and aggression. We must protect our economy from any government which seeks our aid, only to misuse and waste the funds which we need so badly for ourselves.

Our national security rests heavily on our ability to wisely handle our money.

We cannot afford to support any government which insists on ignoring and, apparently, even supporting the conditions such as now exist in the Philippine Islands.

I charge that it is the duty of the Eighty-second Congress to be especially arduous in weeding out legislation granting economic aid to countries diametrically opposed to those principles which we hold in such high regard and for which we are even now sacrificing the lives of our young men in Korea.

For the information of those Members of the Eighty-first Congress who may have overlooked the above mentioned article, the entire text of this editorial follows:

PHILIPPINE AGREEMENT

Thanks largely to ECA Administrator William C. Foster, a good start appears to have been made toward carrying out the Bell report on the Philippines. In his conferences with President Quirino, Mr. Foster encountered stiff resistance to that all-important, even basic, provisions in the Bell report that further American aid be conditioned upon "supervision and direction" by an American mission. Filipino officials had a good deal to say about the islands being a free and sovereign power; all they needed from the United States was another substantial handout. But Mr. Foster made it unmistakably clear that the Santa Claus role is out. If further aid is to be recommended to Congress, it must be on a partnership basis involving all the strict accounting that is applied to ECA funds.

The agreement that was finally signed commits the Philippine Government to three important steps: (1) It undertakes to collect an additional 250,000,000 pesos in tax revenue, an increase of about 80 percent. (2) It agrees to pass a minimum-wage law, which the Bell mission found to be important because of the pitifully low standard of living prevailing among some groups of Filipinos. (3) The Philippine Legislature must pass a general resolution accepting the other recommendations of the Bell report. In return President Truman will ask Congress for economic aid for the Philippines, to be administered through the ECA, the top figure being $250,000,000, presumably to be applied over a period of years. With the Quirino regime still reeking with corruption and law enforcement at a low ebb, the program is admittedly a gamble. Most Americans would no doubt prefer to do nothing in support of the Quirino regime were it not for the danger that inaction might lead to a Communist coup. The Philippines is in a special category in American consideration.

The test will come, of course, in the steps that President Quirino takes to carry out his agreement. These steps must amount to something more than paper compliance. As to taxes, for example, it is said that no additional revenue would be needed if the present tax laws were enforced. But evasion and outright flouting of the tax laws is prevalent, and there are charges that the President himself is one of the evaders. Even where corruption has been exposed beyond question, Mr. Quirino has failed to prosecute the crooks and in some instances to sever their official connections. More and more Filipinos are asking whether he is afraid that a genuine housecleaning would expose himself. So confidence in the Manila regime continues to sink, the disorderly elements gain strength, and the democratic experiment in the Philippines moves closer toward a potential blow-up. If American aid is to be useful in these circumstances, it will certainly have to be administered with a firm hand.

Armistice Day, 1950

OF
HON. JOSEPH R. BRYSON
OF SOUTH CAROLINA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, November 30, 1950

Mr. BRYSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include the following speech delivered by me at Spartanburg, S. C., on Armistice Day, November 11, 1950:

We are gathered here today to observe the thirty-second anniversary of the armistice of 1918 which ended the first great world conflict. While it is of great importance that we fittingly observe that armistice, it is vastly more important that we commemorate the supreme sacrifice of our sacred dead in both World Wars and that of our sons who have given and still are giving their lives for the cause of freedom, justice, and integrity in Korea. We the living, who today stand here at this mid-point of the twentieth century, have the opportunity to rededicate and reconsecrate our lives to the cause of freedom and democracy in honoring the sacred dead of these three great conflicts.

Thirty-two years ago this morning, many thousands of men climbed out of the long trench lines that stretched almost without interruption across northern France to the English Channel. Some of these men belonged to advancing divisions which had broken a 4-year deadlock, had crossed the blasted and blackened areas of No Man's Land and come at last into the clear. Others were members of an army in retreat which had seen victory snatched from its grasp in 1914 and again in 1918. But even among the defeated there was some hope. An armistice is itself a form of victory for the scarred and weary soldier. On the ruins of the old imperial ambitions, a new and better world surely would be erected.

For many years after 1918 the Western World took it for granted that in this war to end all wars the sacrifice of our blood and treasure had won an enduring peace. During the 1920's a wave of pacifism swept our country. We in our adolescence thought that by removing all signs of war we could eliminate war itself. We scrapped our battleships, reduced our military forces to a mere skeleton, and depended upon a policy of isolationism to insure peace.

We know now that the world of 1918 and 1919 had hoped too much and planned too little, had been noble in its aspirations, but weak and indecisive in its deeds. We know it because of the holocaust that swept over the world in all its fury only 21 years after that first Armistice Day and, in December 1941, dragged down our own country into the maelstrom of conflict amidst the shattered bodies of our sons and the sunken ships of our Pacific Fleet at Pearl Harbor.

Standing among the debris of our shattered hopes and unfulfilled dreams during the bleak, gloomy days of late 1941 and early 1942, this great Nation rose in a few months from its position of almost total unpreparedness to that of the greatest military power the world has ever seen. We repeated upon a tremendous scale during the Second World War what we had previously done during the First World War. We accomplished a production miracle the like of which only freemen are capable. Once again our military victory over the Axis Powers was complete, absolute, and unqualified on land, on the sea, and in the air.

The monetary cost of victory to the United States cannot be calculated accurately for either of these World Wars. One estimate for the second war has been set at $300,000,000,000. This is right as far as it goes. Tremendous quantities of material were consumed in the furnace of war. In time this loss could have been replaced. Work and wealth build and produce the necessities of peace as well as of war. But the lives of our sons can never be replaced. The sacred dead of all our country's wars are the real cost we have paid for victory.

In spite of this sacrifice, today there is no peace. The uneasy truce of the past 5 years was broken last June 25 when South Korea was invaded by a Russian-trained, Russian-equipped army of North Korean Communists. As in 1917 and 1941, we were not prepared for the crisis as far as planes, ships, tanks, and guns are concerned. We had dissipated the magnificent military strength of 1944 and 1945 by an almost foolhardy demobilization and disarmament of our Armed Forces. We had done it against not only the advice of some of our leaders; we had done it against their pleading as well.

Let me quote part of a speech made on October 29, 1945, at the New York Herald Tribune Forum in New York City by General of the Army George C. Marshall, at that time time Chief of Staff, United States Army.

General Marshall's warning was this:

"We are still strong today, but we won't be so a few months hence, unless we take very positive and definite measures to give some degree of permanence to the strength for which we just spent so much of human life and money to develop.

"We are currently engaged in the demobilization of our wartime forces at the fastest possible rate. * * *

"It is certain * * * that the Military Establishment cannot hope to insure the safety of the United States very much longer at the present rate of demobiliaztion unless some permanent peacetime program is established and at an early date.

"For the moment, in a widespread emotional crisis of the American people, demobilization has become, in effect, disintegration, not only of the Armed Forces but apparently of all conception of world responsibility and what it demands of us. If we are to nourish the infant United Nations organization and thus establish some possibility of a future decent world order, definite measures must be taken immediately to determine at least the basic principles for our postwar military policy. I have never felt so certain of anything in my life."

It is needless to say that General Marshall's warning went unheeded—needless but not useless. Each succeeding world crisis in which our Nation becomes involved grants us less and less time to prepare ourselves to meet that crisis. Our period of grace has shrunk from years in the First World War to months in the Second, and finally to weeks in the present Korean conflict. We must reconcile our intense desire to follow the pursuits of peace with the demands of the world beyond our shores. I think it was Thomas Jefferson who said: "Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty." That is true today as far as it goes, but as long as our Nation must face communism across the iron curtain, we must alter Jefferson's statement to "Eternal vigilance and preparedness are the price of liberty." Let us recognize this situation as a fact, accept it as a fact, and reconcile ourselves to the fact. Military strength is a necessity in the world of today. Our continued existence as a free people depends upon it. It is true that our arms have again won a magnificent victory, this time in Korea, for which we all thank God, but fighting still goes on. Our sons are still giving their lives. If peace again comes to Korea, Russian puppets in Indochina, India, Iran, or Germany may be ordered into action by their masters in the Kremlin.

A second situation which the American people must accept, whether or not they want to accept it, is the position of the United States as the leader of the free world. Our only alternative is isolation and gradual suffocation if not actual conquest by communism. For the foreseeable future America's sons will be on the perimeters of the world defending our way of life. It cannot be otherwise. Again I say, let us recognize this situation as a fact, accept it as a fact, and reconcile ourselves to the fact. Never again will the peace-loving nations stand idly by and let aggression envelop whole peoples. Never again will we wait until all the forces and resources of what is left of a free world have to be mobilized in a life and death struggle for survival. Korea has proved this to the world if it has done nothing else.

In this war, as in the last, the real struggle is not tank against tank, nor plane against plane, or yet man against man. The real struggle is idea against idea, philosophy of government against philosophy of government, freedom against slavery. We are fighting for the preservation of our democratic way of life just as much today as we were between 1941 and 1945. Victory can come only through the unity of our people and through sacrifice not only on the part of our military personnel but on the part of every American.

Six years ago today an Armistice Day address was delivered at Columbia by a gentleman who lives here in your city, the Governor-elect of the State of South Carolina. I would like to end these few thoughts today with a quotation from that address which is as pertinent in 1950 as it was in 1944:

"Let us on this Armistice Day dedicate ourselves anew to the great tasks remaining before us. Let us pledge to those who made the supreme sacrifice in the last war and those who are making the supreme sacrifice in this war, that their sacrifices shall not have been made in vain and that with God's help, we shall banish the scourge of war from this earth."

My Defense of My Friend Hoover and the Federal Bureau of Investigation

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 30, 1950

Mr. RIVERS. Mr. Speaker, there appeared recently a book by Max Lowenthal entitled "The Federal Bureau of Investigation." This is a lengthy volume and from a casual observation its pretense could easily be mistaken as an objective and authoritative compilation on the mission of the FBI and to the unsuspecting and uninformed it could very easily be one of the most expensive booby traps ever contrived by the human intelligence to subtly undermine the most indispensable, effective, honorable, and honored department of our Government—an organization which, during its 42 years of existence, has won fame and respect in every town, hamlet, home, and fireside throughout the length and breadth of this Nation. Its Director, the Honorable J. Edgar Hoover, towers today above any man on the Federal payroll. He has more influence and prestige in both branches of the Congress than any servant who ever took an oath of office to defend our institutions and the philosophy of our democratic form of government.

Mr. VELDE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RIVERS. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois, my distinguished friend and former agent of the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

Mr. VELDE. Mr. Speaker, I received a copy of this book written by Max Lowenthal. It was on my desk when I returned to Washington last Monday. I questioned my staff and asked them if they had ordered it. They informed me they had not, and I know for certain I did not order the book. It apparently was sent to me by the publishers, probably at the request of the author, Max Lowenthal.

I was quoted in this book, I believe on page 442, in a speech I made on the floor of the House in May 1950. In that speech I criticized the Department of Justice and the Attorney General for failure to prosecute some known espionage agents which I happened to have investigated during the time I served with the FBI.

The author, of course, is a very clever lawyer. He is a great artist at twisting the facts. He quoted me in order to get his point across that I was criticizing the Federal Bureau of Investigation and J. Edgar Hoover, my former boss, which is very far from the truth. I had no intention of criticizing Mr. Hoover or any of the staff or members of the FBI.

As a matter of fact, we all know that Mr. Hoover and the FBI have nothing to do with prosecution except to recommend prosecution of known espionage cases. The criticism that Mr. Lowenthal makes of the FBI in this respect is, therefore, very false. It is an undeserved criticism entirely and I resent it.

I sent this book back to the publishers and suggested to them that they obtain the autograph of Max Lowenthal and send it on to Uncle Joe Stalin in Moscow because he would appreciate it a whole lot more than I would.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RIVERS. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, my answer to this attack on Mr. Hoover will be a resolution to provide for a special congressional medal for Mr. Hoover. I expect to introduce this resolution in the latter days of the present Congress or early in the new Congress. It will be a resolution to confer a special congressional medal upon Mr. Hoover in recognition of the outstanding work that he has done to suppress communism, and otherwise better the conditions of this country.

It is an outrage that an American who has carried the flag as Mr. Hoover has carried it should be smeared as was done by this pinko, and alleged to be Communist, Max Lowenthal.

Mr. RIVERS. I may say to the gentleman from Georgia that no man in this Nation has done more for the Nation under so many obstacles.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RIVERS. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. This Max Lowenthal is said to be a Communist. That this book smearing the FBI is nothing but Communist propaganda. If you have any doubt about that, check up on his record.

J. Edgar Hoover is one of the great men of this Nation. If the Congress of the United States had followed the suggestions I have been making for years and made the FBI an independent agency and relieved J. Edgar Hoover of the embarrassment that he now suffers as a result of those who try to tell him what he may investigate and what he may not, if the Congress would make the FBI, the Federal Bureau of Investigation, an independent agency J. Edgar Hoover could be worth more to us today than any other man alive in letting us know what is going on throughout the world. But he cannot do it with Communists like this abusing him and that little group down there in the Department of Justice trying to stultify him and prevent him from carrying out the duties of his exalted position.

Mr. RIVERS. I thank the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. BRYSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RIVERS. I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. BRYSON. Mr. Speaker, of all the multitudinous Federal agencies we have, I can think of none other that has the highest degree of respect than does the Federal Bureau of Investigation. I speak particularly of the little people, the man in the street, out in the hinterland. I have seen a copy of the book to which the gentleman is now addressing himself. As a member of the Committee on the Judiciary I am personally acquainted with the great work being done under the direction of Mr. J. Edgar Hoover. I want to commend the gentleman for the time he has taken and the study he has given in his analysis of this fraudulent book.

The Max Lowenthal smear book on the FBI convicts itself when it is considered along with the known public record of the FBI. The publishers claim:

> This book has been written in the interest of national security.

This is a fraudulent misrepresentation unless the publisher, William Sloane Associates, was thinking of the national security of some country other than the United States. If the author wanted to be objective, as is falsely claimed for him by the publishers, then he would have gone to the FBI and seen its Director, J. Edgar Hoover, and told him like a man exactly what he feared.

The public press, however, states he did not contact the FBI. Yet the author is represented as a lover of civil liberties. One who truly champions civil liberties is first of all honest and seeks to do justice. The mere fact that the author did not call upon the FBI to state its side of the case establishes beyond a peradventure of doubt that he was interested only in smearing the FBI.

Beyond that the author does not even quote the public record. Let me be specific and prove my point. I was intrigued by one reference in the book. On page 320 the author says:

> FBI practices were summed up in March 1940 by a Senate committee.

A review of the report of the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce accompanying Senate Resolution 224, does not even contain the name of the Federal Bureau of Investigation. On page 5 of this report, in reciting the abuses referred to in Lowenthal's book, each sentence is preceded by the words "some police" did this and that. Nowhere does it say the FBI committed the abuses.

Lowenthal's book admits that while the report did not "specifically state that its charges were directed against the Bureau, Chairman Burton K. Wheeler, in a press interview, acknowledged that the report was, in fact, aimed at that police unit." The author then cites several newspaper clippings as his source. I checked on only one—the New York Daily News, March 13, 1940—and here is how former Senator Wheeler is quoted:

> "I am opposed to wire tapping, whether by the Treasury, the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the Interior Department, or private agencies," Wheeler told reporters. "If the FBI has done any tapping, it will certainly be investigated."

This report of the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce was issued as a result of a resolution introduced by Senator THEODORE GREEN, of Rhode Island—Senate Resolution 224—and, apparently as a result of press inquiries, Senator GREEN issued a statement which appeared in the New York Journal-American on March 14, 1940, under the headline "'Wire-tap smear'—fails, brings Hoover praise." I have secured the full text of Senator GREEN's statement dated March 13, 1940, which clearly and categorically sets forth the ideas of Senator GREEN and that the resolution was not directed at the FBI. I offer the full statement for inclusion in the RECORD. However, in concluding his statement, Senator GREEN said:

> As a matter of fact, this investigation into wire-tapping practices was partly the result of evidence uncovered by the Federal Bureau of Investigation in my State.

No where in Lowenthal's book do I find this statement. If he were honestly telling the story of the FBI, surely he would have been objective. But maybe there is another reason. The very cover of his book states he was employed by the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce from 1935 to 1942. Is it possible that this same Lowenthal was the author of this report? Surely if the report were directed at the FBI as Lowenthal says it was, then there would have been a further record. But there is not. The subcommittee appointed to make the investigation, instead of investigating the FBI, did exactly what Senator GREEN in his statement of March 13, 1940, said it would—it investigated a wire-tapping situation in Rhode Island which the present Attorney General, J. Howard McGrath, then a United States attorney, and the FBI investigated. This one instance and these facts prove the dishonesty of the book and its publisher's claims.

One other item on the same page 320 attracted my attention. Lowenthal referred to the Spanish Loyalist cases in Detroit and says Attorney General Jackson "sent an investigator of his own to inquire into the facts; the latter reported that the FBI agents had engaged in conduct which might constitute a violation of the Constitution." I have learned that the investigator is now Federal Judge Henry Schweinhaut. His lengthy report was relased to the press by the then Attorney General, now Mr. Justice Robert H. Jackson, who also released a letter to the late Senator George W. Norris to the press. But Lowenthal does not quote this letter in his book, because it would not support his smear upon the FBI. In this letter, the then Attorney General said:

> I am of course anxious, as you are, that in law enforcement we do no violence to our traditional civil liberties. I am convinced that if those liberties are generally endangered in this country it is not by the FBI.

If the rest of the book is as one-sided and inaccurate and conveys the false impressions which the two items do on page 320, then the publisher and the author are entitled to an award for the book of the year containing the most errors and the greatest smear. In fact, I am sure that they will be heartily commended by bloody Joe Stalin as the Communist Party could not have done a more effective job.

STATEMENT OF THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN, OF RHODE ISLAND, MARCH 13, 1940

My attention has been called to news articles which have appeared in some newspapers in which it is alleged that I was asked whether the Senate resolution with respect to the investigation of wire tapping was directed at Mr. J. Edgar Hoover and the Federal Bureau of Investigation. I replied that the investigation was not aimed at anyone in particular, but at the practice of wire tapping in general.

No remarks of mine in answer to this question justify the inference that my resolution was directed at the Federal Bureau of Investigation or Mr. J. Edgar Hoover, its Director. I have the greatest feeling of regard for Mr. Hoover, for the splendid work that he has done in law enforcement, and for the efficient and excellent organization he has built up. I admire the splendid accomplishments of the Federal Bureau of Investigation in meeting the great crime menace of 1933 and 1934 and the subsequent fine results which the activities of the Bureau have given to the country generally. As a matter of fact, this investigation into wire-tapping practices was partly the result of evidence uncovered by the Federal Bureau of Investigation in my State.

Hon. GEORGE W. NORRIS,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR NORRIS: I am asking Henry Schweinhaut to deliver to you the report upon his inquiry into the complaints about the arrests in the Detroit cases. He, having personally interviewed the defendants, agents, and witnesses, will be able to give you any detailed information you may desire.

There is always a wide difference of opinion over methods of law enforcement agencies. Under any view of the matter, wide discretion must be left to officers in the field. They must act in the face of opposition and perhaps danger, and without opportunity for calm deliberation. That the agents in Detroit acted within their instructions, and exercised their discretion in good faith, seems clear to me. Under such circumstances they are entitled to my support.

I am of course anxious, as you are, that in law enforcement we do no violence to our traditional civil liberties. I am convinced that if those liberties are generally endangered in this country it is not by the FBI.

In weighing the general attitude of the Bureau, it is important to bear in mind that every agent acts under the probability that his conduct will be examined by shrewd lawyers for defendants, every confession may be challenged, and every act exposed in open court. The Bureau is thus under continuous and hostile examination.

Under this severe test of cases investigated by the Federal Bureau of Investigation and prosecuted as a result of its investigations, convictions are had in 96 percent. In the years since Mr. Hoover became head of the Bureau not one case has been reversed by an appellate court because of third degree or other improper treatment of defendants. These, to me, are very impressive facts, not only by themselves but in comparison with any law enforcing body anywhere.

In an agency as large as the Federal Bureau of Investigation errors of judgment and of overzeal will from time to time occur, and criticism is helpful both to the Director and to the Attorney General in avoiding repetition. But I am confident that the more the operations of the Bureau are explored the more it will appear that its vigorous and effective work for law enforcement is conducted with a fundamental purpose to observe the rights of defendants.

Yours very truly

ROBERT H. JACKSON,
Attorney General.

Mr. RIVERS. I thank the gentleman from South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, my reason for defending this organization is because I believe I owe it to the FBI to say a word in its behalf. I formerly worked for 4 years in the Department of Justice. I was not a member of the FBI but in my capacity as an attorney in that Department, I had access to the agents of this organization and their investigations were the bases quite frequently of our courses of action. I, therefore, had a long opportunity to appraise the value of what Edgar Hoover does and that for which his organization stands. I need no one to speak for me or to tell me of the FBI. I know that I can speak with authority and from experience.

I take the floor today for one purpose and that is to ask questions why one Max Lowenthal should, at this time, write a book berating Edgar Hoover and his honored institution. I further ask the question of who is paying the freight for the distribution of this book to every Member of Congress, United States attorneys, Federal judges, newspaper columnists, newspaper editors, college professors, radio commentators, and countless others holding State and local positions of authority and many philanthropic organizations. In short, it was sent to anyone who could in anywise mold or color public opinion. I do not believe the record of William Sloan & Co. is such that its philanthropies, if it has any, would permit it to make such a widespread gratis distribution. I am, therefore, constrained to say or to feel that the expense for this colossal distribution is paid for by others who do not appear on the surface.

I ask another question, What earthly good under the sun can inure to the American people either individually or collectively from this publication? What earthly good can the undermining of the FBI do at a time when the Congress has passed a subversive and anti-Communist piece of legislation which the Attorney General has at least been persuaded to, in somewise, implement pursuant to his sacred oath, despite his opposition to it. I further ask the question, How in the name of heavens can this thing help America at a time when communism is not only running rampant with its underground highways but is enjoying significant victories against the United Nations and America on the battlefields of Korea? Mr. Speaker, I believe the answer to my queries is obvious. This book can only give aid and comfort to one Joe Stalin and the puppets who are now dancing on his marionette stages throughout the world.

I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that V. Minayev who wrote in the New Times, Moscow, under date of February 15, 1950, entitled "J. Edgar Hoover and His G-Men" has rejoiced with his complimentary copy of this edition which I assume the Communist Party paid for and sent to him. I am sure that likewise Y. Borisov is also happy with the same article he wrote in the New Times under a similar date. His article was "The Growth of the Peace Movement."

J. EDGAR HOOVER AND HIS G-MEN

(By V. Minayev)

J. Edgar Hoover has been Director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation for already a quarter of a century. He is the factual head of the entire police espionage system of the United States, and is perhaps the only important American Government official who has remained uninterruptedly in one post for so long, and in such a ticklish post as that.

In 1917, after having been admitted to the bar, Hoover decided to chance his luck in the Department of Justice. Two years later he was appointed special assistant to the Attorney General.

One of his biographers sheds light on the reasons for his rapid advancement:

"While engaged in legal work, he acquired some valuable experience in counterespionage in connection with World War I, which was then in progress."

What this counterespionage work was is no secret. From 1917 to 1919 Hoover was a special agent in the Department of Justice Bureau of Investigation, which specialized in combating progressive trends. When, in 1918, the Bureau was instructed to take measures against the marked spread of radicalism, Hoover's activities attracted the attention of his superiors. He personally directed the raids on the homes and premises of individuals and organizations suspected of radical views.

Hoover was appointed special assistant to a man who contributed one of the most gloomy and bloody pages to the history of the United States—A. Mitchell Palmer, a police tyrant who was fond of calling himself the Fighting Quaker. It was Palmer who engineered the anti-Red drive of 1919–20.

In his day Palmer gained notoriety as the police dictator of America. But the chief and direct organizer of the violence and lawlessness against progressive leaders was young J. Edgar Hoover.

Napoleon referred to the famous spy Schulmeister as a man of destiny. This was Wall Street's opinion of Edgar Hoover. At the age of 26, his career was assured. He was appointed Assistant Director of the Bureau of Investigation, and very soon after was made its Director, it having by then been renamed the Federal Bureau of Investigation, or FBI.

The special agents of the FBI are known as G-men, which is short for "Government men." It is Hoover who was responsible for the appearance of the G-men in the United States. His first measure as Director of the FBI was to purge its staff. Gradually the old and very heterogeneous personnel of the Bureau, both as regards age and detective experience, was replaced by young men of a definite type, the kind usually employed by gaming dens and saloons as bouncers.

The G-men are instructed in the technicalities of man-hunting in special schools maintained by the FBI in Washington and other centers, as well as at the National Police Academy. Some of them are tutored in such arts and sciences as public speaking, psychology, and sociology. These are the men who are specially trained to fight the labor movement.

In addition to his special training as a spy, every G-man is expected to master the various arts of physical assault and the handling of every type of modern personal weapon. The American Gestapo-men are taught how to attack strikers and are initiated into the gentle arts of secret manslaughter, terrorism, and intimidation. Instruction in methods of search, detection, and apprehension holds an important place in the training of a G-man.

The special agent is the central figure in the FBI. Enormous attention is paid to his training, the fundamental purpose of which is to turn him into a man hunter and manslaughtering automaton. His guiding maxim must be the one laid down by Ignatius Loyola for the members of the Jesuit Order: he is expected to be "as obedient as a corpse."

Hoover saw to it that his thugs were given the broadest powers, or, rather, enjoyed unlimited opportunity for the commission of violence. In the thirties Congress enacted legislation considerably enlarging the powers of the FBI and its special agents. They were given permission to effect arrests and to use arms at discretion. Hoover also saw to it that his G-men were well remunerated—the special agents start with a salary of $3,200 per annum, plus operational expenses, and are guaranteed a pension after a definite length of service.

Hoover's outfit is a ramified one. Frederick L. Collins says in his book, The FBI in Peace and War, that the number of special agents on the staff of the FBI and its local branches increased from 851 in 1939 to 4,600 in 1943.

After the war the number of G-men continued rapidly to increase. It has been stated in the American press that in 1946 the FBI had 14,300 special agents.

But in addition to the special agents on its staff, the FBI has a number of agents who do not figure on its rolls. They are known as friends of the FBI, and their recruitment is organized on a wide scale throughout the country. They constitute a reserve from which G-men are drawn.

With Hoover's appearance in the FBI, the system of registration, investigation, and identification of Reds was thoroughly reorganized. He perfected and standardized it.

The bulky files and multiplicity of filing cabinets were replaced by a card-index system and mechanical methods of analysis.

In 1919 and 1920 Hoover card-indexed 500,000 Americans suspected of radicalism and dangerous thoughts. This was the first big measure in this broadly conceived program for putting the fight against progress on scientific lines. Much later the New Republic wrote in this connection:

"In that dark period Hoover compiled a list of half a million persons suspected as dangerous because of the ultra-radicalism of their economic or political beliefs or activities. The equivalent of 1 person out of every 60 families in the United States was on the list. * * * Hoover beat Heinrich Himmler by 14 years."

Hundreds of thousands of names were added every year to Hoover's files, which are known as the national security index. Before the outbreak of World War II Hoover set himself the task of keeping a secret tab on every progressive-minded American without exception. Several million names were entered in the black list. In order to reassure public opinion, Hoover had the rumor spread that the purpose of his card index was to keep a check on Fascist agents in the United States. Actually, his detective activities continued to be directed as heretofore against progressive elements.

Since the war Hoover has developed political spying to monstrous limits. Envy of Himmler's laurels gives Hoover and his masters no rest. We know that the Nazi superspy set himself the aim of not only tabbing every disaffected German, but of keeping a record of every adult inhabitant in general.

Hoover also took great pains to perfect a system of identification which is a component part of the national security index. It was he that initiated the fingerprinting of every American listed in the index. He set up a civil section of the FBI fingerprint files. Before the war the national fingerprint records already contained fingerprints of 11,000,000 Americans.

Hoover exploited the prewar and war situation for the furtherance of his program. A full-blast campaign was started to get Americans to register their fingerprints voluntarily. It was made compulsory for certain categories of citizens—Government servants, members of the Armed Forces, employees of plants working on military contracts, and persons coming under the Alien Registration Act.

On December 1, 1949, Hoover's files contained approximately 113,000,000 fingerprints. The FBI has a register of practically every adult inhabitant of the United States and is drawing up detailed individual records. The national security index and the national fingerprint records are used as weapons against the working class and the democratic movement.

We know that in America government institutions and politicians are no less addicted to self-advertisement than commercial and industrial firms. J. Edgar Hoover makes wide use of publicity. He lavishly supplies the American press with sensational stories about the work of his Bureau. Numerous books glorifying the FBI were published in the United States during the war and since. They are often furnished with a preface by Hoover himself.

The purpose of Hoover's publicity is to delude public opinion regarding the true functions of his police system. When you read the books of Flaherty, Collins, or Riess or Hoover's own articles, it is quite apparent that the aim of their authors is to depict the FBI as America's salvation.

Hoover's agents feed the public with trashy detective literature designed to convince the American that both before and during the war America's counterespionage service was prompt in detecting and effectively checking the activities of Japanese and German spies. But it is well known that the FBI's inactivity allowed German and Japanese spies to operate with impunity in the United States. Hoover endeavors, by distorting facts, to persuade the American that United States national security in 1940 and 1941 was watertight, and that he, the all-seeing Hoover, and his special agents were fully up to their job.

The object of Hoover and his underlings in spreading this legend is to instill the belief that now, too, after the war, the FBI is faithfully and honestly protecting the interests of the American people. The fact of the matter is that in these postwar years Hoover and his Bureau have been engaged in a foul and despicable work on a tremendous scale, the purpose of which is to prepare the rear for a piratical aggressive war. The FBI is actually the central operations staff of the rabid campaign against everything progressive in America. Planting stool pigeons in progressive organizations, frame-ups, blackmail—all these are the common everyday weapons of the FBI.

Hoover extended his activities into foreign countries as well. In the years 1937-39 the FBI set up an espionage and sabotage network in Latin America which thrust its tentacles into every department of the government service, into political parties, and into the economies of the countries concerned. It is with the help of Hoover's agents that coups d'état, provocation, and sedition are engineered in the Latin-American countries.

Since the close of 1945, in connection with the law coordinating Federal intelligence activities abroad, the functions of Hoover's Bureau in foreign countries have been considerably curtailed. In 1947, the FBI disbanded the undercover system which it had created during the war in Latin America to counteract Japanese and German espionage. But Hoover retained the right to maintain an inspection system in each of the Latin American countries. Its function is to assist the local police in combating the labor and democratic movements. Hoover's G-men thus play the role of organizers and instructors in political detection in the Latin American countries under the tutelage of American imperialism.

The FBI is now entrusted with the job of organizing the security service (in plain words, espionage) in United States diplomatic and other missions abroad.

Apparently, the question is now being mooted of turning the FBI into an independent ministry of police. Rabble-raising Congressman RANKIN, while still a member of the Un-American Activities Committee, suggested that the FBI be taken out of the jurisdiction of the Department of Justice and made an independent government body with the right to report directly to Congress.

Measures of this kind aim at centralizing internal security and eliminating the competition between the various departments and agencies operating in this field. Hoover, who is always quick to advertise his bureau, is working hard to have all the threads concentrated in its hands. He is eager to become America's police dictator.

There is another fact worth mentioning. A United Press message from Washington in the middle of May 1949, stated that President Truman had ordered the organization of an Interdepartmental Committee on Internal Security to coordinate the work of the Federal bodies engaged in investigating subversive activity. Preparing as they are for aggressive war, America's ruling circles want to be sure of having a reliable rear, purged, with the aid of the police machine, of progressive elements.

Present-day America is police-ridden and detective-ridden. No other country is so infested with sleuths as the United States; no other people are so subjected to all-pervading prying and spying as the Americans. The monopolies have created a police state in the full meaning of the term.

Hoover's widely ramified system of snooping and informing is creating an atmosphere of terror in the United States. By boosting the almighty power of the FBI and the superlative talents of its agents, Hoover is trying to intimidate the ordinary American. The object of his spying system is to suppress all independent thinking and to make the people a pliable and submissive instrument of the imperialist ventures the American monopolies are plotting in their bid for world domination. Hoover and his machine are diligently working to create an atmosphere of fear and terror in the United States and in this they are being assisted by the monopoly-owned press and radio.

Hoover draws widely on the experience of the Nazi spying and terrorist system. But he fails to draw the chief and paramount lesson from this experience, namely, that the efforts of the Hitler-Himmler gang ended in complete and disastrous failure. Hoover's G-men are powerless to stifle the aspirations of the American masses for peace and progress.

GROWTH OF THE PEACE MOVEMENT

(Review of the Journal In Defense of Peace)

(By Y. Borisov)

The permanent Committee of the World Peace Congress daily receives letters and telegrams from all parts of the world reporting the progress of the day-to-day struggle of the common people against the imperialist preparations for a new war. The scale and character of the struggle is graphically reflected in the monthly review, In Defense of Peace, published by decision of the World Congress in French, English, and Spanish. The six issues that have appeared since August 1949 mirror the progress made by the peace organization and show how the movement has gained in strength and scope. Among the journal's contributors are distinguished public leaders and noted scientists, artists, and writers of diverse countries. In its pages are to be found letters from workers and farmers, from women and young people in all parts of the world.

The journal draws general lessons from the rich experience of the peace struggle in various countries; it supports every new effective type of action and tries to make it as widely known as possible. Written in a militant and assertive spirit, the articles are an inspiration to the partisans of peace, adding vigor to their fight against the warmongers and imbuing them with unshakable confidence in the triumph of their just cause, the safeguarding of the peace and security of nations.

The journal calls for a determined struggle to stop the armaments drive in the United States and the Marshallized countries, to secure the immediate banning of the atomic weapon and the cessation of the imperialist cold war and reprisals against advocates of peace. It gives detailed information on the activities of the peace movement in the Soviet Union and the People's Democracies, where the fight for peace is inseparable from the fight of the working people for the fulfillment of the national-economic plans and for socialism.

"The peoples of the Soviet Union," says the review, "have the happiness to see that their most cherished wish is one of the prime concerns of their government; the U. S. S. R. —and no one will venture to deny this— has always demanded, within the framework of its proposals to reduce armaments and conclude a pact of peace by the great powers, that the atomic bomb be banned and that atomic science be placed at the service of humanity."

The January issue contains a special article on the significance of the international Stalin peace prizes, instituted by the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet of the U. S. S. R. in connection with J. V. Stalin's seventieth birthday.

"What an encouragement this is to all the fighters in the great battle of life against the forces of destruction and death. The institution of the international Stalin prizes is one more striking proof of the peaceable aspirations of the Soviet state, which ever since its inception has fought indefatigably for world-wide peace."

As late as November 20, 1950, there appeared an article written in Moscow and directed in English to North America entitled "Every United States Citizen Understudy at FBI." A commentary by Pablov entitled "Thought Control in the United States" is very significant.

Look, Mr. Speaker and America, what comforting words this book gives to these people to whom I have just referred. Sad indeed, significant indeed.

In addition to these, Mr. Speaker, I next call to testify on behalf of the terrific damage this book can do to the FBI articles appearing in the New York Herald Tribune. I am sure that everybody knows the New York Herald Tribune is not given to going off half-cocked. Under date of November 23, which, Mr. Speaker, as you know, was Thanksgiving Day, the above-mentioned paper wrote an editorial entitled "Smearing the FBI." It is significant indeed of the import of this book's insidious attack.

This editorial is as follows:

SMEARING THE FBI

Had the FBI been made the victim of an ordinary smear artist, the results would have been deplorable enough. The attack made by Max Lowenthal in his newly published book, The Federal Bureau of Investigation, is, however—by reason of its method and circumstances—particularly obnoxious. This lengthy volume, with its outward pretense to authoritativeness and objectivity, could easily be mistaken for a factual guide to the course of the FBI during its 42 years of existence. It is only when the text has been examined that the author's manner and aims become clear. Mr. Lowenthal has strung together an exhausting series of quotations from public records—inconclusive, tendentious and frequently out of context, designed to have the cumulative result of implying that the FBI has been ineffectual, prejudiced, concerned chiefly with notoriety for itself, and careless of the civil liberties of the citizens. The book's publication occurs at a time when the FBI's activities against Communist infiltration require—as, indeed, they merit, an unhesitating public confidence, and the whole venture of made the more disturbing by suggestions of White House encouragement.

What is the truth? The FBI under J. Edgar Hoover has been a vigilant and highly effective agency in the fields of crime over which it has jurisdiction. In the more pervasive and general assignment which the Communist conspiracy cast upon it, the FBI has been as alert as it has been fruitful in results. Throughout there has been a sharp awareness on the part of the Director of the need for a Federal policing agency to work within the rigid lines laid down by the Constitution, and within the frame of values of a free, liberty-loving people. The American Civil Liberties Union last summer wrote to Mr. Hoover congratulating him on the "fine balance" he had maintained in dealing with "the serious and intricate problem of national security in relation to civil liberties." This judgment finds no place in the pages of Mr. Lowenthal's book, but it is one that will be echoed by every impartial observer who has watched national police agencies in other countries ride roughshod over individual rights.

Americans have every reason to be proud of the FBI and thankful for the record of the man who for more than 25 years has shaped and directed its activities. It would be nothing less than a calamity if, at this crucial moment in the Nation's life, the insinuations and distortions of the Lowenthal book were to undermine Mr. Hoover's position or to cast doubt upon his work.

Again, Mr. Speaker, under date of November 22, Bert Andrews, pretty fair and respectable commentator, writing in the same paper, had this to say:

BOOK ATTACKING RECORD OF FBI BY TRUMAN FRIEND STIRS DISPUTE—MAX LOWENTHAL'S VOLUME IS EXPECTED TO RALLY J. EDGAR HOOVER'S FRIENDS IN CONGRESS

(By Bert Andrews)

WASHINGTON, November 21.—A book written by a close friend of President Truman—a book which many believe was done with the hope of destroying J. Edgar Hoover, Director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation—is having many effects that are just about opposite to those designed by the author, Max Lowenthal.

The situation as it shapes up today can be disclosed on the basis of considerable research, concrete and circumstantial evidence, the application of logic and the study of another volume by another friend of President Truman, who might well say by now: "Protect me from book-writing friends!"

The situation resulting from the publication of Mr. Lowenthal's The Federal Bureau of Investigation by William Sloane Associates is this:

1. Mr. Lowenthal's book comes as a last bit of evidence which justifies bringing into the open a matter that many observers in Washington have known about for a long time. That is that President Truman has little use for Mr. Hoover and probably would have had his Attorney General oust him long since if he wasn't fully aware that a majority of the Congress would rise up in wrathful protest.

2. The volume has brought Mr. Lowenthal under prompt counterattack from congressional friends of the FBI, and this, of course, hasn't displeased the FBI. The congressional friends have brought out that Mr. Lowenthal knew Alger Hiss, convicted of perjury on charges growing out of his relationship with Whittaker Chambers, one-time courier for the Russians. The congressional friends have brought out, too, that Mr. Lowenthal associated with Lee Pressman and a long list of others who either turned out to be Communists or denied it on the ground that an admission might incriminate them.

3. The Lowenthal onslaught on Mr. Hoover is bound to bring Mr. Hoover's friends on Capitol Hill to his defense when the lame-duck session convenes on November 27 and when the Eighty-second Congress takes over on January 3 after the lame ducks limp out.

ON LOWENTHAL'S SIDE

On Mr. Lowenthal's side there are these points:

1. The critics of the FBI are hailing it a masterful presentation of the views they have always held.

2. It will be widely read and, if read alone, might well convince a reader that the FBI was a Gestapo or was trying to be one.

3. One reason it will be widely read is that more free copies have been distributed in Washington than are usually sent out. Three copies were sent to the Washington Bureau of the New York Herald Tribune, for example, where usually publishers send only one.

President Truman and his aids in the White House may—and probably will—deny that he has any intention of chopping the Hoover head off. (And nothing in this article, incidentally, is meant to suggest that the President has read or approves of the Lowenthal book.)

DANIELS BOOK CITED

However, the research supplies such point-by-point logic as the following, and supporting quotations will follow:

A. There has been talk for years that President Truman's dislike for Mr. Hoover dates back to the time the FBI took part in the investigation that led to the downfall of the late Thomas J. Pendergast, the President's original political sponsor.

B. There has been talk also that the dislike has increased over the years.

C. Jonathan Daniels, former White House adviser, in "The Man of Independence," emphasized that President Truman and Mr. Lowenthal have long been friends.

D. Mr. Daniels gave reporters the impression that President Truman had read his book in manuscript and approved of all of it.

E. This would mean that President Truman approved of the passages extolling Mr. Lowenthal and telling of their friendship.

F. Mr. Lowenthal in his book has a couple of examples of what seems to be inside dope on President Truman's feeling toward Mr. Hoover, as, for example, his statement that the President twice rejected suggestions—once in 1950 and once some years earlier—that Mr. Hoover be made the over-all head of a superintelligence agency including the FBI and the Central Intelligence Agency.

1949 PRESS CONFERENCE

G. At one press conference in June 1949, President Truman was asked if Mr. Hoover had his confidence. He replied that Mr. Hoover had done a good job. A reporter said: "You said last week that all these investigations just amounted to a lot of headline hunting. Does that include Hoover?" The President told the reporter he could assay that situation as well as the President could. He was asked if he conferred with Mr. Hoover from time to time. He replied that Mr. Hoover makes reports to him from time to time and that he conferred with him through the Attorney General.

H. Nevertheless, it is known that the President hasn't called Mr. Hoover in in a long time for a conference. This is in decided contrast to the actions of his predecessor, the late Franklin D. Roosevelt, who consulted frequently with Mr. Hoover.

So, it seems:

That President Truman doesn't like Mr. Hoover and would like to see him out.

That Mr. Lowenthal certainly doesn't like Mr. Hoover and would like ditto.

The circumstantial evidence can be found in Daniels' book telling how Mr. Hoover arrived in Kansas City on April 4, 1939, how Mr. Pendergast was indicted on April 7 on insurance fraud charges, and how President Truman reacted with the words:

"Pendergast has been my friend when I needed it, I am not one to desert a ship when it starts to go down."

There is another passage—showing what a good hater President Truman can be—which observes that President Truman refused to reappoint the district attorney, Maurice Milligan, after he became President in 1945.

But the most interesting passages, in the light of the Lowenthal book, are the Daniels' discussions of the Truman-Lowenthal friendship.

Some of them follow:

Page 284 tells how a self-effacing but ubiquitous man named Max Lowenthal worked in 1936 for a Senate subcommitee investigating railroad finances and how Senator Truman became chairman of the subcommittee just as hearings about the Missouri Pacific came up.

Mr. Daniels writes:

"Max Lowenthal and other members of the staff of the subcommittee were a little disturbed about this unexpected coincidence of a Missouri railroad and a Missouri Senator. They pointed to Truman that some of the things which would come out in the investigation might embarrass him at home.

"'No,' Truman told them. He would not be embarrassed.

"'Then,' said Lowenthal, 'some of the lawyers told Truman that some of the exhibits were pretty hot stuff and it would be possible to just put them into the record without bringing them out in the hearing.'

"'No,' Truman told them. 'Treat this just as you would any other hearing.'

"The messages and telephone calls, telegrams and letters began pouring in from Missouri asking him, first: to stop the hearings on the Missouri Pacific and, second: to go easy on it.

"LIKE ANY OTHER HEARING

"'Treat this like any other hearing,' Truman told them again. Lowenthal, who had had the image of the Pendergast office boy in his mind when Truman had assumed the chairmanship, was impressed. He began to watch this Senator from Missouri. Unnoticed then, his methods in investigation were the same which made his Truman committee later so effective in the war effort. He combined the politician's ease with the public servant's determination.

"'There were not half a dozen Senators then who would have withstood the pressure he took,' Lowenthal said.

"Casually one day, but with the secret feeling of a man offering a well-earned accolade, Lowenthal suggested to Truman that he would like to take him to see his friend Justice Louis D. Brandeis. Brandeis was over 80 then and had become, with Oliver Wendell Holmes, one of the two great judges of the American liberal tradition. Brandeis' California Street apartment had become a Washington institution when Lowenthal invited Truman to go with him there. Truman regarded him very seriously.

"'I'm not used to meeting people like that,' he said.

"It was true. Most of his growth and studying had been free from great intellectual companionship, as his voracious reading as a small-town boy had been largely self-directed.

"After his first meeting with Brandeis, he went often to California Street, almost every other week, to the open houses which the Justice held for his selected friends."

FRIENDSHIP CONTINUES

The Truman-Lowenthal friendship continued over the years.

Mr. Daniels writes of 1944:

"His new stature as chairman of the Truman committee suggested him to some as a solution to them. His friend Lowenthal had been one of those strongly urging him to run for the Vice Presidency. And on one of the last Sundays before the convention in Chicago he called Truman's secretary, Bill Boyle, about it.

"Lowenthal went up to the Senate Office Building to see Truman. They talked in the Sunday quietness of that huge building.

"Truman said he had talked it over with the Mrs. and had decided not to be a candidate. Also, he had a daughter and the White House was no place for children.

"That statement suggests that there was a time before the convention when Truman was thinking and thinking hard about the nomination. The statement Lowenthal remembers about the child and the White House emphasizes the current political calculation that the Democratic Vice Presidential nominee that year would probably become President of the United States.

"'He drove me home,' Lowenthal said. 'We stopped at his apartment on Irving Street to get his bags, then he dropped me at my house in Chevy Chase.'

"Somewhere along the way Truman told Lowenthal that he was too poor to think about running. And he used an earthy American expression about the lack of both a pot and a window. Lowenthal was still arguing, reluctant to agree, when he got out of the car at his own house."

The Daniels' description of the Truman-Lowenthal friendship is cited at length because of a passage in Mr. Lowenthal's book, in which he says President Truman twice rejected the suggestions that Mr. Hoover be made the top, over-all head of espionage and counterespionage.

This was not general knowledge at the times Mr. Lowenthal lists.

This reporter has learned that the suggestions came from the Military Establishment and that President Truman would have none of them. Mr. Lowenthal, after noting that Congress voted Mr. Hoover a salary raise and praised him, goes on to say:

"There are some indications, however, that the views * * * are not universally held by Americans interested in effective counterespionage. President Truman, when he set up the CIA (Central Intelligence Agency) as a new espionage and counterespionage organization, disregarded suggestions that Mr. Hoover himself should become the head of any such super-intelligence organization. In 1950, when the President made a new appointment to the post, he again disregarded the suggestions that Mr. Hoover be promoted to that position. Indeed, when the President created the CIA, he went further and withdrew from the FBI the authority it had possessed for 7 years in counterespionage work throughout Central and South America."

LAW ENFORCEMENT REPORT

Mr. Lowenthal makes much of the fact that a Senate committee of which Mr. Truman was a member issued a report on law enforcement which while specifically stating that its charges were directed against the FBI, acknowledged that it was aimed at "that police unit."

Mr. Lowenthal a number of times uses quotes of President Truman to criticize quotes of Mr. Hoover, as for example:

"In May 1950, Mr. Hoover described the Communists as the most dangerous and one of the most powerful forces in the United States.

"But some informed authorities believe otherwise today, as in the past. In 1950, President Truman gave his opinion, 'we know that the greatest threat to us does not come from the Communists in this country. Communism has little appeal for people who are healthy, well educated, prosperous, and free. The fact of the matter is—because of the measures we are taking—the internal security of the United States is not seriously threatened by the Communists in this country.'"

To sum up the Lowenthal-FBI feud:

Mr. Lowenthal has started quite a free-for-all.

The FBI, while officially making no comment, is fighting back through its friends on Capitol Hill. One example of this came when Congressmen circulated a House Committee on Un-American Activities report of testimony taken from Mr. Lowenthal on September 15. The committee showed much interest in Mr. Lowenthal's associations with many men who have been labeled as Communists or fellow travelers by witnesses before the committee.

LOWENTHAL TESTIMONY

Mr. Lowenthal showed much interest in pointing out that he had done extensive work for the Government and in stating:

"In the course of 38 years I have met tens of thousands of people, and worked with them, too. I have dealt with many organizations. I think if you take it in proportion to the sum total of what I have been engaged in, all these questions, even if the answer was 'yes,' to them, wouldn't amount to a hill of beans in proportion."

One Washington opinion of the Lowenthal book was voiced by Rex Collier, in the Evening Star. It noted that the publisher, William Sloane Associates, Inc., of New York, said the book with its "unbased and profoundly conservative approach" would lead "to some startling conclusions." Mr. Collier said: "One conclusion of this reviewer is that this is the most nonobjective object or book on the FBI ever published."

John Keats, in the Washington Daily News, noted that no one can ever do an inside job on the working of the FBI, because the FBI won't yield the necessary information.

Mr. Keats added:

"No evil can come from the public's critical examination of the country's Federal police, if it is done thoughtfully and objectively. This book starts the discussion. This country has been singularly free from activities of secret police. The time is probably now to find out whether it needs more or less of this commodity, and how to check its activities in terms of our budget as well as our political philosophy."

All in all, it's quite a "rhubarb."

In the Washington Star, under date of November 20, Rex Collier had an article entitled "The FBI: How 'Objective' Can You Get?" It reads as follows:

THE FBI—HOW OBJECTIVE CAN YOU GET?

(By Rex Collier)

An interesting book is off the press today. The author is Max Lowenthal—his subject, the FBI. It is, I say, an interesting book. But it is not a good one.

The title of the book is printed plainly on the cover: "The Federal Bureau of Investigation." However, the contents of this so-called objective volume are apt to have the average reader quite confused. He will find it hard to believe that Mr. Lowenthal really was writing about the FBI, that has its headquarters at Ninth Street and Pennsylvania Avenue—the agency that has gained so much fame for its war on gangsters, spies, and saboteurs.

This is a different, a strange FBI that Lawyer Lowenthal, a long-time critic of the Bureau, describes: "This unbiased and profoundly conservative approach" to the FBI, says the publisher, William Sloane Associates, Inc., of New York, "will lead to some startling conclusions." One conclusion of this reviewer is that this is the most nonobjective objective book on the FBI ever published.

In his search for material Mr. Lowenthal has dug into FBI history as far back as 1917. He has come up with considerable dirt, for in those early days the Bureau's record was far from clean. The first 27 chapters of the book are based on things that happened in the old Bureau of Investigation before J. Edgar Hoover became its Director. Mr. Lowenthal is still indignant over the radical raids staged by A. Mitchell Palmer over 30 years ago. The Bureau of Investigation, as it then was known, was headed by William J. Flynn. The young Mr. Hoover, just out of George Washington University Law School, was a special assistant to the Attorney General. By a process of "guilt by association," the book gives the impression that Mr. Hoover almost single-handedly planned, organized, and directed the raids. This, of course, is nonsense.

As a matter of fact, these much-criticized raids were thoroughly investigated by the Senate Judiciary Committee without damage to Mr. Hoover's reputation. Mr. Hoover himself repeatedly has criticized the witch-hunt methods used in the forays. And perhaps the best evidence of Mr. Hoover's innocence of blame was his selection afterward by Attorney General Harlan Stone (later Chief Justice of the Supreme Court) to subject the Bureau to a sweeping reorganization.

The late Mr. Stone was one of the first persons publicly to denounce the Palmer raids. He would hardly have chosen Mr. Hoover to clean house if he had believed him in any degree responsible for the Bureau's tactics.

As one goes on through suceeding chapters, it becomes evident that Mr. Lowenthal has been busy with his shears for many years. In no other way could he conceivably have collected all the newspaper and magazine clippings critical of Mr. Hoover and the FBI included in this veritable scrapbook. Apparently nothing of derogatory import that has been printed about the FBI since World War I has escaped his eye. In his own objective way, he has included virtually nothing that could be considered laudatory.

Thus, he devotes considerable space to criticism by the late Senator Norris of an FBI roundup in Detroit of persons indicted for recruiting men for armed services abroad, viz, the Spanish Loyalist cause. Not to be found in the book, however, is a letter to Senator Norris from Robert H. Jackson, now a Supreme Court Justice and then the Attorney General, stating that a careful investigation had shown that the agents in Detroit acted within their instructions and exercised their discretion in good faith. Mr. Jackson added: "I am, of course, anxious, as you are, that in law enforcement we do no violence to our traditional civil liberties. I am convinced that if those liberties are generally endangered in this country, it is not by the FBI."

Mr. Lowenthal indicates his disapproval of FBI activities in white slavery, automobile theft, bank robbery, and kidnaping cases. He does not explain how the agency can avoid handling these cases in view of the acts of Congress requiring the Bureau to do so. He cites the FBI's publication, Uniform Crime Reports, as providing proof that crime is on the increase in this country, despite the FBI. He neglects to point out that the crimes reported in this periodic bulletin are "offenses reported by police," hence purely local crimes over which the FBI has no jurisdiction. He might have added (but did not) that white slavery, kidnaping, and bank robbery were brought under control only after Congress projected the Bureau into those fields. And spies, too, have developed a healthy respect for the Bureau.

Under the heading "Investigation of beliefs," Mr. Lowenthal rehashes all that has been said in opposition to the President's loyalty program, quoting liberally from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, newspapers, and other sources. But no mention is made of the fact that the fears of "witch-hunt hysteria" expressed by most of the program's early opponents have failed to materialize. He takes cracks at the Bureau's wire tappers, its informers within the Communist Party, its secret files, and nearly everything else connected with the Bureau's policies and activities.

There is a lot more of this sort of "unbiased and profoundly conservative approach" to an appraisal of the FBI, but the foregoing gives a general idea of what purchasers of the book ($4.50) may expect. Certainly this is not the kind of constructive criticism which Attorney General Jackson had in mind when he wrote Senator Norris: "In an agency as large as the FBI errors of judgment and of overzeal will from time to time occur, and criticism is helpful both to the Director and to the Attorney General in avoiding repetition. But I am confident that the more the operations of the Bureau are explored, the more it will appear that its vigorous and effective work for law enforcement is conducted with a fundamental purpose to observe the rights of defendants."

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would like further to insert for the edification of the Congress and American people articles by Walter Winchell, a fairly well-known commentator, and Fulton Lewis, another well-known commentator, on this book by Lowenthal. Is it not strange, Mr. Speaker, that we should find Walter Winchell and Fulton Lewis in the same bed on this subject. I say it is not strange, Mr. Speaker, because both of these men have fought for the rights of individuals and have defended the institutions of this Nation.

I will say this for these gentlemen: I have differed on many occasions with Mr. Winchell and on many occasions with Mr. Fulton Lewis, but I do not believe it can be said of them that they are afraid to propound and defend their positions. They have been consistent in defending the institutions of which the FBI has been in favor, and they have upheld the hand of J. Edgar Hoover. It is not funny or unusual that they should come to the aid of that great organization and the great leader who towers so high in this Nation, Mr. J. Edgar Hoover.

The articles I have referred to are as follows:

MEN, MOTIVES AND MORAL

Two publications of national interest appeared this week. The first was a so-called objective study of the FBI by Max Lowenthal, which to this writer is nothing more nor less than a vicious one-sided attack on J. Edgar Hoover. The other publication is the official record of the testimony before the House Un-American Activities Committee, of Lee Pressman, Nathan Witt, Charles Kramer, John J. Abt, and the same Max Lowenthal. Pressman admitted he had been a Communist and named Abt, Kramer, and Witt as members of his commy cell. Witt, Abt, and Kramer declined to testify on the constitutional grounds that it would tend to incriminate and degrade them. Lowenthal, whose testimony appears last, admitted he knew all four men, plus Alger Hiss, but denied he was a Communist.

Lowenthal's book relies heavily on selected statements about the FBI, many in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. The cover jacket states the book is objective. However, it fails to note that Lowenthal himself has been vigorously attacked in these words in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of September 1, 1950: "His skill and technique are unparalleled. He does his work, lusts and thrives on obscurity. He knows he could never accomplish what he has in the open. Americans do not like his ilk, and once his shroud of mystery is penetrated, he knows his usefulness is at an end. Doors that once opened to him will be closed because no good American would care to be contaminated by his known presence. I have named this man in passing before. Today I bring him into the open and introduce MAX LOWENTHAL. Like the Communist Party whose cause he has served so well, he operates on two levels. One is seemingly respectable; the other completely underground."

Congressman DONDERO further stated: "Lowenthal's record is one of attack on any American institution which stands 4-square for the American way of life. He has attacked railroads, banks, and the thoroughly fine American institution of B'nai B'rith as 'bourgeois organization.' Even the cause of liberalism has felt his vengeance." * * * If the FBI is also considered an American institution, then Lowenthal has spared no names, however hallowed, in his attack. Cleverly, he does not make the charges himself. Following is a sample of his devious technique on the memory of President Theodore Roosevelt. Lowenthal says: "Newspaper articles appear, disclosing the fact that dossiers had been assembled for President Theodore Roosevelt containing information about the personal affairs of various Congressmen active in the campaign to investigate the Federal detectives. News accounts conveyed the President's intention to publicize this collection, if the congressional investigation of Federal secret police were carried to the lengths of provoking him."

To this writer, that is an objectionable—and not an objective charge—that President Theodore Roosevelt was a criminal blackmailer. It comes, it must be objectively noted, from Max Lowenthal, whose own loyalty to his country has been challenged on the floor of Congress. It should also be objectively noted that even Theodore Roosevelt's bitterest opponents called him a great American.

For the FBI to be an enduring and growing conspiracy since 1908 the Attorneys General of the United States must have been part of it. At any rate, Lowenthal lists them at the beginning of his book. By any objective standard, they are an honor roll of the American bar. Republicans and Democrafts, Protestants and Catholic, rich and poor, conservative and liberal, they are a cross section of some of the most distinguished names in American history.

Five of them, for example, went to the United States Supreme Court. Most Americans will be revolted by an inference that conservative Republican George Wickersham, conservative southern Democrat James McReynolds, New England's great Harlan Stone, and Michigan's Frank Murphy as Attorneys General, either didn't know what was going on or were part of the same expanding conspiracy. The records show, for instance, that Supreme Court Justice Frank Murphy, practically the American apostle of civil rights—fought as Attorney General for a double budget for the FBI. To this writer, Max Lowenthal's book virtually and idiotically charges that all these great Americans remained quiescent or actively helped the growth of a great conspiracy against the American people.

The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD may throw some light on the reasons Lowenthal wrote the book. At least Congressman DONDERO's opinion deserves mention. From the RECORD of September 1, 1950: "In the thirties, Lowenthal concentrated upon weakening our internal security by aiding an all-out Communist attack against the Federal Bureau of Investigation in 1940. Lowenthal sent out anonymous memorandums, smearing the FBI, which fact can be attested to by many Washington newsmen, hoping to head off the FBI in its fight to protect our shores against the menace of communism and fascism at a time when the Nazis and Communists were allies. Lowenthal has worked diligently and deviously, but always relentlessly, to destroy the effectiveness of the FBI in its efforts to protect our country from the emissaries of godless communism. He has always realized the FBI is the one agency he could not penetrate or intimidate. He has long known it was one agency which blocked his efforts to completely undermine our internal security."

So, along with 7 Presidents and 15 Attorneys General of the United States, J. Edgar Hoover must consider himself as accused by inference of either allowing, permitting or furthering the growth of the FBI at the expense of the liberties of the American people. Objective history appears to be strongly on the side of the statesmen, and not Max Lowenthal.

It is probable that all Congressmen do not share Congressman DONDERO's drastic opinion that no good American would care to be contaminated by Lowenthal's known presence. But a certain typical, very dry American skepticism of Lowenthal appears from the record of his testimony before the House Un-American Activities Committee. The testimony: Mr. Lowenthal: "The number of people that I didn't know were members of the Communist Party is something that sometimes makes my hair stand on end." Mr. RUSSELL: "Ours, too."

WASHINGTON REPORT

(By Fulton Lewis, Jr.)

President Truman has a close personal friend and adviser who is credited with great influence in and around the White House. In fact, Jonathan Daniels, in his recent book, The Man of Independence, described this Presidential intimate as having influenced Mr. Truman's liberal thinking more than any other American.

The man is Max Lowenthal, and his intimacy with the President is reason enough to take a look at him. But there is another reason, just as good, which we can work on today.

Lowenthal has written a book about the Federal Bureau of Investigation. It reveals a life-long concentration of distaste for the FBI that has, according to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of September 1, 1950, cropped out a time or two prior to this recent writing effort.

In the 1930's, the record reveals, Lowenthal directed another attack against the Bureau; in 1940, the same record discloses, he sent out to Washington newsmen an anonymous memorandum "smearing" the FBI.

Representative GEORGE A. DONDERO (Republican), of Michigan, regards Lowenthal as a man of mystery, and as a man dedicated to "clever, diabolical scheming to undermine our national security." He so characterized him on the floor of the House.

A graduate of Harvard University, Lowenthal is a close friend of Supreme Court Justice Felix Frankfurther, the character witness for Alger Hiss. He also has been trotting around with a number of others with interesting records, the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD reveals.

Lowenthal was a member of the national committee of the Communist-dominated International Jurisdictional Association, along with Lee Pressman, who recently admitted Communist Party membership.

In the same organization, he also was associated with such persons as the late Joseph Brodsky, former attorney for the Communist Party; Shad Polier, a friend of Alger Hiss; Nathan Witt, named by Pressman as another former Communist; Abraham Isserman, who was cited for contempt during the New York trial of the 11 Communist leaders; and similarly assorted characters.

He was a member of the National Lawyers Guild, which recently was labeled Communist controlled by the House Un-American Activities Committee. Even more recently he was a backstage manager of the fight to prevent passage of the McCarran-Mundt-Nixon law.

He also was listed as one of the endorsers of the conference of the American Committee for the Protection of Foreign Born, cited by the Attorney General as subversive.

Among Lowenthal's other friends is Carol Weiss King, consistent spokesman for and defender of Reds headed for jail. She once was a law clerk in Lowenthal's office. He also on various occasions has worked in close conjunction with Thomas I. Emerson, Yale law school professor and president of the National Lawyers Guild; Abe Fortas, a friend of Owen Lattimore; and Charles Kramer and David Wahl, both of whom have been accused of having been Communists.

Lowenthal has had some other interesting characters working around him at one time or another. One of the most noted is George Wheeler, the turn-coat citizen who not long ago denounced the United States and fled to Communist Germany, where he issued communiques castigating America.

Wheeler was one of Lowenthal's assistants in Germany when the latter was assigned there as an advisor to Gen. Lucius Clay.

Mr. Truman's pet advisor has another friend, Al Bernstein, an official of the United Public Workers of America. DONDERO, in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, says that Bernstein is known to be a secret member of the Communist Party. Bernstein worked for Lowenthal at one time.

Few people have ever seen Lowenthal's picture, although in fairness it should be pointed out that he doesn't skulk down alleys when traveling between New York and Washington.

He has just never been in the limelight for one reason or another, and is seldom seen at Washington cocktail parties.

He was born in Minneapolis, Minn., and after graduation from Harvard law school had a series of jobs in law offices in New York before migrating to Washington in 1917.

Just what point there is in Lowenthal's dislike for the FBI is a bit moot at the moment. His book is not a blood-and-thunder recital of FBI cases, but a dull documentation instead.

It is heavy going, the type that usually winds up in libraries on the reference book shelves.

Maybe that is just where he wants it to go; then it will be a source of information for the young minds of America.

WASHINGTON REPORT

THE SIMILARITIES BETWEEN TWO BOOKS

(By Fulton Lewis, Jr.)

WASHINGTON, November 22.—There is a remarkable similarity between two recent books attacking the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

The most recent, written by the President's adviser on liberal thinking, Max Lowenthal, has numerous passages containing source material that has appeared in an earlier book by Albert E. Kahn.

In the past day or so we have taken a good look at Lowenthal, so let's examine Kahn's background.

Offhand, Kahn has been cited as being a member of seven organizations, characterized as subversive by Government agencies, more organizations labeled as Communist fronts than are worth counting, and has opposed the jailing of the 11 Communist Party leaders convicted of attempting to overthrow the Government by force and violence.

He is on record as demanding the release of Leon Josephson, a notorious Soviet lover and jailbird, who got there for sassing the House Committee on Un-American Activities.

Kahn's latest errand on behalf of the Communist Party was with the World Peace Conference. He was elected to the permanent committee of this Kremlin adjunct in Paris, where he told the assembled Soviet lovers that American clergymen were solidly behind them.

Lowenthal's book was published by the William Sloane Associates, Inc. On the cover the author is described as a conservative in the most profound sense, which runs counter to another Presidential intimate, Jonathan Daniels. Daniels describes Lowenthal as the man more responsible for Mr. Truman's liberal thinking than any other American.

Nobody would ever suspect Kahn of being a conservative. So let's compare him to the publisher's version of one.

On page 8 and elsewhere in Kahn's book, High Treason—the Plot Against the People, he quotes from the report of the Inter-Church World Government which was critical of the Department of Justice roundup of Communists in 1920.

Lowenthal, in his first 250 pages, does likewise.

On pages 11 and 16, Kahn blames FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover for the roundup of Reds, and goes into critical detail regarding the Department of Justice General Intelligence Division. Lowenthal devotes chapters on end to this ancient situation.

Kahn, on page 18 of his book, quotes FBI Director Hoover regarding the roundup of the Reds. On page 173, Lowenthal uses almost an identical quote.

On page 20, Kahn goes into detail in accusing agents of acting as "inquisitors" in the trials of the Communists. Lowenthal, on page 217, blasts the FBI on the same count and almost in the same language.

Both Kahn and Lowenthal discuss a jail in Hartford, Conn., and a Federal building in Detroit, Mich. In Kahn's book the references are on pages 20, 21, and 22. In Lowenthal's, on pages 201 and 208.

Deer Island, where one Communist committed suicide and one was adjudged insane, is mentioned in both books in exact detail. Lowenthal gets around to it on page 207, Kahn on page 23.

William Sloane Associates, Inc., make a point of the fact that Lowenthal quotes FBI's defenders in his book, "including, of course, J. Edgar Hoover." That sounds fine and dandy. But Lowenthal has yet to talk to Hoover, visit the FBI, or request research data from the Bureau. I know. I asked the FBI if they had ever seen anybody resembling Lowenthal around the place. A Bureau spokesman said "No."

WASHINGTON REPORT

WASHINGTON, November 21.—Max Lowenthal, one of President Truman's ace instructors in liberal thinking, considers the Federal Bureau of Investigation a waste of taxpayers' money and a detriment to the welfare of the United States of America.

In his new book on the FBI, Lowenthal expresses these views in chapter after chapter, and in one instance goes back 30 years to gripe about J. Edgar Hoover, Director of the FBI.

In 1920 the Justice Department ordered a round-up of Communist and other illegal aliens in the United States for the purpose of instituting deportation proceedings. This event, known as the Palmer raids, is described in detail in a book by Louis F. Post. Lowenthal quotes at length from the Post opus and in the process virtually blames Hoover for the whole thing.

One thing of interest to note here is that Hoover was then in his twenties and was doing administrative work in the Justice Department. The FBI was only a gleam in his eye at that time. In addition, Hoover had nothing to do with ordering the Palmer raids, and Post, the one historian who did know the story, never even listed Hoover's name in the index of his book. But Lowenthal cites the arrests as another example of how, in his opinion, the FBI and Hoover are a threat to our liberties.

The Lowenthal book is published by William Sloane Associates, Inc., of New York. On the flyleaf of the cover Lowenthal is described as a conservative who does not editorialize or draw conclusions carelessly.

Lowenthal's career is sprinkled with associates who are anything but conservative. As for conclusions, he blames the FBI for running a police state, and then immediately bawls out Hoover for not catching enough atom spies.

On the record, Hoover's agents followed a spy trail that was 4 years old in order to haul into court the Americans who worked with Klaus Fuchs. Fuchs would never have happened if the British Secret Service had been on the ball. As it was, the FBI and Canadian agents handed the first tip on Fuchs to the British.

Scoffing at FBI detection methods, Lowenthal indicates that the only reason G-men ever broke a pre-Pearl Harbor spy ring was that a German agent had the bad luck to be involved in a traffic accident in New York.

The truth of the matter is that German agents in the Ludwig ring had been under FBI surveillance for months. The first tip came to the FBI not as a result of the traffic accident, but via a British censor who intercepted a letter that did not read right. He turned it over to the FBI and it was put through the wringer. Invisible ink writing, calling for data on shipments to England, set the FBI counterespionage experts in operation.

All of this is a matter of record in the court where the Germans were convicted, but Lowenthal missed it in his research.

Lowenthal quotes former Senator Carl Hatch, Democrat, of New Mexico, to bolster his argument that the FBI, as it now operates, is a threat to our welfare. He quotes Hatch as saying:

"Granting everything I say about the ability with which Mr. Hoover has conducted the FBI, every one of us knows that it is a very great power he now exercises. Senators would further broaden that arbitrary power—giving control to the police just as the people of Czechoslovakia did in their poor country."

What he could have added, but did not, is another Hatch quote:

"I want, again, as I did the other day, to commend Mr. Hoover himself for the attitude he has taken on this and other matters, and for his very efficient administration of the Federal Bureau of Investigation."

Lowenthal accuses the FBI of lying to a Federal judge about wire tapping in the Coplon case. This should be news to the judge. The facts on record are that on January 20, 1950, the Federal judge presiding in the case stated publicly that the FBI had independent proof of the spying activities of Judith Coplon and her Soviet playmate which had not been obtained by wire taps.

The fact is, also, that it is legal to tap wires when the Attorney General orders it done. The only restriction is that the evidence obtained must not be used in court.

In this, as a further testimonial to the integrity of Edgar Hoover, Mr. Speaker, I insert lastly an excerpt from an article by Morris L. Ernst entitled "Why I No Longer Fear the FBI":

WHY I NO LONGER FEAR THE FBI

(By Morris L. Ernst)

I still remember my start of surprise when I read in the paper one morning in 1939 that J. Edgar Hoover, Director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, had asked the United States Attorney General not to endorse a law that would legalize a free use of wire tapping. Why was Mr. Hoover opposing a law which would make his own work much easier? His own words, published soon afterward, gave me the answer: "I do not wish to be the head of an organization of potential blackmailers."

I had been hearing criticisms that the FBI was made up of witch-hunters hounding loyal citizens out of their jobs on the flimsiest sort of rumor; that they tapped telephone wires indiscriminately, learning everybody's private business.

Ever since I read that newspaper item I have been studying the FBI. I would like to record here what I have learned.

As a liberal with a long record of aggressive fighting for the preservation of personal liberties, I am inclined to view all law-enforcement officers with a wary eye. And not without reason: too many times they break the law in the performance of their duties.

I grew up in New York where there was often a wanton disregard for the rights and dignity of human beings. Large numbers of newcomers to American freedom let the cops bulldoze them. In their native lands they had been used to police brutalities, and in their new home they did not know that the laws protected them.

Such disregard of individual rights, expanded on a national scale, seemed to me a positive danger, for national police have almost invariably abused their power. It was therefore utterly confounding to me to discover that our Federal police agency was doing its work with a fervid insistence on respecting the rights and privileges of individuals.

When a skeptical person like myself reads that of all the trials in which the FBI was involved last year 97 percent ended in convictions, he is likely to have cynical reservations, and when he learns that 94 percent of the convictions were based on pleas of guilty, he is bound to ask: "How were these confessions obtained?"

Nazi and Communist courts have taught us that a plea of guilty may prove nothing more than that a man's will can be broken. One rarely hears such charges against the FBI. In our courts of appeal—where accusations are heard of unfair treatment and violations of constitutional rights — the charge is almost never raised against the FBI.

However, I did not rely on this indication alone, nor even on my study of case reports. I wrote articles in which I asked readers to send me any evidence they might have that the FBI had violated a person's constitutional rights. My scoreboard shows a remarkable absence of such accusations. On the contrary, all the evidence indicates that the FBI as a matter of unvarying policy has played fair with criminals and suspects.

This record is of profound importance because events in recent years have brought the FBI into quasi-political problems. Here the danger to personal liberties could easily become acute. The necessity for inquiring into political activities and associations is a new thing in our country. We began this Nation with a great gamble in our hearts—the conviction that, if all opposing viewpoints were allowed free expression, truth in the end would win out.

The progress of our country has so far justified our forefathers' faith in the potency of truth. But in the last 20 years a new enemy—and a complex problem—has arisen to confuse us. New political movements, by underhanded methods, seek to bypass the honest competition of ideas. We face an invisible underground where Fascists and Communists work furtively and zealously against our freedom and our ideas of decency.

Something had to be done about that, and the FBI had to do it. What was its task? To bring the facts up from underground so that all the people can know what is being plotted.

It is natural that loyalty investigations should give us qualms. We shudder to authorize wire tapping and other forms of spying. But they seem necessary if we are to preserve our freedom. They have been forced upon us by the underground.

I am unwilling to ignore the danger of the Communist movement in the United States just because the Reds seem few in number. I saw my friend Jan Masaryk, Czechoslovakia's democratic Foreign Minister, in Prague not long before he came to his end. I know intimately the story of Quisling. I know how helpless democratic forces can be, if they do not protect their people against the secret discipline, the abominably careful scheming of totalitarian minorities.

The Communists could never win an election in the United States. They do not expect to do so. The Communist program, like the Ku Klux Klan, can grow only by stealth in dark cellars. J. Edgar Hoover was right when he stood firmly against a plan to outlaw the Communist Party when the first public outcry was made against the Communists. Why drive more of them underground? All that such an act could ever outlaw would be a name. The next day the same revolutionists would turn up under a new title.

Until Congress is wise enough to pass laws which force open operation of all mass movements, we shall have to protect ourselves against secretly organized attack. We can bring all subversive outfits into the open by requiring all mass movements to report to the Government the essential facts about themselves—the names of all their officials, the money they take in, and from whom it comes, and how it is spent.

I suggest that the McCarran bill recently passed by Congress will not work because the Communists will either put their organizations underground or abandon them to start other organizations for the same purposes under other names.

The requirement to disclose essential facts is no invasion of privacy. The President's Committee on Civil Rights unanimously recommended that such laws be passed; represented on the committee are members of the A. F. of L., the CIO, and various minority groups. No decent organization hesitates to identify itself; why should any other kind of organization be protected?

Even without such laws, the FBI has handled delicate problems well. On Pearl Harbor Day the Bureau was able to advise the Attorney General of the basis for authorizing the arrest of some 16,000 persons. A few of the 16,000 became my clients. I defended them before hearing boards and was able to help free some of them. In every case there were fair hearings, with every consideration being shown to the defense.

And although I was the lawyer for certain acquitted suspects, I must admit that Mr. Hoover had a justification in picking up my clients; there was cause for suspicion, and no injustice was done.

One Jewish refugee was picked up because she had entertained one of Hitler's most potent underground spies. But it was easy for me to produce conclusive evidence that my client did not know her guest was a Nazi. She was set free—but the authorities had been right to bring her in for questioning.

Largely as a result of the trials of Judith Coplon and Valentin Gubitchev, there has been publicity and much argument about listening in, but both sides seem to overlook the real purpose of FBI wire tapping and its actual extent.

One of the greatest liberals said in 1941: "I do not believe it [wire tapping] should be used to prevent domestic crimes, with possibly one exception—kidnaping and extortion in the Federal sense. There is, however, one field in which, given the conditions in the world today, wire tapping is very much in the public interest. This Nation is arming for national defense. It is the duty of our people to take every step to protect themselves. I have no compunction in saying that wire tapping should be used against those persons, not citizens of the United States, and those few citizens who are traitors to their country, who today are engaged in espionage or sabotage against the United States."

This statement was made by President Franklin D. Roosevelt. In fact he established the policy which has since been adhered to by the Attorneys General. Note, however, that FBI agents never undertake wire tapping on their own authority; permission must first be obtained from the Attorney General. Furthermore, wire-tapping evidence cannot be used in Federal courts. Its only value to the FBI is in opening up leads for inquiry.

The loyalty-investigation program has created a misconception about the FBI's function. Every American should understand that the FBI does not try Government employees. It merely serves various Government bodies as a reporting agency. When a reporting agency has the power to edit, it can make anyone appear a devil or a hero. But the FBI does not edit. It gathers the facts about a Federal employee and turns over its findings to the head of the department. And that is all it does, or can do, except that it frequently is able to save a suspect in his job when rumor is doing its best to get him fired. J Edgar Hoover cannot fire a single person. His reports do not even contain recommendations. The FBI turns in all the evidence it finds—including unverified tips, rumors, gossip—everything. It adds comments and evaluation of their accuracy, and there its responsibility ends. It is up to the heads of administrative agencies to act.

It would be folly to ignore rumors, or even anonymous messages; an unsigned note was instrumental in sending the notorious General Myers [1] to prison. Ditto for thousands of less spectacular examples. To abandon that policy would be to assign to Hoover's assistants the duty, and the power, to screen the reports. I should be very much disturbed if police agents were permitted to withhold evidence on their judgment of its value. Far better the present system: the complete reports go to the responsible official; everything is in the dossier, with a careful comment on each item, whether it is a fact, probability, or rumor.

In my study of the FBI it soon became clear that lies were being spread against it. For example, it has been said and printed repeatedly that agents in loyalty investigations demand to know whether a suspect reads certain magazines of leftist tinge. This charge is a lie. Whenever he hears of the statement being made, Hoover calls for the facts—and invariably everybody backs down. They heard it somewhere, they can't remember where. Directives to FBI agents specifically forbid such questions, unless the reading matter is published by the Communist Party.

Of course, some agents may blunder or offend. When that happens, write J. Edgar Hoover. He will see your complaint and it will be gone into thoroughly. I have personally checked about 100 such complaints and I have yet to find one piece of evidence of improper questioning by agents.

The real difficulty in loyalty investigations is that there is almost no way of proving that a person is a Communist. The suspect, if a party member, would deny it. Communist doctrine holds that it is right and proper to lie and cheat. This fact makes new techniques necessary. Yet, in spite of alarms and outcries, nothing oppressive has been done.

It surprised me to learn that of 2,873,180 employees whose records were examined by the FBI all but 12,825 were promptly cleared. This minority being further investigated, only 230 employees were finally dismissed. In 163 cases the employees appealed and were given their jobs back. One significant factor must be noted—1,474 resigned before their cases came up. Actually, the FBI is now being criticized for not having found as many subversives as it should have.

A real "smear" campaign has been carried on against Hoover's work. Those who feared the Bureau—as I once did—will be glad to know the facts. The FBI is unique in the history of national police. It has a magnificent record of respect for individual freedom. It invites documented complaints against its agents. It has zealously tried to prevent itself from violating the democratic process.

Among liberals I am by no means alone in this opinion. A while ago Roger Baldwin, formerly director of the American Civil Liberties Union, wrote to J. Edgar Hoover:

"It seems to me that your Bureau has accomplished an exceedingly difficult task with rare judicial sense."

For me, that sums up the record.

It is also interesting to note what that distinguished Washington columnist, George Dixon, has to say about his research in an effort to find out who is paying for the distribution of this masterpiece of libel. I enclose George Dixon's excerpt:

[From the Washington (D. C.) Times-Herald of November 29, 1950]

WASHINGTON SCENE

(By George Dixon)

A strange little creature, with an even stranger history of associations and affiliations, has written a 559-page book attacking the FBI.

This peculiar little fellow, Max Lowenthal, is described on the jacket as "a lawyer with a long and distinguished record in both private practice and Government service."

He is distinguished all right in that he has the distinction of having been summoned before the House Committee on Un-American Activities with such distinctive you-know-whats as Nathan Witt, Lee Pressman, Charles Kramer, John J. Abt, and company.

But I couldn't find anybody around the Federal Bureau of Investigation, of which he writes so exhaustively, who would admit knowing him.

Director J. Edgar Hoover said he could recall only having met him casually a couple of times. Associate Director Clyde Tolson said he couldn't remember having met Lowenthal at all.

Now this book, The Federal Bureau of Investigation, is a tiresome and tedious thing. It seems to drag on endlessly with so-called documentation; debates in Senate and House; transcripts of long and soporific hearings; reports of congressional committees, and long-winded letters.

After a while you get the impression that every letter this little character ever received from anybody with a name has been worked into the volume.

The book is vicious in its attack on the FBI, but I don't think it was ever intended for general public consumption. It is too dreary for that. The average reader couldn't keep awake long enough to get anything out of it.

The fact that official Washington has been flooded with free copies of this volume would also seem to call for some explanation. With few exceptions, every Member of the House and Senate—435 Representatives, 96 Senators—has received a free copy as well as nearly all the top administration bureaucrats and most of the Federal judges.

The book retails for $4.50, which would seem to make this free list a pretty expensive operation. I phoned the publishers, William Sloane Associates, in New York, and was connected with a Miss Eleanor Nichols, who said she was in charge of publicity.

But when I asked who was putting up the money to flood Washington with free copies she said, "Hold the line," and passed me up to a fellow who said he was Norman Hood, vice president in charge of promotion.

Mr. Hood admitted that 1,100 free copies had been sent out, but insisted this wasn't out of line.

"The books only cost us $1 each to print (so the profit on a book is $3.50 yet?—I'm in the wrong racket: Dixon) which means a cost to us of only $1,100," said vice president in charge of promotion Hood. "That is really nothing in these days of high promotion costs."

I asked Hood who was paying for this free distribution.

"We are," he insisted.

"Let's get this definite now," I said. "No outside interest organization or group is putting up any money?"

"No. We are defraying it all."

Unless William Sloane Associates are in the publishing business for their health I can't see how they can justify such costly promotion for a 559-page book that will not appeal to the general reader.

Well, there's one consolation for J. Edgar Hoover. He doesn't have to worry about the book making any wide impression upon the American public because few people who have to work for a living will be able to find the time to read it.

Lastly, Mr. Speaker, I include what another distinguished American has to say about this man and for the RECORD I insert an article by George Sokolsky as it appeared in the Times-Herald, November 30, 1950. He gives a little light on one Max Lowenthal. I want the American people to have a little squint at this, Mr. Speaker, as it may help them arrive at a proper conclusion on what lies behind the sudden arrival of Lowenthal's piercing penmanship.

THESE DAYS

(By George Sokolsky)

Most of my colleagues have written about Max Lowenthal's book on J. Edgar Hoover and the FBI. Apparently they have read the book, but I must plead that I had other business on hand.

Anybody can be negative about such a job as J. Edgar Hoover does. Did Hoover catch the fellows who stole the ballot boxes in the Kansas City, Mo., election? No. He did not.

Was Harry Truman in Kansas City when the safe containing the ballot boxes was blown up? Yes, he was there. So.

That kind of argument can lead to nothing. A police department is to be judged by its general record, by the honesty and efficiency of its employees, and by its own adherence to the law.

The most provable criticism of the FBI is that while it collected evidence to convict spies, traitors, Communists, and their fellow-travelers, its accomplishments in this field have, on the whole, been unsatisfactory because on orders from the State Department and the Department of Justice, spies were not to be arrested.

In the evidence of Larry Kerley before the McCarran committee, the evidence shows that the FBI had Arthur Alexandrovich Adams, one of the worst spies Soviet Russia ever sent to this country, but the State Department safeguarded him from arrest.

In 1917, Lowenthal went on a secret foreign mission. This is what he says on the subject (in appearance before the House Committee on Un-American Activities—Ed.):

"It was a confidential mission that I don't care to go into. It was only for a short time, and I never discuss that kind of government work with anybody."

You would imagine that in 1917 this secret mission was so terrific that it could only have been to Lenin or Trotzky or somebody like that, although I was in Petrograd in those days, and do not recall Lowenthal, whose mission must have been too important even for history.

Max Lowenthal has held innumerable jobs with various branches of the Government from 1912 almost up to date. Some of them were of this character, to use his own words:

"In 1942 or 1943 there was some kind of problem, it is not quite clear in my mind; there was a war commission, I don't remember its name; it was headed by Mr. McNutt.

"Mr. WHEELER. Paul McNutt?

"Mr. LOWENTHAL. Yes, Paul McNutt. I was sworn to assist them for a very temporary period on something or other, trying to straighten out some difficulties among some men who were not part of the Government.

"Mr. Chairman, I wouldn't remember these things too definitely, and anything any records would show that would correct me, I would accept those corrections.

"Toward the end of 1943 or early 1944 I left that work. During all that period and since that period I have been consulted informally by various people in the Government, but so far as I can recollect at this moment, I don't think ever in any official capacity. There might be some, and I would be very glad to have those noted for the record."

It is a little difficult to believe that Mr. Lowenthal cannot remember what he did for Paul McNutt. It was not so long ago nor could it have been very important. Mr. Lowenthal's lapse of memory at this point is, to say the least, fascinating.

Mr. Lowenthal was asked who had recommended him for employment by the War Department. This is his reply:

"I couldn't say for certain. I was asked by a group of organizations whether I would permit my name to be submitted for recommendation by General Clay, and I agreed."

What are those organizations? He must know, but he does not say. No names of organizations. No names of individuals. It all hangs in the vacuum of secrecy and mystery.

Some of the pages of this hearing would interest a psychologist, who might write a doctor of philosophy thesis about them. Here is a man who started his career as secretary to Judge Julian Mack, a jurist of distinction who would not take on a dope.

He goes through years of Government service and is associated with Senator Burton K. Wheeler on the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate.

Wheeler is an extraordinarily shrewd man. He would not hire a forgetful Jane. Yet, time after time, Mr. Lowenthal cannot remember dates, names, facts which no ordinary man could forget.

It is difficult to help wondering how a man, who forgets so much so easily, could remember so much about the FBI.

Mr. Speaker, I believe, my colleagues, when you read these articles which I have inserted you will find that it is not profitable for Americans to slander J. Edgar Hoover. The legions of his friends will not be asleep when their vigilance is needed. The legions of friends of the FBI will not be silent when his organization is attacked from the rear. The FBI, Mr. Speaker, is too busy with its mission to take cognizance of the forces who are trying to undermine its work. I do not know Lowenthal from Adam's house cat. I do not propose to make any effort to meet him, but for the information of the House, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD an address by the distinguished and great American, the Honorable GEORGE DONDERO, delivered on this very floor under date of September 1, 1950, entitled "A Man of Mystery." Mr. DONDERO sheds a little light on who Max Lowenthal is. It will be very handy and my article will be very compact for those who want to read about one Max Lowenthal and to refresh your memory of one J. Edgar Hoover.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

[From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of September 1, 1950]

A MAN OF MYSTERY

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, I want to discuss a man of mystery this afternoon and for the first time take off the mask behind which he has been hiding for years and even avoiding service from the Committee on Un-American Activities.

The sharp pen and penetrating insight of a Washington editorial writer has caused Washington officialdom to pause and wonder when he asked in an editorial, "Who is this man?" The writer then goes on to describe him:

"He places these agents of destruction in our Government agencies. He can put his tribe in when our loyal citizens cannot get jobs. He can move his pawns up the scale to better paying and more sensitive jobs. Why? Not so they can get more money, but because they can spy more effectively.

"A man who is not unknown at the White House. Otherwise, he would not have the power or the knowledge to do the job he is doing.

"And now is the time to go after him. It will be a tremendous job. It will mean stepping on the toes of some very, very high Government officials, and when he is caught the revelation will be a bigger shock to this Nation than the exposé of Benedict Arnold.

"It must be done. The Nation can take it. But it cannot win the war of survival with Russia if this man is allowed to continue his clever, diabolical scheme to undermine our national security."

Never has this man been more aptly described. Over the years I have acquired item after item of information. I still do not know the full story because he is a man of mystery. He works through others. He has reached pinnacles of great power. A recommendation from him was tantamount to success. There are few men in official Washington today who have dared to stand up against him.

I do not recall having seen his picture in print in recent years, but the Washington press corps knows his name well, so do the Communists and so do those who have taken a stand against Communists.

His skill and technique are unparalleled. He does his work, lusts and thrives on obscurity. He knows that he could never accomplish what he has in the open. Americans do not like his ilk and once his shroud of mystery is penetrated he knows his usefulness is at an end. Doors that once opened to him will be closed because no good American would care to be contaminated by his known presence.

I have named this man in passing before. Today I bring him into the open and introduce Max Lowenthal.

Like the Communist Party, whose cause he has served so well, he operates on two levels. One is seemingly respectable; the other completely underground.

He is native born. His name does not appear in Who's Who. To secure even a sketch of his biography has been a task.

Born in Minneapolis in 1888, he attended the University of Minnesota, graduating with a bachelor of arts degree in 1909. Then like many other parlor pinks, fellow travelers, Communists, and convicted perjurers, he attended Harvard Law School, graduating in 1912. In those early days he came under the influence of another man who through the years has manipulated the Charlie McCarthys in Government office. There is a striking kinship between the master, Justice Felix Frankfurter, and the pupil, Max Lowenthal. And as is so often the case, the pupil rises to outdo the master.

Following his Harvard days, he served as a secretary to Judge Julian M. Mack in New York, and then infiltrated the highly respectable law firm of Cadwalader, Wickersham & Taft. After a few years he founded his own firm of Lowenthal, Szold & Brandwen.

Later he secured an appointment as assistant secretary of the President's Mediation Board in 1917, in 1918 he was in the War Department, in 1920 he was an assistant secretary to the President's Industrial Conference. Then he secured the appointment as executive secretary for the Wickersham Commission on Law Enforcement, but when he found he could not run it he resigned in a huff. Later he became research director of the Banking and Currency Commission. In 1935 he was appointed to the staff of the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce, also becoming affiliated with the Board of Economic Warfare.

By pulling strings he acquired the title of adviser on disposal of Jewish property to Gen. Lucius Clay, head of our military government in Germany. Within a matter of weeks he was known as the general counsel to General Clay and had as an assistant George Shaw Wheeler, the American traitor, Communist, and renegade who shocked all America when he denounced the land of his birth and asked Communist-controlled Czechoslovakia for asylum. I exposed him several years ago on the floor of this House.

Within a matter of weeks a change occurred in Germany. The usually accurate Human Events of September 25, 1946, reported, "It may be mere coincidence, but since Mr. Lowenthal's appointment General Clay has permitted leaders of the Soviet-sponsored SED (Socialist Workers Party) to address mass meetings in the American zone of occupation." This was the opening which the Russians were awaiting because it gave them the opportunity to sponsor a Communist Party under our protection. A few weeks later the commentator, Walter Winchell, warned on his Sunday night program that as a result of Lowenthal's activities a rift had occurred between the American and British zones.

Lowenthal's influence began to mount in the early thirties. As his influence grew, so did its effect. Men he had selected and nursed became more powerful.

Lowenthal acquired some semblance of respectability, but what of the other side? The evidence of his unswerving loyalty to Soviet Russia is clear and unequivocal. In the early twenties, the Russian-American Industrial Corp. was formed in New York City to aid and assist in developing the resources of Russia. Large sums of American capital were raised to finance Russian industry. The head of this Communist subsidiary was the late Sidney Hillman, who later became disillusioned and turned on communism, but his one-time general counsel, Max Lowenthal, still follows the party line. There is an interesting sidelight. The California authorities raided the office of the Russian-American Industrial Corp. in September of 1922 and seized their books, records, and a list of members of Friends of Soviet Russia in Los Angeles. Several persons were indicted for violating the California Securities Act; however, the indictments were later dismissed. Behind the scenes powerful forces went to work. Prof. Felix Frankfurter, of Harvard University, started a chain of letters to his former students who were members of the bar, asking, as a personal favor to him, for them to look after the interests of the defendants.

Lowenthal also lent his prestige to other groups. He was reported to be one of the endorsers of the Conference of the American Committee for the Protection of Foreign Born in 1940, an organization listed as subversive by the Attorney General. He was a member of the left-wing National Lawyers Guild. He was a member of the National Committee of the International Juridical Association with Lee Pressman, who once defied a congressional committee. He admitted his Communist affiliation this week. Lowenthal also was associated in this organization, cited as subversive by the House Committee on Un-American Activities, with the late Joseph R. Brodsky, the attorney of the Communist Party; Shad Polier, friend of Alger Hiss; Nathan Witt, an accused Communist; Edward Lamb, a left-wing newspaper and radio-station operator; Abraham J. Isserman, who was cited for contempt by Judge Medina in the New York Communist trial, along with others of a dubious background. The activities of the International Juridical Association incidentally at one time were carried on in the offices of Carol King, the well-known lawyer for Communists. Some other well-known members of the International Juridical Association are Lowenthal's friend, Prof. Thomas I. Emerson, Yale Law School and president of the National Lawyers Guild; Ruth Weyand, discharged attorney from the National Labor Relations Board; and Abe Fortas, of Lattimore fame.

Carol Weiss King, who has probably represented more Communists than any other lawyer in America, once was a law clerk in Lowenthal's office, where she was well grounded and trained for her later years.

Lowenthal has always found time for his extracurricular pursuits of aiding and abetting Communists. For example, he has been given the credit for the offensive launched against the House Un-American Activities Committee in the Hollywood hearings. Lowenthal was conveniently in Washington in October 1947, and naturally was extremely cautious in working behind the scenes with David Wahl, Charles Kramer, Bartley Crum, and others. At the time, word leaked out of the Council of the Hollywood Unfriendly Witnesses that Lowenthal had urged an attack upon the individual members of the committee in order that the Congressmen could be removed. In fact, Lowenthal told the Hollywood group and its lawyers to charge that the Congressmen on the committee should be removed. Everyone will remember the Hollywood Committee of One Thousand who flew to Washington to defend the Communists—that was also Lowenthal's idea.

In the thirties Lowenthal concentrated upon weakening our internal security by aiding an all-out Communist attack against the Federal Bureau of Investigation in 1940.

Lowenthal sent out anonymous memorandums smearing the FBI, which fact can be attested to by many Washington newsmen, hoping to head off the FBI in its fight to protect our shores against the menace of communism and fascism at a time when the Nazis and Communists were allies. Lowenthal has worked diligently and deviously, but always relentlessly, to destroy the effectiveness of the FBI in its efforts to protect our country from the emissaries of godless communism. He has always realized the FBI is the one agency he could not penetrate or intimidate. He has long known it was the one agency which blocked his efforts to completely undermine our internal security.

Lowenthal's record is one of attack on any American institution which stands foursquare for the American way of life. He has attacked railroads, banks, and that thoroughly fine American institution of B'nai B'rith as a "bourgeois organization." Even the cause of liberalism has felt his vengeance. For example, in 1939, when that great liberal and denouncer of communism, William O. Douglas, was elevated to the Supreme Court, Lowenthal got busy trying to organize opposition because he feared Douglas would some day become the heir apparent to F. D. R., and should this happen communism would have a stalwart foe.

His friends boast of Lowenthal's authoring Presidential veto messages and even more recently of his master-minding the ill-advised move to thwart the enactment of anti-subversive legislation at a time when members of both political parties in Congress and throughout the country have united as one to secure a law which would make America safer in its hour of trial and crisis. The Federal Communications Commission, under James Lawrence Fly, was not untouched by the tentacles of Lowenthal's influence.

The influence for evil of this man of mystery can best be gaged by viewing a few of his intimates:

Al Bernstein, director of negotiations, United Public Workers of America, a union so left-wing and Communist-directed that it was expelled from the CIO several months ago: At one time Bernstein worked for Lowenthal and has been a contact of his for years. Bernstein is known to have been a secret member of the Communist Party work, with his chief, Abe Flaxer, in Washington.

Bjorne Yngvare Halling, Sausalito, Calif., secretary-treasurer of the old California CIO council, which was expelled from the CIO because of its Red tinge, has a long record of Communist activities. According to the Communist paper, the People's World, for October 19, 1949, Halling protested the trial of the Communist leaders in New York. Halling's secretary was Sadie Sokolove, member of the executive committee of the Communist Party and wife of Martin Chancey, one-time head of the Communist Party in Washington. But does this have any connection with Max Lowenthal? Halling sought political support to have Max Lowenthal placed in charge of certain phases of the investigation of civil-service employees because his friend, Lee Pressman, told him to do it.

Allan Rosenberg, another of Max Lowenthal's fair-haired boys, had a phenomenal rise in the Government service. In concert with John Abt, long an undercover Communist and agent, he was one of those who figured prominently in the 1947 New York grand-jury investigation of spy activities in Washington, where, because of technicalities in the espionage laws, prosecution could not be had. Rosenberg was charged with furnishing information to a confessed Soviet agent. Lowenthal and Wahl saw to it that Rosenberg's advance in the Foreign Economic Administration was rapid.

David R. Wahl was a protégé of Max Lowenthal in the Foreign Economic Administration. The files of the Civil Service Commission and the Committee on Un-American Activities reveal him as one whose loyalty has been questioned several times and also one with powerful forces who came to his aid. In fact, in 1944 the Civil Service Commission ruled Wahl unfit for Government service. Then his friends in the Foreign Economic Administration went to work and urged his reconsideration as eligible. Wahl has long been a legman for the Communist Party in Washington.

The Lowenthal influence in one case alone more than documents his activities and reveals his true colors. One of Lowenthal's assistants in the Board of Economic Warfare was George Shaw Wheeler. Wheeler had previously served in Government agencies such as the National Labor Board, the Department of Labor, and the State Department. He also was investigated several times because of his reported affiliations with the Washington Committee for Democratic Action, the American League for Peace and Democracy, the Washington Bookshop, and the American Peace Mobilization, all of which have been ruled by the Attorney General to be subversive organizations.

The files of the Civil Service Commission contain testimony that he was a member of the Communist Party, and if made public, they would reveal that the Civil Service Commission found Wheeler was ineligible for Government service because of his Communist activities. Then, a pressure campaign developed that had all the earmarks of a Lowenthal manipulation. In no time at all, the Civil Service Commission reversed its position and Wheeler was cleared. When Lowenthal was appointed to go to Germany on General Clay's staff, he took as his first assistant none other than George Shaw Wheeler. Soon after Wheeler's arrival in Germany, he established contacts with the German Communist Party. The Army finally dropped him on November 1, 1947. Wheeler, by his acts and words, has proven the correctness of the early Civil Service action insisting Wheeler was a Communist. I hope our Government has taken steps to record Wheeler's disavowal of his citizenship and forever will bar him from our shores.

But Lowenthal is back, living in New York but spending much of his time in Washington; his influence still a menace to the best interests of America. I have no doubt we shall hear further either from him or his stooges and when we do, it will be because of some sinister act, designed either to protect Communists, infiltrate further into our Government, or to undermine our internal security.

Every person still in the Government who has had a Lowenthal endorsement, should be identified and their loyalty determined but not by the standards that freed George Shaw Wheeler.

Mr. RIVERS. Mr. Speaker, in closing, let me say this to you, my colleagues, freedom of speech and press is a great and priceless possession. It is unfortunate when this freedom leads men to doing the things which Lowenthal has either consciously or unconsciously done in his book. Only in this Nation can such successfully be done. I neither have the time, money nor inclination, much less the ability, to write in the subtle manner of Lowenthal. I do not have the power of distribution which he possesses, but, Mr. Speaker, I want the archives of the Congress of the United States to know what I and the rest of my colleagues who resent this book have had to say in defense of J. Edgar Hoover's organization. I want the only free press in the world, the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, with its tremendous circulation, to tell the nation of this book and I want the nation itself to come to the defense of Edgar Hoover and the institution which he has, more than anyone else, protected against the termites who have infested our citadels. We want to stamp out forever in this Nation the vermin that shall undermine the Senate and school and citadel and shrine—the worm of fraud and all the crawling progeny of these—the vermin that shall honeycomb the halls and towers of state in unsuspecting hours.

Mr. Speaker, saving America is everybody's job. Giving aid and comfort to our enemies at home and abroad should be anybody's shame.

That is all I have to say about Lowenthal, Mr. Speaker. I ask permission to insert various articles as a part of my statement here this morning.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

CIVIL LIBERTIES CHAMPION POINTS OUT FBI RECORD OF RESPECT FOR FREEDOM—VICIOUS BOOK CALLED RED AID

(By Frederick Woltman)

WASHINGTON, November 20.—Congressmen, Federal judges, and others here have been receiving advance copies of a 559-page book aimed at picturing the FBI under J. Edgar Hoover as incompetent, a menace to civil liberties and a virtual Gestapo.

The volume, published today by William Sloane Associates of New York City, is entitled "The Federal Bureau of Investigation."

ASSAILED BY ERNST

Its author, Max Lowenthal, is a New York attorney who has held numerous Federal posts in the past and has been waging a one-man battle against the FBI for more than a decade.

In New York City, meanwhile, the book was excoriated today as vicious and thoroughly unfair by one of the Nation's foremost authorities on civil liberties. He is Morris L. Ernst, counsel to the American Civil Liberties Union.

"It will give great aid and comfort to the Communist Party," Mr. Ernst said.

According to Sloane Associates, Mr. Lowenthal has been collecting material for the book for 15 years and he documents it with care.

A spokesman for the FBI said today the author never had consulted the Bureau, either for basic information or for its answer to the many attacks quoted to discredit the FBI.

A brief section on the Amerasia case of the stolen Government documents gives the impression that FBI mishandling spoiled the prosecution. It neglects to mention the Tydings Senate subcommittee finding that the FBI handled the investigation with an efficiency and thoroughness in keeping with the best traditions of that agency."

Another section blames the FBI for letting the convicted German Communist, Gerhart Eisler, slip through its hands and escape on the steamship Batory to Soviet Germany. Actually, Eisler was free on bail at the time and the FBI had no responsibility for watching him.

QUOTED ATTACKS

When the Batory returned, says the book, FBI agents accorded its crew and passengers what one newspaper described as totalitarian-state methods of blustering intimidation and police persecution. Actually, naturalization agents, not FBI agents, conducted the shipboard questioning.

A large part of the book consists of quotations from an endless variety of sources—Senate committee testimony, speeches, newspaper clippings, etc.—attacking the FBI. The author also quotes at length from defenders of the FBI and Mr. Hoover himself.

"What makes the book so biased and one-sided," says Mr. Ernst, "is that Lowenthal picks the quotes that bolster his side and makes no appraisal of whether they are scurrilous or factual."

PALMER RAIDS

"It would be a great misfortune, in my opinion, if libraries bought this book as an authority on the FBI."

Nearly two-thirds of the book goes back 30 years or more. Much of it deals with the Palmer raids and excesses of 1919–20, which the author tries to hang on the present FBI director.

Mr. Hoover has long since denied responsibility for the raids and said he disapproved of them at the time.

In a chapter, Investigation of Beliefs, Mr. Lowenthal sets out to discredit the FBI's long-term program of dealing with Communist subversives and the Red underground. He tosses it off as "tracking down persons and organizations whose views it (the FBI) fears."

The problem of the Communist menace is passed by. Indeed, neither Communist nor Communist Party is even listed in the index.

Last July 26 Mr. Hoover declared: "The FBI is interested in receiving facts; we are not interested in what a person thinks but in what he does which undermines our internal security. * * * Hysteria, witch hunts, and vigilantes weaken internal security."

The American Civil Liberties Union wrote the FBI chief expressing thanks "for the fine balance which you are showing in statements dealing with the serious and intricate problem of national security in relation to civil liberties."

That appraisal appears nowhere in the Lowenthal book.

SMEAR CAMPAIGN

Mr. Ernst, in an article, Why I No Longer Fear the FBI, which will be published in the December issue of the Reader's Digest, will say:

"A real smear campaign has been carried on against Hoover's work. * * * The FBI is unique in the history of national police. It has a magnificent record of respect for individual freedom. It invites documented complaints against its agents. It has zealously tried to prevent itself from violating the democratic process."

LOWENTHAL BOOK BLASTING FBI REFLECTS A PEEVE LIKE TRUMAN'S

The relationship between Max Lowenthal's attack on the FBI and Philip Murray's keynote speech at the CIO convention denouncing McCarthyism is purely coincidental. Lowenthal's book and the CIO convention speech have one thing in common. Both reflect a partisan defense of the present Administration and both approaches are based on superficial liberalism that bode no good for the republic.

Mr. Murray's harangue, defending Dean Acheson, was a red herring which was meant to take some of the sting out of the black-eye that the labor groups got in the recent election. It was an effort to divert attention from CIO political failure. It was at the same time a pretty definite indication that the CIO intends to go on making the same mistakes in the future.

It was not McCarthyism that swept the Republican candidates into office in November. It was a public protest against present administration policies, particularly in regard to communism here and abroad and a resentment against the crude way in which the labor groups tried to ram their own platforms down the throats of the electorate.

The Lowenthal book is the first post-election shot fired to lay low one of the pet peeves of Mr. Truman. It is common knowledge that Lowenthal and the President are buddies. It is likewise known that the author of the book has been questioned by a congressional committee on his association with Communist personalities.

Edgar Hoover gets in Mr. Truman's hair more than any Government official in Washington. The Director of the FBI is sincerely convinced that the Communist movement is a real threat to our American security. Harry Truman does not believe that.

The Communists have carried on a persistent campaign of diatribe and vilification against Hoover and the FBI. This organization is the one agency in the country that has stymied the Stalinists at every turn. Without the evidence of the FBI counter-agents in the Commie Party, the conviction of the 11 Red leaders could never have been attained. The stooges of the Kremlin want to discredit Hoover, destroy the FBI, and be relieved of any effective check on their own actions more than anything else.

For political reasons President Truman would like to depose Mr. Hoover, but to date he has not been able to do so. The storm of protest in Congress and among the public would be overwhelming.

Truman has no sympathy for the Communists. We are convinced of that. He is and has been, however, a very mistaken man in his judgment of the menace. The President is as much concerned for the security of the Nation, most likely more concerned, than any ordinary citizen. But he is also a stubborn man and would like to reduce his dislike of Edgar Hoover to action and remove him. We do not know whether or not Mr. Truman previewed the anti-FBI book, as it is reported he did the volume written by Jonathan Daniels. It can be easily assumed that he is not displeased with Lowenthal's effort to smear Hoover and the FBI.

These two incidents, a speech by Philip Murray and the publication of a book reflecting the administration's opposition to a Government agency are separate and isolated events. Both, however, reveal a certain mental attitude toward the Communist issue which has been characteristic of the present administration and its most avid supporters. It is evident that they look upon the late election returns as merely the result of an off-year protest. We believe they are wrong. Public sentiment has shifted and crystallized on this subject of communism and political death awaits the politician who has not yet recognized the turn in the tide.

EVERY UNITED STATES CITIZEN UNDER STUDY BY FBI

(Moscow, in English to North America, November 20, 1950)

(Commentary by Pavlov: "Thought Control in the United States")

One of the distinguishing features of a Fascist state is the liquidation of civil liberties and the establishment of police control over thought. It was that way in Fascist Italy under Mussolini, and things were the same in Nazi Germany under Hitler. Today these abominable characteristics of a police state are appearing openly in the United States.

Control over the thoughts of the United States people is the primary duty of Hoover and his G-men. Making use of the dregs of * * * declassed elements, the FBI has flooded the United States with thousands of paid informers, spies, and provocateurs who persecute honest citizens. On the pages of paper you will often come across Hoover's boastful statement that the FBI has such a huge dossier of material that every American is the subject of study. There are fingerprints for every single one of the cases in the FBI's files.

How many persons are included in these files may be judged from the fact that on Hoover's own admission the number of fingerprints is over 113,000,000. It is interesting to note that 93,000,000 of the fingerprints are those of people who have never committed any crime. The object of the work of the FBI is to create an atmosphere of fear and suspicion in the United States. The widespread practice of tapping telephone wires gives the FBI additional material which is used to compromise people who, for some reason or another, are undesirable to Hoover.

Harold Ickes, using the words of the late Judge Oliver Holmes, called this practice of the FBI a "dirty business." The well-known progressive writer, Howard Fast, said in his recent letter to the editor of the Daily Compass that it has become the customary thing today for the honest and innocent United States people to be thrown into prison.

HOOLIGANS SPREAD SPY MANIA

You listeners probably know of cases where people were accused of disloyalty and were dismissed from their jobs on the insistence of the FBI. Not one of them was able to clear himself and to restore his good name. These people did not even know who was accusing them and what their so-called crime was.

Hoover's Fascist hooligans are spreading a spy mania. They are trying to intimidate the United States people and to close their mouths. By means of police spying and provocation they seek to break the will of the United States people to fight for peace and their rights and are trying to turn the people into docile tools of the imperialists whose tasks it is to unleash a new world war. Fascism and war cannot be separated.

Alongside the colossal expenditures for preparing a new war and for the arms drive, the ruling circles of the United States are appropriating huge sums for the fascistization of the state apparatus. More than $100,000,000 of the taxpayers' money is used every year to maintain the secret service. The Morgans, Rockefellers, and du Ponts need fascism in order to force the United States people to serve without a murmur as cannon fodder for their criminal adventurous policy.

Throughout the United States there is a growing movement of protest against Fascist despotism. The United States people have no desire to be docile tools in the hands of the Fascist warmongers.

CAPITOL STUFF

(By John O'Donnell)

WASHINGTON, D. C., November 23.—An accepted article of political faith among all elected officials in this Capital is that one certain way to invite election damnation is to say anything against motherhood, the United States Marines, or J. Edgar Hoover.

Truman, before the election, let fly with a pettish crack at the marines and promptly made his penitential pilgrimage to Canossa by way of visiting a Marine Corps convention to confess the error of his way and ask forgiveness.

Now we have an outright critical survey of J. Edgar Hoover and his FBI. The attack was written by an individual authoritatively reported to be the person who persuaded one-time Senator Harry Truman, of Missouri, to seek the vice-presidential candidacy in 1944. The volume was originally scheduled for publication last September but was held up until after the November 7 elections.

PROVIDES DEADLY AMMUNITION

More importantly, it is the best-documented indictment on the existence of a Federal police in the Republic of the United States (going all the way from Theodore Roosevelt to the present) that has ever been compiled. Advance copies were placed on the desks of every Member of Congress, all members of the Federal judiciary, all Washington reporters and all important administration officials, within the last fortnight.

This hasn't happened before. It suggests that distribution of deadly ammunition at the moment is part of Truman political logistics, designed to blast J. Edgar Hoover and his FBI from their entrenched post of popular esteem.

The book we're talking about is the Federal Bureau of Investigation, by Max Lowenthal. (New York: William Sloane Associates, Inc.; 559 pp.; $4.50.)

A CAREFUL, SKILLED INDICTMENT

We'll go along with the author in his preface and his publishers on their dust-jacket blurb that every statement is correctly documented and that he's done a swell job of research.

We'll grant that Lowenthal does not color his material, editorialize, or draw conclusions. We'll admit as truth that the author is a conservative in the most profound sense.

But when they say that this heavy tome is unbiased and purely objective, we'll say it's about as unbiased and objective as a carefully drawn indictment handed down by a smart grand jury guided by a skilled prosecutor.

This book will hurt Hoover and the FBI. It will give Hoover's every foe in Congress easy access, thanks to the expert and authentic references for every statement, to an anti-FBI ammunition dump.

But it's unfair. Lowenthal has certainly made the evils of the Department of Justice investigation force live after them. And he's interred the FBI good with the bones of gangsters he doesn't mention.

RACKETS OF TWENTIES FORGOTTEN

It is all right, as a matter of erudite source dredging, to recall the bonehead (and worse) activities of the old Department of Justice Bureau of Investigation in the days of Woodrow Wilson's jittery Attorney General A. Mitchell Palmer or Warren Harding's thieving and cynical Harry Daugherty. Those were the days when the two William J.'s—Flynn under Palmer and Burns under Daugherty—headed up the Bureau. But why blame, by inference, Hoover of today for the sins of his predecessors?

Where Lowenthal is unfair is that he doesn't bear down on the fact that J. Edgar Hoover only got into action during the kidnaping and gang-killing racket of the late twenties. Until Hopalong Cassidy galloped onto the national scene, it was the G-man, and top G-man Hoover in particular, who captured and held the imagination of Americans coming of age—and incidentally their parents.

NO. 1 FEAT: PREVENTION OF SABOTAGE

After all, there was such a thing as the kidnaping of the Lindbergh baby and the capture and conviction of a Hauptmann. Down in the Department of Justice museum today more visitors want to look at the bullet-creased straw hat that John Dillinger wore the night the G-men got him in Chicago than at any other relic in the Capital of the United States with the exception of the Declaration of Independence. And there are still in the memory such names as Pretty Boy Floyd, Karpis, Lepke, and the rest of the killers of the bloody era.

WE'RE SAFE SO LONG AS IT'S HOOVER

And space might be found to note—so long as 600 pages of type are used—that there was no sabotage here in the United States during World War II—and this was Hoover's No. 1 job.

With that off the chest, this writer will proceed to march out on some very shaky ground and probably get bogged down in an intellectual swamp. We thoroughly agree with Lowenthal's fundamental premise that any Federal police, operating with the power, secrecy, and millions of the FBI, is a potential danger to the citizens of the Republic. So long as Hoover is running it, we feel safe. We can think of 50 persons who, if they ever got Hoover's present job, would start raising unshirted hell. The FBI, in our opinion, is like a revolver. If you or a pal has it, OK, but if an opposite number has it and you or your pal is unarmed, then you can expect to sweat.

Because this volume is going to touch off a battle in the next Congress which will be exciting, important, and reach into the lives of every citizen, we'll have more to say about it.

BOOK EVENTS

(The Federal Bureau of Investigation, by Max Lowenthal. New York: William Sloane Associates, Inc. $4.50. Reviewed by Walter Trohan)

By mysterious design, best known to the author and publisher, copies of this book sprouted on the desks of Members of Congress and Federal jurists on the heels of a letter from a Sloane official stating "this unbiased and profoundly conservative approach" would lead to some startling conclusions on the FBI. The dust jacket hails Lowenthal as a conservative in the most profound sense and asserts he does not color his material, editorials, or draw conclusions.

Now, because the book adds up to an attack on the FBI, which can be expected to be a standard reference for years, it is fitting that these claims to conservatism and objectivity be examined. It is altogether proper and conservative to fret over the possibility that a Federal police force can grow into an arm of terror in a police state. When such fears parallel Moscow radio attacks on the FBI and writings of notorious Communist fronters, one can ask: "Who's conservative now?"

Mr. Lowenthal is a wealthy New York lawyer, who has been weaving in and out of Washington in various capacities for 30 years. The most detailed biography of Harry S. Truman to date, The Man of Independence, identifies him as the man who weaned the President from the realistic thinking of Pendergastism to the rarefied liberalism of the late Justice Louis D. Brandeis. Last September Lowenthal acknowledged varying degrees of intimate acquaintance with 22 known Communists, Red spies, and notorious fellow travelers, including Alger Hiss, John J. Abt, Charles Kramer, and Lee Pressman, who is even now seeking to identify himself with conservatism. Lowenthal told the House Un-American Activities Committee: "The number of people I didn't know were members of the Communist Party is something that makes my hair stand on end." So much for the new conservatism.

And now to objectivity. The jacket claims that for every quote questioning the practices or efficiency of the FBI, Lowenthal quotes the FBI reply or replies of FBI defenders, including, of course, J. Edgar Hoover. This reviewer learned that not one question was addressed to Hoover or the FBI by Lowenthal. And it is difficult, if not well nigh impossible, to find a kind word for the FBI in the book. However, it reeks with criticism, most carefully traced to source in the most elaborate set of source notes in many a year. And these are most carefully edited to fit the slant against the FBI.

Much is made of an investigation of the FBI by Robert H. Jackson when the Supreme Court Justice was Attorney General. Not one word is included from his report, which emphasized the fact that the acts of every FBI agent are subject to examination by defense lawyers. Jackson said that if civil liberties are in danger in this country, it is not by the FBI, and reported that with a record of 96 percent convictions in cases brought by the FBI not one case has been reversed by an appellate court because of third degree or other improper treatment of defendants. Among many other editings against the FBI there is a quotation of an attack by former Senator Carl Hatch, but no mention of a virtual retraction 2 days later. Thus kind words for the FBI die under the Lowenthal scissors.

Lowenthal belabors the FBI as a menace to freedom of speech and freedom of thought. At the same time he criticizes the FBI for not being efficient enough, holding that the atomic spy case and the case of his friend Hiss should have broken sooner. In his brief, which is heavy reading, he cites a gamut of cases from Sacco-Vanzetti and the world war raids of A. Mitchell Palmer to the Judy Coplon affair as offering evidence against J. Edgar Hoover and the FBI today.

The verdict of this reviewer on Lowenthal is "not guilty" of conservatism and "guilty" of objectivity against the FBI.

Mr. VELDE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RIVERS. I am delighted to yield to my friend, the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. VELDE. I compliment the distinguished gentleman for the fine dissertation he has made on the record of Max Lowenthal in this book. However, I am fearful lest our explanation of the fraud in which he was engaged when he wrote this book may further enrich his pocketbook by the sale of books. So I would like at this time to ask the American public to place a boycott against the book, Federal Bureau of Investigation, by Max Lowenthal. This gentleman has had his snout at the trough of the New Deal bureaucracy too long now, and I would regret very much to see him further enriched by the sale of this book.

Mr. RIVERS. I thank the gentleman for his observations.

Mr. DOYLE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RIVERS. I gladly yield to my distinguished colleague on the Armed Services Committee, the gentleman from California.

Mr. DOYLE. I wish to take this occasion to compliment my distinguished colleague on the Armed Services Committee for this very delightful and appropriate treatise on this subject. I think it is of great value to the country to have at this time.

Mr. RIVERS. I thank the gentleman. May I say to the gentleman I know of no more tireless and indefatigable student of government or more patriotic gentleman than my distinguished friend, the gentleman from California, Hon. CLYDE DOYLE.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. RIVERS] has expired.

Air Power in the Korean War—United States Must Plan Strategy on Possibility of Total War as Well as Limited Aggression

OF
HON. MELVIN PRICE
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, November 30, 1950

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, in the autumn issue of the Sperryscope, a quarterly magazine published by the Sperry Corp., there is an interesting article on Air Power and the Korean War, by Lt. Gen. Idwal H. Edwards, USAF.

I call the attention of this Congress to General Edwards' article because it is a clear statement of the role which American air power has played in the Korean conflict, by a leading Air Force general who is now Deputy Chief of Staff, Operations.

There has been considerable uninformed criticism of the Air Force in the Korean War, especially as to the capacity of the jet F-80 aircraft as contrasted with slower conventional fighters. Most of such criticism has been based on a misconception of the tactical support mission, and ignorance of the peculiar conditions of the Korean conflict. Suggestions that the Air Force should reduce its emphasis on the advancement of the air warfare are suggestions that we as a Nation court disaster. In a larger Air Force than we have permitted to be built since demobilization began in 1945, more specialization could be permitted in aircraft. In the Air Force we now have, the jet F-80 is a more versatile and effective plane than the slower F-51 of World War II.

Far more dangerous—but equally uninformed—is the criticism of the nature of the Air Force we have maintained, indeed of the defense establishments we need to carry out our basic strategy. As General Edwards succinctly states:

> We must plan our strategy to take cognizance of the possibility of total war as well as of limited aggression of the sort which took place in Korea.

General Edwards puts first things first. He asserts as the primary aviation need of the United States an Air Force in being which is capable of defending our country against air attack. We must, it is true, have strategic air and tactical air, just as we must have an Army and a Navy, forward bases and sea communications. Likewise we must continue with our program of research and development, if we are to retain superiority over other nations with greater military budgets than ours.

General Edwards sums up:

> Funds recently appropriated in accordance with the President's recommendation for increased military appropriations should permit the building of a force capable of carrying its assigned mission. Budget requirements determined by the Joint Chiefs of Staff, approved by the Joint Secretaries, accepted by the Secretary of Defense and forwarded to the President were the basis for the fund increases recently approved by Congress. These funds will help us greatly to expand and to improve the Air Force.

Mr. Speaker, General Edwards has summed up very well the situation affecting our Air Force, both past and present. His summary is a dignified answer to uninformed and reckless critics.

Let us therefore stop criticizing the Air Force for not doing what we never gave it funds to do with. The record of our Air Force in Korea is an excellent one, that requires no apology. General MacArthur himself has stated:

> The contribution of the Far East Air Forces in the Korean conflict has been magnificent. They have performed their mission beyond all expectations.

Let us lend our efforts now to building up the Air Force to the strength required by our involvement in Korea, our commitments in Europe and elsewhere, to the maintenance of the strategic air force, and above all, to the maintenance of an air force adequate to meet and defeat any air attack made against the continental United States.

General Edwards has served in the air branch of the Armed Forces continuous since 1918, when, as a second lieutenant in the United States Army, he transferred to the Air Service.

At the outbreak of World War II, he was in command of Randolph Field, Texas. During hostilties, he served, on two occasions, as Assistant Chief of Staff for Training on the War Department General Staff, and also as Chief of Staff of the European Theater of Operations in 1943. He was Deputy Commander of the Army Air Forces in the Mediterranean during 1944 and 1945.

At the end of the war, General Edwards was appointed Commanding General of the United States Air Forces in Europe and, in August 1947, became Deputy Chief of Staff, Personnel, Headquarters, USAF, in Washington. His current assignment is Deputy Chief of Staff, Operations.

The article, Air Power in the Korean War, is as follows:

AIR POWER IN THE KOREAN WAR

(By Lt. Gen. Idwal H. Edwards, U. S. Air Force, Deputy Chief of Staff, Operations)

Those of us who are primarily concerned with aviation will be interested in learning details of the role which American air power played in the Korean conflict.

When the aggression began the Air Force planes in Japan, stationed there on a basis of occupation requirements, were a mixture of jet interceptors of the F-80 type, light bombers of the B-26 type, and fighter bombers, also F-80's.

The F-80 is not the ultimate as an interceptor or as a fighter bomber, but it has proved itself in both categories as an effective weapon. All objective reports from Korea support the fact that this conclusion, based upon peacetime tests, has been fully confirmed by the greater test of the war. The F-80's fought, suffered heavy combat damage, and returned to fight some more. Their range was extended by improvising large wing tanks so that they could remain in the battle area for a substantial period of time to fight close to the ground where the highest consumption of fuel takes place.

The Communist Yak piston-engine planes, used early in the battle, were driven from the air and then were destroyed on the ground. In fact, the United Nations had, from the beginning, total air superiority.

Because of the completeness of the air superiority assured by our jet fighters, we were able to use some older types of aircraft readily available in storage. The World War II piston-engine F–51 and the twin Mustang F–82 also played important roles in ground attack as fighter bombers at night as well as day. Navy and Marine piston-engine planes, too, added to the effectiveness of close support.

The medium bombers, the B–29's, joined in the land battle. At the outset we had two-thirds of a group of B–29's on Guam that were rapidly moved to Okinawa. This force was agumented by additional groups of B–29's which carried out the fundamental strategic purpose of denying the Communist aggressor his sources of supply. These B–29's were even brought into the tactical effort and on many occasions bombed concentrations of troops, bridges, and other military targets in the battle area.

There was some uninformed criticism relative to the capacity of the jet F–80's as contrasted with slower conventional fighters, such as the World War II F–51's, but this criticism was based on a misconception of the tactical support mission. It was suggested that the F–80 is so fast that it could not remain long over the battle and that it could not hit its target as well as the slower F–51. Such a suggestion implies that the Air Force should reduce its emphasis on the advancement of the art of air warfare and return to the slower piston-engine planes of World War II. Any such policy would be disastrous.

The first task of an air force is to seek and maintain air superiority, and this can be done only by having airplanes better and more skillfully used than are the enemy's. The task of tactical air support is to destroy targets. It is not to fly slow or fast or to hover, but is solely to destroy which it can do best in an atmosphere free of enemy opposition. But in tactical warfare only the modern jets can achieve this necessary air superiority. The slower piston-engine planes of World War II against enemy jets would fare no better than did the Yaks against our F–80's. If the enemy had used jet planes to contest our superiority, we would soon have found out the importance of our jets in unmistakable terms.

This does not mean that there must not be specialization in the types of planes with which the Air Force must be equipped—especially in the tactical field. Even though planes are adaptable and can be used for purposes other than their primary mission, the kind of Air Force we need will have to be equipped with specialized planes. Some of these will be designed for all-weather interception, others for close support, others for deeper-in attack bombing and strafing, and others for night and bad weather support missions. The characteristics needed for each of these functions, of course, varies. There may well be, with an Air Force of sufficient size to permit such degree of specialization, a role for slower planes for some purposes. But any suggestion that the jet will not be heavily relied on in the future is incorrect. To deny this is to deny progress.

Equally incorrect would be a misunderstanding of the specialized events of the Korean aggression, and ideas—based on such a misunderstanding—as to the nature of the defense establishment we need to carry out our basic strategy. We must plan our strategy to take cognizance of the possibility of total war as well as of limited aggression of the sort which took place in Korea.

The United States must have in being an Air Force which is capable of defending our country against air attack. We must build up and improve our defense control and warning devices, our installations, and our intercepting forces which will, to the greatest extent possible, blunt any air attack made against the continental United States.

We must likewise have in being an Air Force of unmistakable power which will destroy the enemy's capacity to fight in the event that he makes the mistake of starting an aggressive war against our free world. This means we must maintain a strategic Air Force that is unmistakably good. We must waste no resource; we must spare no effort to see to it that this strategic force constitutes a defensive countermeasure of such violence that it will make it clear to anyone who thinks of attacking us—or the society of which we are a part—that this would be a most mistaken thing to do.

Finally, we must maintain the lines of sea communications as free as possible from enemy attack and strengthen the defense of the free world based on the North Atlantic Treaty arrangements. But this is a political matter as well as a military matter. It requires determination to defend our common society, even at the cost of heavy sacrifice.

In recognizing the tasks confronting our Air Force, we understand that there are many things which have to be done to strengthen our air arm. We must build those installations, acquire the equipment, and train our personnel and units to a skill which will make our Air Force capable, within the limits of the present science, of carrying out its task. Funds recently appropriated in accordance with the President's recommendation for increased military appropriations should permit such a capability force. Budget requirements determined by the Joint Chiefs of Staff, approved by the Joint Secretaries, accepted by the Secretary of Defense, and forwarded to the President were the basis for the fund increases recently approved by Congress. These funds will help us greatly to expand and to improve the Air Force.

But in addition to building up such an Air Force in being we must also search out and continue to search out every possible deficiency in our air establishment—in our bases, our installations, and our planes, and in the training of the men, and everything else that goes to make up an Air Force. Our Nation, and indeed all of the free world, longs for the time when that free world has the power in being sufficient to guarantee peace and security in this air age.

J. Edgar Hoover Versus Max Lowenthal

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. EMANUEL CELLER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, November 27, 1950

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, the recent book of Max Lowenthal, which purports to be an objective study of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, goes to great lengths to place the blame for the excesses in the so-called Red raids of 1919–20 upon J. Edgar Hoover, who was appointed Director of the FBI by the late Harlan Fiske Stone, who was among the first to raise his voice in protest against the manner in which the raids were carried out.

A real authority of that period and those instances was the late Louis Post, who served as Assistant Secretary of Labor during that period. In recounting the events of the time in a book, The Deportations Delirious of Nineteen-Twenty, Mr. Post nowhere singles Mr. Hoover out for censure. In fact, Mr. Hoover's name does not even appear in the index to this book. The following revealing statement appears on page 49, which clearly singles the late William J. Flynn out as the one responsible for the activities of the then Bureau of Investigation:

> Although Congress did not at once make as large an appropriation as the Attorney General asked for, it made one in June and another in December which aggregated more. With these funds at command the private detective whom the Attorney General had already selected to manage the esoteric activities of the Red crusade—his name being William J. Flynn—a man whom at an appropriations hearing he described as "the greatest anarchist-expert in the United States," one who "knows all the men of that class" and "can pretty nearly call them by name," turned the Department of Justice into an agency for stimulating the popular delirium which the postal bombs of the preceding May and the explosions of June had generated.

Later these incidents were investigated by a subcommittee of the Senate Judiciary Committee and they failed to fix responsibility for these events upon Mr. J. Edgar Hoover.

There is another source of information which sheds light upon Mr. Hoover's role in those days. I am sure that this source during that period was not prejudiced on Mr. Hoover's behalf as he was one of Boston's outstanding attorneys who represented many of the aliens arrested. I refer to the late Morris Katzeff, who was assisted in his defense of the aliens by Mr. Justice Frankfurter and Prof. Zachariah Chaffee. On June 11, 1940, Mr. Katzeff wrote me in detail regarding Mr. Hoover's role in the Mitchell Palmer raids.

Mr. Hoover, who served as a special assistant to the Attorney General from 1919 until he was transferred to the Bureau of Investigation in 1921, had no connection with the raids. His role was to handle for the Department of Justice the legal proceedings which followed.

I herewith submit portions of the letter of Mr. Katzeff:

> BOSTON, MASS., June 11, 1940.
> Congressman CELLER,
> MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: • • • I wish to say that I have personal, first-hand knowledge of the part that Mr. J. Edgar Hoover played in the so-called New England raids upon alleged Communists in 1920. I was counsel for some of them immediately after January 2, 1920, and before many days were over, I was retained by a committee that called itself New England Defense Conference, to represent 433 men and women who were held at various police stations and other concentration places, and who were eventually herded together at Deer Island at Boston Harbor.
> I represented them all through the preliminary hearings at the island conducted by immigration inspectors, assisted by agents of the Department of Justice, and these hearings lasted for about 5 months.
> I was personally present at all of these hearings, after they were allowed to have counsel. I had numerous conferences during these months with local immigration authorities at Boston, Mr. Skeffington and his assistant, Mr. Sullivan, as well as with the Department of Justice agents in charge of these cases in New England. I had several conferences with the then Secretary of Labor, Mr. Wilson, and still many more, with the Assistant Secretary of Labor, Mr. Louis F. Post.

At several of these conferences Mr. J. Edgar Hoover was present, but I never received the impression that he was the man who gave instructions to the local, New England and Boston Department of Justice agents or immigration inspectors.

Mr. Louis F. Post in his little book entitled "The Deportation Delirium of 1920," tells at great length of the outrages perpetrated by the agents of the Department of Justice, under the guidance and inspiration of the then Attorney General A. Mitchell Palmer.

At the conclusions of the hearings at Deer Island I filed several petitions in the Federal District Court for the District of Massachusetts for writs of habeas corpus, and the hearings held before Mr. Justice Anderson of the local appellate division consumed, I believe, about 20 to 25 full court days.

At these hearings I was assisted by Mr. Lawrence Brooks, of the Massachusetts bar, now a judge of a district court hereabouts, and I had the invaluable assistance of Zachariah Chaffee, professor of law at Harvard Law School, as well as by Prof. Felix Frankfurter, now Justice of the United States Supreme Court, both of whom appeared as amici curiae.

During the time very interesting disclosures were made concerning the conduct of the Department of Justice in the organizing and executing of these raids.

We obtained and read into the record at that trial the original instructions given by the Department of Justice at Washington to the local Department of Justice agents, and it appears unmistakably that these orders were issued by one Burke who was then the chief of some department, and who was Mr. Hoover's chief at the time.

I was fortunate to be able to find among old papers in my office an original copy of the typewritten opinion of Judge Anderson, from which I enclose for your information copies of these instructions.

I spoke to Mr. Hoover once or twice at Washington in 1920 about the manner in which the raids were carried out, the utter lawlessness of the entire transactions, and I did recall distinctly that he deplored these conditions as much as did counsel for the defense.

Since there are so few persons who were intimately connected with the case who could speak of it with any degree of personal knowledge, I feel it my duty to send this letter to you for such use as you can make of it.

The cases are reported in the Federal Reports and are entitled William T. Colyer v. Henry J. Skeffington, Morris Katzeff v. Henry J. Skeffington, and more cases of Morris Katzeff v. Henry J. Skeffington.

The voluminous records of the evidence taken in trial, I believe, were turned over some time after the case was disposed of, to Mr. Post, who on one of his visits to Boston called on me and asked for them in order to enable him to write the book mentioned above.

I will appreciate it if you will either make copies of these instructions or return the same to me at some later date.

I am,

Respectfully yours,

MORRIS KATZEFF.

Military Strength Cannot Be Maintained Without a Reservoir of Trained Manpower Available for Service—Message of Secretary of Defense Marshall to the American Legion Stating the Urgent Need for Universal Military Training

OF

HON. OLIN E. TEAGUE

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 30, 1950

Mr. TEAGUE. Mr. Speaker, shortly before Secretary of Defense George C. Marshall welcomed the members of the NATO defense committee at their meeting in Washington, he sent a message to the American Legion convention that was held in Los Angeles the week of October the 8th. I do not pretend to know all that Secretary Marshall had in mind when he prepared his challenging message to the American Legion. I can well believe, however, that he was anticipating the scheduled meeting with foreign defense ministers, and his own obligation as Secretary of Defense of the greatest and strongest Nation in the North Atlantic Treaty organization. His primary task would be to prove to the leaders of other countries that the United States is prepared to make its full contribution to the collective forces that will be required to implement the recommendations of the NATO defense committee meeting.

In his message to the American Legion Secretary Marshall stressed, therefore, continuing need for the support the Legion has always given to the preparedness measures of the Department of Defense, and specifically for the enactment of legislation to establish a system of universal training.

In the world today, Secretary Marshall warned, military strength is the one factor that supports our foreign policy and that prevents war. It is also the surest way to hasten victory when war breaks out, as war broke in Korea 5 months ago.

Military strength cannot be maintained without a reservoir of trained manpower available for service. General Marshall maintained this as Chief of Staff. Secretary of State Marshall asserted this before the Armed Services Committee. And Secretary of Defense Marshall has now repeated this. Are we to ignore, then, the advice and earnest plea of the man to whom we have given more honors and more varied responsibilities than any other man in our time? Or are we going to be impressed by his sincerity and consistency, by his experience and his wisdom, and take heed of his warning: "It must be done."

Mr. Speaker, the American Legion was impressed by the words of Secretary of Defense Marshall, and retained in its platform a strong endorsement of the principle of universal military training.

Mr. Speaker, it is the responsibility of this Congress, before it comes to the end of its session, to heed the words of Secretary Marshall and find the means, in spite of present and immediate requirements, for initiating a system of universal military training to give us that reservoir of trained manpower so essential to our future defense and to the requirements of our participation in the NATO program.

Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I insert in the RECORD Secretary Marshall's summary of his position, and earnest plea for a strong United States:

To the American Legion Convention at Los Angeles:

I regret that I am unable to be present in person to express to you the appreciation of the Department of Defense for the loyal support the Legion has always given to the preparedness measures and to urge your wholehearted efforts to give this country the strength it needs in the critical future we now face.

In the past, our military successes have invariably been received with an excess of optimism and an immediate reaction to reduce our Armed Forces or limit their further development. This was the case to a greater or lesser degree following almost every success we had in the last war, beginning with the victory in Tunisia. The immediate reaction to the Korean campaign seems to indicate repetition of this unfortunate habit of ours. But this time, with your most active help, I hope, we must not give away to the heavy pressures to relax our vigilance or emasculate our strength.

In the world today, I am sorry to say, military strength seems the most essential factor in the support of our foreign policy and of difficult negotiations, and it seems for the moment to be the best means to prevent war—also the surest way to hasten victory if war should befall us.

To maintain a strong military posture through the years immediately ahead and at the same time not to wreck our economy, it is mandatory that we create and maintain a reservoir of trained manpower available for service. In other words, we must have some system of universal military training. I will not go into the arguments in this message. You already know them well, I am sure, but they never have been more impressive to me than they are today, and I am certain they will be tomorrow.

In March 1948, as Secretary of State, I said before the Armed Services Committee of the Senate:

"I see no possible way financially to maintain a reasonable military posture except on the foundation of universal military training. The consideration of this subject has been confused by discussion of amounts, requirements, administration and various conflicting beliefs. The clear-cut issue is whether or not this country will stand before the world for at least the next 5 or 10 years in a position appropriate to its leadership in furthering the perpetuation of free governments, and avoiding their transition into police states."

In my final report as Chief of Staff in September 1945, I made a special and earnest plea for the immediate adoption of a system of universal military training. Last June we found ourselves of a sudden in a situation in Korea where the issue of trained manpower was of momentous importance. Now that that particular crisis seems moderated to some degree, I hope that the American people will recognize this urgent need and adopt it as a national policy. Just how we can best join the present imperative requirement for selective-service action with the initiation of some system for universal military training I am not now prepared to say. But one way or another, it must be done. Past proposals will undoubtedly have to be materially altered to meet the serious situation into which we have gotten ourselves by past failures to act in time. But I hope, with your help, that we can manage this time to overcome the vigorous opposition of small minorities that have dominated the decision in the past, and finally do what, in my opinion, is so much to the vital interest of the American people, not to mention the world at large.

That Peace May Come—An Original Poem by Loraine Huntington Miller, of Long Beach, Calif.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLYDE DOYLE
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, November 27, 1950

Mr. DOYLE. Mr. Speaker, in my home city of Long Beach, Calif., at the much-publicized and emphasized observance of United Nations Day at the ceremony which was held on the front steps of the city hall there was read the following original poem by the author, Loraine Huntington Miller:

THAT PEACE MAY COME
(By Loraine Huntington Miller)

Can deadly bombs of hydrogen
Create good will among all men?
Or planes that race the stars in flight
Bring peace more lasting than a night?
The spark that lifts us nearer God—
That makes us more than earthly clod—
That questing flame may well consume
The earth and all sons of her womb,
Unless we use it as the Lord
Planned when from the animal horde
He set man apart by giving him scul,
That by love he might control—
Not by man-made weapons hurled,
But by love—control the world.

Let us employ that inner force
By contact with its mighty source.
Let us as a nation pray;
At the beginning of each day
Let church bells ring at 8 o'clock
From timber line to salty dock—
Wet from the spread-out fishing seine—
From Florida to rocky Maine,
From Boston to the Golden Gate,
Ring, sweet bells, purge us of hate.

Ring, carillon, in Gothic tower,
While in the misty morning hour
Bell buoys answer from the sea,
And birds praise God in every tree.

Ring out, bell cast by Paul Revere,
Above New England church austere,
Above a clock tower, quaint and square,
Where strikes the hour for this our prayer.

Ring, mission bells, from adobe wall,
Waking dim aisles that recall
The feet of Serra as he trod
The suffering paths that led to God.

Ring, bells in graceful, pointed spire,
Designed by Wren, and rising higher
Than feathery elm and silver birch
That weave lace shadows on the church.

Ring, bells for college girls and beaus,
In old brick chapels, weathered rose.
Ring, bells, while we, the Nation, pray:
"In God we trust. Guide us each day.
Give us the power to know the right
And make of it our pilot light.
Let each of us strive hard for peace
Within our hearts and never cease.
For we alone can conquer hate
In home and town and sovereign State,
As we, the Nation's people, are,
So is our flag, each stripe and star.

"And give us leaders, strong and true,
Who know no other God than You,
Send straight, sure men in our great need.
Who humbly pray and proudly lead;

"May we and they, in faith's rebirth,
Inspire the peoples of the earth
To trust the God in every man,
And seek with us a better plan
To live together as a whole—
Each a part of infinite soul.

"O heed this prayer, O Lord. Amen."

While church bells ring, each morn again,
At 8 o'clock, across this land,
From valleys green to desert sand,
Let our Nation bow in prayer
That peace may come for all to share.

Mr. Speaker, it was so cordially received and is such a timely and inspiring interpretation that I feel honored to be permitted to have it called to the attention of you, Mr. Speaker, and also my distinguished colleagues in this great Congress. It has been my pleasure to know the author for many years and, on the occasion of this poem being read in public on United Nations Day, she explained to me that, while she was a firm believer in preparedness and adequate military strength as deterrents to war, she also felt the real end of wars for mankind forever must come through spiritual means.

Stop Chinese Communists in Korea

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOSEPH R. BRYSON
OF SOUTH CAROLINA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, November 30, 1950

Mr. BRYSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following telegrams:

Congressman BRYSON,
Congressman from South Carolina,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.:

Please use your influence and ability for General MacArthur to be given authority to use everything at his disposal to stop the Chinese Communists that are killing our precious boys, and do not allow Britain to bring us into any kind of a so-called agreement with the Chinese Communists and Russian Communists, as there is no truth in them. Last but not least, the Chinese Communists have no right to be heard by the United Nations.

EARL P. PAULK,
State Superintendent of the Churches of God of North Carolina, Charlotte, N. C.

NOVEMBER 30, 1950.

Mr. EARL P. PAULK,
State Superintendent,
The Churches of God of North Carolina, Charlotte, N. C.:

Reurtel. Christian civilization was never subjected to a more severe test than now. The hour is at hand when every known force, including atomic bomb, should be promptly utilized to preserve the last remnant of freedom. I have and shall continue to do my utmost in this important day.

Member of Congress.

West Virginia Pulp & Paper Co.'s Tree Farm

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. L. MENDEL RIVERS
OF SOUTH CAROLINA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, November 30, 1950

Mr. RIVERS. Mr. Speaker, on November 9, 1950, a distinguished Senator from South Carolina, the Honorable BURNET R. MAYBANK, delivered a timely and significant address on the occasion of the dedication of the West Virginia Pulp & Paper Co.'s tree farm in Berkeley County, S. C. He paid well deserved tribute to a distinguished group—a group which is doing something to conserve one of our most vital natural resources—the tree—and a group which is such an indispensable asset to our national economy and defense. To those members of this fine group, responsible for such a visionary project, I too want to add my humble congratulations.

Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent, I include in the Appendix of the RECORD the remarks of our distinguished Senator, as follows:

The Democratic administration under President Roosevelt took over the direction of the governmental efforts in 1932. Among the important moves that he made from his active mind and understanding heart, was the directive through the Forestry Service of the National Government. This encouraged farmers and other land owners to plant trees and put their lands into tree crops.

The CCC camps were organized at this time. These served the double purpose of employment of young men, the development of new forests, and protection of the existing standing timber. Therefore, it is a fact that great emphasis was given to the development and conseravtion of this great national resource by the Federal Government.

It is a remarkable and happy fact that along the Atlantic seaboard from Wilmington, N. C., to Savannah, Ga., trees can grow to commercial size in less time than in any other known area in the world. Here in South Carolina mention should certainly be made of the outstanding contribution to the Nation-wide forestry development by the late F. A. Silcox. As you know he was a native of Charleston who was appointed Chief Forester of the United States.

It was as a member of the Public Works Administration that many problems of reforestation, soil conservation, and soil erosion were brought to the board's attention and they constructively aided in all of the problems submitted to it in this field of responsibility. When the resources of the pulpwood supply in South Carolina were fully realized, the important necessity for the lai downer was a nearby market which would enable the seller to obtain a profitable f. o. b. price for his product. When I was mayor of Charleston the West Virginia Paper & Pulp Co. were seeking a site near Charleston to locate a plant. Pulp mills require a tremendous amount of water and their needs were greater than the existing water supply which the city of Charleston could furnish. The city of Charleston, realizing the far-reaching benefits to be derived from the establishment of a large manufacturing plant in this area contracted for the construction of the Edisto tunnel which assured an ample supply of good water indefinitely. This expenditure by the city of Charleston represented an investment of $1,000,000 or more.

I greatly appreciate the cooperation I received as a member of the Public Works Administration from the West Virginia Paper & Pulp Co., the International Paper Co., and others. The function of the Federal Government should be to assist individuals and corporations, when necessary, to maintain the free-enterprise system. Private enterprise in South Carolina, both individual and corporate, has shown initiative and vision and the reasons for today's ceremonies is another evidence of intelligent planning.

In South Carolina timber is one of the big-four crops, ranking second only to cotton in annual value. It stands well above tobacco and corn in total cash value.

South Carolina's forests produce raw materials worth $122,000,000 a year; the processing of wood adds over $150,000,000; 35,000 people are employed full time in South Carolina's forest industries. At least 100,000 others depend on forest industries for a major part of their living. The $372,000,000 forest industry of South Carolina ranks second only to textile in economic importance.

Nearly 12,000,000 acres in South Carolina are forest land. That is more than 60 percent of the State's entire area. The forests of the State are divided among more than 100,000 owners (108,170 individuals and firms). There are only a few large holdings. Many owners have woodlands of 20, 30, or 40 acres; the average holding among smaller owners is 70 acres.

Since 1936 the number of sawmills in the State has doubled. Production of wood pulp has jumped from 100 tons a day to more than 2,000 tons a day. The products of the forests are in greater demand today.

But South Carolina must meet a heavier demand for timber products with less timber than was growing on the land a decade ago. According to the forest survey conducted by the Southeastern Forest Experiment Station in cooperation with the State commission of forestry, the total volume of all sound trees in South Carolina declined 5 percent from 1936 to 1947. Pine, which provides the bulk of the timber products, declined 8 percent.

In saw timber (timber of the sizes and kinds suitable for lumber) the decline was 10 percent. Pine saw timber decreased 12 percent. On the southern coastal plain the decline in saw timber was 25 percent.

This decline in timber volume took place in spite of a 12-percent increase in the acreage of forest land. From 1936 to 1947 the area of commercial forest land increased 1,200,000,000 acres. Most of this increase was due to worn-out cropland being abandoned.

Nearly 5,000,000 acres—two-fifths of the forest land—is poorly stocked. Although South Carolina's industries depend mainly on pine, hardwoods are replacing pines on many areas. In the Sand Hill area some 400,000 acres of pineland has gone over to scrub oak. State-wide, the average quality of timber is declining. The average tree in 1946 contained 15 percent less net board-foot volume than the average tree in 1938. Cull trees have increased in number. One-fifth of the trees now growing in South Carolina are culls.

Nation-wide, the story is much the same. Of the country's 461,000,000 acres of commercial forest land, 75,000,000 is virtually idle. Although the Eastern and Southern States have three-fourths of the commercial forest land, one-third of all our saw-timber is now concentrated on 6 percent of the forest land in the Pacific Northwest. The quality and size of the timber have deteriorated over large areas.

Timber is being cut from the forests faster than it is growing. It is reported that more than half of all timber cutting in the United States is poor or destructive.

Although the United States is one of the leading Nations in forest area and in kinds of useful timber, we have since the war imported more lumber and wood pulp than we have exported. That means we are consuming more forest products than we produce.

But there is indeed a world shortage of timber, especially of the softwoods used for construction lumber. The Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations reports that about two-thirds of the world's forests receive neither care nor protection. In the face of ever-mounting needs for wood, the world's forests are steadily diminishing.

If South Carolina is to benefit from its large area of forest land in more jobs, more resources to return taxes, and more general income for all, that forest land must be made to provide the necessary basic timber supplies permanently and continuously. A permanently prosperous industry and an expanding economy for South Carolina or for the Nation cannot be built upon diminishing resources.

Forest growth in South Carolina and elsewhere in the Nation must be built up and kept up.

Forest land can be managed so that it will grow and yield successive crops of good timber. The average yearly growth rate can be increased and the quality of the growing stock can be improved through good forestry.

The tract of land we are dedicating today is to be devoted to such continuous production. The company that owns this land is to be commended for its progressiveness and foresight in pledging this land to forestry.

Good forestry should be applied on millions and millions more acres, all over the country. Every possible public and private aid and encouragement should be given to the extension of good forestry practice. The Federal Government, the States, the forest industries, and the individual forest owners should unite in aggressive action to build up our forest resources and see that they are wisely managed.

Forest resources are needed—for more than lumber and paper. One of the greatest values of forests concerns the control of water. Much of our Nation suffers from soil erosion and floods and sedimentation. Good forest growth affords excellent protection against such losses. It increases the ability of the soil to take in and store water. By maintaining good forest conditions we can assure ourselves not only of good timber but also better control over runoff, lessened soil erosion, lessened silting up of stream channels and of reservoirs, and greater recharge of valuable underground fresh water supplies.

The world today requires that we make and keep ourselves strong. Forest resources are among the essential elements of our national strength.

The Soviet Union, by the way, seems to be well aware of the importance of the forest resources. The recent 5-year plan for the development of forestry is reported to provide for the planting and cultivation of trees on an area exceeding the entire forest area of the British Isles. The volume of timber production was planned to attain by 1950 a 59-percent increase over 1940. The Union of Soviet Socialist Republics at present maintains 12 forestry institutes, 15 special forestry research institutions, and many scores of experimental stations and laboratories in all parts of the country.

In this country we have plenty of good, potentially productive forest land, probably enough, if we put it to work and handle it wisely, to meet our timber needs permanently and abundantly.

The dedication of this 340,000 acres today is a good step in the right direction. But good forestry practice must be applied to nearly a thousand million times that much land if our forest resources are to be built up as they should be.

Charles H. Flory, State forester of South Carolina, has said that with the application of improved forest practices it is entirely possible that the annual rate of growth in South Carolina's forests could be increased from the present average of 100 board feet per acre per year to 300 or even 400 board feet. Nation-wide, the average annual timber growth per acre probably could be at least doubled.

In the interest of our national security, and to meet the growing needs of an expanding economy, we should take the necessary steps, promptly and aggressively, to do so.

Debts, Deficits, and Taxes

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BEN F. JENSEN
OF IOWA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 30, 1950

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter, and an address by Hon. Herbert Hoover to the United States Junior Chamber of Commerce:

November 12, 1950.

Representative BEN F. JENSEN,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR BEN: Thanks a lot for the letter you sent way back last May 27 regarding the talk Herbert Hoover made complimenting the Jaycees for their work on operation efficiency, the program urging adoption of the Hoover Commission findings.

In that letter you refer to the possibility of inserting this talk in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I think this is an excellent suggestion and I know the Jaycees throughout the country would appreciate it very much.

Enclosed is a copy of the recording, which was broadcast over 31 stations from Maine to California.

Also enclosed is a copy of the talk Mr. Hoover later made before the junior chamber national convention. Perhaps it could also be included in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Sincerely,

GEORGE W. MATTOX,
Member, Junior Chamber of Commerce, Shenandoah, Iowa.

TRANSCRIPT OF RECORDING BY HERBERT HOOVER, MARCH 24, 1950

Gentlemen of the junior chamber of commerce, the junior chambers are doing a valiant job in creating public interest in the reports of the Commission on Reorganization of the Government. You have put a vitality into this crusade that only youth can do. It is a crusade for intelligent reduction in the huge cost of government. It is a crusade to clear the track for competency in the multitude of Federal activities. It is a nonpartisan crusade. It is a job for citizenship rather than partisanship.

There are byproducts of this crusade just as important as winning these reforms themselves. It is a great public educational campaign on the processes, the meanings, the dangers, and the values of government. You're giving a great lesson in civics and good government.

In a larger sense this is a crusade to make democracy work. There is much apprehension that it may fail. Many believe that bureaucracy has got so big that it cannot be controlled.

Now you may have confidence you're making progress. The two reforms of the unification of the armed services and general services of the Government are already enacted. The unification of the armed services already resulted in great savings. The general services, by consolidating buying, building controls, etc., are already in action with important savings and increased efficiency. A number of other minor reforms have been perfected.

The Commission proposed many more reforms of great importance that have not yet been enacted. There is naturally opposition. There are some Government agencies who hesitate to give up their vested habits and their vested interests and the cuts in the number of their employees. They are steadfastly for reform in all the other departments.

And there are pressure groups who support the objecting bureaucracies and who, I regret to say, misrepresent and distort the Commission's recommendations. To clear up these misrepresentations and carry the debate straight to the people is the great mission that you have undertaken. And this is no academic discussion. You're dealing with matters that concern every cottage in the land. You're engaged in a great national service, and you're doing it well.

DEBTS, DEFICITS, AND TAXES

(Address by Herbert Hoover before the United States Junior Chamber of Commerce, Chicago, Ill., June 16, 1950)

It is a pleasure to address the Junior Chamber of Commerce. We owe to you a debt for the support you have given to reorganizing the executive machinery of the Government. There are even more reasons for public appreciation of your organization.

You have asked me to speak on the relation of Government expenditures, deficits, and taxes to jobs and to national life.

Today we are blessed with some kind of prosperity. Whatever kind it is, we all want stability without inflation. We want a system that finds jobs for 1,000,000 new workers each year.

DEFICITS IN GENERAL

In 1932 I did the suffering from an unbalanced budget. The reverberations of a European panic had pulled the tax revenues out from under us, and we were compelled to make large recoverable loans to support our credit structure. Outside these subsequently recovered loans our modest deficit was about $1,000,000,000. In the midst of this grief, Mr. Roosevelt, in denouncing our deficit, made an uncomfortable remark to the effect that, too often, liberal governments have been wrecked on the rock of deficits. However, we only heard this remark once.

About this time, Lord John Maynard Keynes came up with his new intoxicant of deficit spending in years of unemployment. It had a good political flavor. Having got the habit, we keep drinking in times of presumed prosperity. With the exception of 2 years in the Eightieth Congress, we have had deficits and increasing debt for all 17 years since Keynes helped us out.

The consoling answer of the inebriated is that there is really no such thing as Government debt. They say, "We owe it to ourselves." Any government which follows this will-o'-wisp will sometime break its neck over the precipice of inflation. Some have already done so.

DEFICITS IN PROSPECT

We cannot appraise these questions without using facts, figures, and the word "billions." But, to be sure the billions I mention are free of political bias, I use only those from Democratic Senators.

Senator HARRY BYRD says that if we include all Federal expenditures, both in and outside of the President's formal budget, they will amount to about $44,000,000,000 for the present fiscal year, with a deficit of about $5,000,000,000. Our State and local expenditures amount to about $15,000,000,000. That would be around $60,000,000,000 of various current government expenditures.

Beyond this Senator MCCLELLAN calculates that, if all the recommended Federal legislation is passed, it will increase the annual Federal expenditures by $20,000,000,000 to $25,000,000,000 more. Even without this phantasmagoria of a promised land, the Federal deficit will probably be greater next year, and there are also powerful urgings to State and municipal governments for increased expenditures.

THE FIVE QUESTIONS

Five questions arise about all this:

1. Who pays these taxes?
2. Can taxes be sufficiently increased to meet these deficits?
3. Will deficits not lead to more inflation?
4. Can expenses be reduced?
5. What stands in the way of reductions?

It is these five questions, plus the activities of the different breeds of collectivists, which plague the American people today.

WHO PAYS THE TAXES?

"Who pays the taxes?" Here we enter a land of twilights and illusions. We can illuminate it somewhat if we divide the taxpayers into the sheep and the goats. The sheep are the families who have a gross income of less than $7,000 a year before taxes. The goats are those who have a gross income of more than $7,000 a year. Various studies show that almost 80 percent of governmental revenues come from the sheep. It also shows that each sheep family on the average pays about $1,400 a year in taxes and deductions. Therefore even the $7,000 top figure for the sheep is not $7,000.

CAN TAXES BE INCREASED TO MEET THESE DEFICITS?

I suppose taxes could be increased until the whole population can no longer buy enough food or clothes. The real question is how far our people can be taxed and still have jobs and a decent standard of living. We can apply four tests as to whether the patient can stand any more tax mixtures.

First. Because of the average $1,400 annual taxes on the sheep families, a large number of them are already prevented from reaching the standard which the Labor Department insists is desirable.

Second. But how about the goats who have gross incomes of more than $7,000 a year? The answer is easy. If the Government confiscated their entire personal incomes, it would not pay the present Federal deficit—and that does not include Senator MCCLELLAN's phantasmagoria of a promised land.

Third. One of the illusions of our times is that corporation taxes come from the stockholders. Sometime the American people will realize that corporation taxes are passed on to the customers, who are the sheep. Otherwise the corporations would in the end go bankrupt.

Therefore, any substantial increase in taxes must come by shearing more from the sheep.

Fourth. It is my belief that even present taxes are so draining the savings of the people into the Government as to undermine new jobs for the future. It is possible to calculate the present Government take as theoretically over 60 percent of the people's savings after deducting the cost of a possible decent standard of living. With Senator MCCLELLAN'S phantasmagoria the Government take would be over 80 percent.

The fact that taxes have already definitely shrunken venture and equity capital for small business would seem to be proved when the Government proposes to furnish such capital. Never before, in 165 years, did small business depend on Government.

That is also proof that the Government is becoming more and more the source of capital and credit. To which the Socialists applaud.

Big business can finance itself by borrowing money, especially while the Government is inflating credit. But big business only employs about 25 percent of the working population.

The answer to the question, "Can our economy stand substantially more taxes and still make substantial progress?" is just simply "No," unless you believe a collectivist state is progress.

WILL DEFICITS LEAD TO MORE INFLATION?

Financing Government deficits by borrowing, if continued long enough, has only one end—inflation. That has been proved by a dozen nations.

We ourselves have already decreased the purchasing value of the dollar by about 50 percent, and we are still creeping along that road. The 5-cent telephone call and the 5-cent fare have already gone, and the 5-cent candy bar has shrunk. A new round of inflation is now appearing in direct or indirect wage and salary increases and rising commodity prices.

If we keep on this road, we are certain to reach the President's ideal of $4,000 a year to every family. But it will not have $4,000 purchasing power.

To this question of further Government borrowing to meet deficits, my answer is that it is the road to disaster for every cottage in the land.

CAN WE REDUCE EXPENSES?

The next question, "Can we reduce expenses?" To that, the answer is "Yes."

The first move in that direction is to stop Senator MCCLELLAN's phantasmagoria in its tracks. That is easy if we take a holiday in new Government services until the deficit is overcome. No doubt many things the Government can provide are desirable. Most every family would like to add desirable things to its living. But getting them by borrowing money is the way the old homestead was lost. Most families shy off that method. And the Government should be even more shy, or it will come to a bad end.

The second and most simple device to reduce expenses is for Congress to cut proposed expenditures to the very bones of necessity; also to suspend the sport of log-rolling and pork barrels.

We are generally told that these enormous Government expenditures and deficits are mainly the inheritances of the war and cannot be helped. It is true that of the present budget of $44,000,000,000, about $32,000,000,000 go to pay interest on the debt, veterans, national defense, and subsidies to other countries to keep them comfortable in the cold war. Those items have been increased 15 percent in the last 3 years.

To get some look at expenditures not created by the wars, and to avoid any partisan flavor, we may start from a Democratic fiscal year of 17 years ago. This nonwar part of the Government has increased expenditures 400 percent in 17 years and 50 percent in the last 3 years. No amount of claims that the purchasing value of the dollar has decreased or that the population has increased can explain these increases.

REORGANIZATION OF THE EXECUTIVE BRANCH

The third way to reduce expenses is the more efficient organization and the cutting out of waste in Government on the lines proposed by the Reorganization Commission.

Through the cooperation of the administration, the Congress, the Citizens Committee, and such organizations as yours, we have already made substantial progress in these reforms of the executive branch of the Government.

The major accomplishments are:

Unification of the Armed Forces;

Reorganization of the State Department;

Unification of the General Services;

Reorganization of the Government merchant marine.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

They represent big money. In addition, a number of minor reforms have been accepted.

MAJOR REFORMS STILL TO DO

We still have many major reforms to accomplish. They include our proposals:

To reorganize the whole civil service into an honest-to-goodness career service based on merit with justice and encouragement in promotion. The experienced chairman of our task force unhesitatingly stated we could save 10 percent of the Federal payroll. That would be a little item of $600,000,000.

To put the budgeting and accounting of the Government on a business basis. There would be many savings possible if the Government could see itself in the mirror of an adequate accounting system.

To organize the post office into a modern business concern, with management free from politics. With this reform and some increase in rates to special commercial users, I believe its deficit of half a billion could be overcome.

To reorganize the structure of the Departments of Treasury, Agriculture, Commerce, Labor, Interior, and Housing so that each of them has, cheek by jowl, the agencies devoted to a related major purpose. That would fix responsibility for policies, create checks and balances, eliminate overlaps, competition, and waste inevitable in activities now scattered all over the Government. The chairman of only one of those task forces said that $300,000,000 could be saved by that one unification.

Unify the Government Hospital Services so as to save four or five hundred million dollars of unnecessary construction now authorized; at the same time to provide better medical service and better preparedness for war.

And there are scores of other reforms which are pointed at greater efficiency for less money.

These recommendations were founded upon 2 years of study by 18 task forces comprised of independent leading men and women of experience whose reports, recommendations, and reasons are open to everybody.

These reforms are in the lap of the gods in Washington and the pressure groups at home.

WHAT STANDS IN THE WAY OF REDUCTION OF EXPENDITURES?

The next question is, What stands in the way of these reforms and reductions?

Over 25 years ago, I served on a Commission of Reorganization of the Executive Branch. I saw those reforms go to their doom. At that time I attended their burial with the following remarks:

"* * * Practically every single item has met with opposition from some vested official, or it has disturbed some vested habit, and offended some organized minority. It has aroused the paid propagandists. All of them are in favor of every item of reorganization except that which affects the activity in which they are specially interested. In the aggregate, these directors of vested habits and propaganda surround Congress with a confusing fog of opposition. Meanwhile, the inchoate voice of the public gets nowhere but to swear."

But we are doing better this time than 25 years ago, as we had little public or congressional support at that time.

Among our public supporters, your organization has given its fine energies to educating the misguided lay members of obstructing pressure groups.

I may take a parable from Dr. Flemming. A Boy Scoutmaster was calling the roll of his troop as to what good deed each had performed during the week. All passed except four. The scoutmaster told the four to go at once and come back in the afternoon, each with a good deed to report. When they returned, the first replied that he had helped a lady across the street. The second, third, and fourth made the same reply. The suspicious scoutmaster inquired if this was all about the same lady. The first boy replied, "Yes, sir. She ought to have crossed but she refused to go. It took all four of us to get her over."

PROBLEMS DEEPER IN REORGANIZATION

But the problems which face us in fiscal questions are deeper in American life than reorganization of the executive departments.

We need to make an appraisal of some of the forces which produce these dangers from expenditures, deficits, inflation, and drainage of savings into the Government.

It is possible to denounce public officials for all these dangers and ills. But do not overlook the fact that public officials get elected because they satisfy their constituents. Among their constituencies are the special groups who want something from the Treasury. Many of them are on guard to protect their members from losing established privilege. They all wear the clothing of public interest. They are active in electing their man while the other citizen sleeps.

We bitterly fought special privilege in business. This idea of special privilege in groups is a more modern development.

There are probably 200,000 voluntary associations in the United States of some kind or another, most of which give voice for or against something of public importance. Except for the collectivists, they are one of the essential foundation piers under the American system of life. They perform millions of services in developing public understanding and public action. They also serve the country by neutralizing each other before the congressional committees.

The number of associations interested in increasing or preventing the decrease in Government expenditures is very small, probably not 50 of much consequence, but they are a powerful minority.

Nor do all these pressures come from the voluntary associations. The municipalities press the State governments and the State governments the Federal Government.

If such an unexpected thing were to happen as all these groups keeping their hands off expenditure questions and these reforms in government for 12 months, both in Washington and in the election districts, the Congress would do a great job not only in decreasing expenses but in the common interest of the Nation.

MORALS AS WELL AS ECONOMIES

There is something else involved in all this problem.

Out of the war, as from all wars, the Nation has had a spell of moral and spiritual sickness. It has been a period of great cynicism. With the lowered moral resistance of this period, unfair burdens have been placed on the people by particular groups. Too frequently do we hear a repetition of the excuse, "They got theirs; we will get ours," or Franklin's remark about "God helps those who help themselves."

But if Ben were alive today he would say, "Freemen were not created by drives of pressure groups on the Public Treasury."

CONCLUSION

Nations must inevitably suffer from their mistakes. But their survival depends upon their will, their courage, and their moral and spiritual fiber. If these qualities live, unbalanced budgets and ideological disputes can be but a passing froth on the surface. The rise of American civilization was out of a people of such qualities. It has been sick but it is not in its decline and fall. All around us we see signs of moral and spiritual strength in the oncoming youth.

There is a difficult word I could use here—atavism—that is, the latent qualities which we inherit from our ancestors. They are coming back. Such organizations as yours are their expression. In you lie our hopes and our confidence.

Senator Lyndon Johnson, of Texas, and the Preparedness Subcommittee

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. OLIN E. TEAGUE

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 30, 1950

Mr. TEAGUE. Mr. Speaker, those of us who have carefully followed the work of Senator LYNDON JOHNSON are very proud of his accomplishments as Chairman of the Preparedness Subcommittee which is a part of the Senate Armed Services Committee. His subcommittee has been interested in obtaining facts about our defense program and when by extensive hearings it is determined that some Government agency or official has made some error, the committee's only concern is to see these faults corrected and to avoid similar ones in the future.

Senator JOHNSON's preparedness subcommittee has demonstrated in many ways that it is after the facts and not the newspaper headlines. In several instances, I understand, some Government agencies or officials had been dragging their feet on some part of the defense program when they learned that this subcommittee was looking into their activity or lack of activity and this very fact has resulted in appropriate action being taken.

Mr. Speaker, it is the leadership demonstrated by Senator LYNDON JOHNSON and his subcommittee which will result in our Nation becoming militarily prepared and able to defend itself against Communist aggression.

Under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include the following editorial which appeared in the Fort Worth Star-Telegram entitled "Senator LYNDON JOHNSON: Man of Vision":

SENATOR LYNDON JOHNSON: MAN OF VISION

Pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD are replete with evidence that Senator LYNDON JOHNSON of Texas is a man of far greater than average foresight.

Since the trouble in Korea began, touching off our accelerated defense program, there have been many persons, in Congress and out, claiming to have known all along that our position was vulnerable. Some of these claims doubtless are justified; others are of questionable validity.

But there can be no question that Senator JOHNSON foresaw a long time ago that our defenses were weak. While the average American was pleading for curtailed Federal spending and reduced taxation, LYNDON JOHNSON, first as a Member of the House and later as a Member of the Senate, was pleading with his colleagues in Congress for greater military strength for America as the surest way of stopping Communist aggression and preventing war with Russia.

The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is a much-maligned publication, but it is a complete and accurate report of the proceedings in the House and Senate. What our Representatives and Senators say in debates on the floor of either House is taken down by stenographers and printed in the RECORD, making a permanent and indisputable record of each word uttered and each vote cast by every Member of Congress. Here are some excerpts from Mr. JOHNSON's speeches in Washington, as reported in the RECORD.

In the House on May 7, 1947, during debate on the bill to provide military and economic assistance to Greece and Turkey: "The one thing a bully understands is force, and the one thing he fears is courage. Human experience teaches me that if I let a bully of my community make me travel back streets to avoid a fight, I merely postpone the evil day. If Russia is not willing to stop, then now is the time for us to decide whether we will meet her, and meet her now."

On March 15, 1948, making an appeal for a 70-group air force, Mr. JOHNSON declared that "our air forces, including naval aviation, are today equipped largely with obsolete planes."

"How short is our memory," he said in conclusion. "How soon we forget. To make us less forgetful, somewhere there should be a tablet of enduring bronze and on it inscribed two columns of names in everlasting letters. Above one column would read the inscription: Here are the names of those who refused to prepare. Here are the names of those who voted to send our Army home. Here are the men who were frightened by our attempts to build a navy. That would be the heading of the first column. And on the other side would be eight short words: Here are the names of those who died."

In a radio address over a group of Texas stations on March 25, 1948, reported in full in the RECORD of March 29: "Russia today has more than 4,000,000 men in her army. America has 540,000. Russia is building 8,000 to 12,000 planes a year. America is building 1,800. Russia is spending $20,000,000,000 a year to make herself invincible. We are spending between $10,000,000,000 and $11,000,000,000. We are 322,000 men short of minimum peacetime needs. Some of our finest citizens say that in our atomic air age we won't need any foot-soldier army. I wish I could believe what they say."

In a speech to the House on March 31, 1948, during debate on the Rubber Act of 1948: "I do not feel that I can associate myself with this legislation which, in essence, is an order to the President of the United States requiring him to speed disposal of the Government's rubber properties, which I think are essential to the Nation's security."

On the following day Mr. JOHNSON told his colleagues that "the Red hands of communism are reaching out for the throat of freedom around the globe—in Europe, in China, in South America, and even in our land. What blunder was it that pushed us into two world wars? It was the blunder of doing too little too late."

On April 12, 1948, in another plea for "a strong Air Force—the strongest in the world," Mr. JOHNSON remarked that "the roar of airplane engines is more impressive than the guarded words of diplomacy."

In a statement issued to the press on February 13 of this year Senator JOHNSON declared: "If a guided-missile warfare should begin within the next 2 or 3 years, we, at our present rate, would be very feeble participants. For push-button war we have neither the push nor the button."

"Shall we gamble with security?" Senator JOHNSON asked the Senate on March 28 of this year. "The prudent man, instead of regarding the figures of our military men as excessive," he said, "would regard them as an underestimate."

The foresight which Senator JOHNSON demonstrated he possesses is a fortunate thing for the country. He is using it to good advantage in his new position as chairman of the Preparedness Subcommittee of the Senate Armed Services Committee.

The Korean war started on June 25, and the Johnson committee was created the latter part of July. Within a month the group, among other things, stopped the sale of four synthetic rubber plants which had been declared surplus before the Korean crisis and apparently had been forgotten by military planners. It also ended the disposal of aircraft parts at one Air Force base where there was evidence that similar parts were being bought elsewhere at higher prices.

In the present crisis America sorely needs men of Senator JOHNSON's ability, energy, and vision. Texas may well take pride in the fact that it is helping to meet that need.

Losing a War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. NORRIS POULSON
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, November 30, 1950

Mr. POULSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am inserting the following editorial from the Washington News which should be read not only by Members of Congress but also by members of the staff of the State Department:

LOSING A WAR

We are in one hell of a mess.

The United States is at war with world-wide communism, headed up in the Kremlin.

Our troops are fighting under the banner of the United Nations. But most other members of the world organization have given them only moral and token support, and much of it has been given grudgingly and then neutralized by back-seat driving.

And even that support may be withdrawn at any time.

American intervention against Red aggression in Korea was widely applauded as a brave stroke for world order. But when Red China moved to the support of the Korean Communists, the ardor of some of our fair-weather friends began to cool.

Now we are threatened by a new form of isolationism—one which may leave us standing alone against the Russian tide.

It's bad enough to be at war without dependable allies. It's even worse to be at war under leadership which refuses to see in that war anything but a "police action." Five thousand Americans have been killed in this war. How many more must die before our Government can be forced to face up to the ugly and dangerous realities of the situation?

Secretary of State Acheson told the Senate Foreign Relations Committee yesterday behind closed doors that everyone knew "damned well" that Moscow was behind the Chinese Communist intervention. Which everybody does. The Russian tanks and jet planes used against our troops left no doubt of that.

But, after admitting that Russia was behind the war her puppets are waging against us in Korea, what did Mr. Acheson propose to do about it? Nothing. For the time being, at least, he said, the United States would not hold Russia accountable.

That attitude is one of the reasons why we are in this mess.

The Chinese Communists invaded Korea on October 20.

The State Department first ignored the attack. Then Mr. Acheson joined the British foreign office in trying to buy them off.

Failing in that, President Truman personally held out the olive branch.

When that gesture was rebuffed, the United Nations rolled out the red carpet and virtually suspended business so that the Chinese Reds could send a delegation to Lake Success to attack the United States for the invasion of Formosa.

Even with 200,000 Chinese Communist troops attacking our forces on the Korean front, our Government, although charging the Chinese Reds with aggression, was not prepared to ask the United Nations to support that charge. It asked only for a UN resolution calling on the Chinese Reds to withdraw to their own side of the Yalu River—the very thing Mr. Acheson has been begging them to do since October 20.

This Nation cannot win a war under that kind of pussyfooting leadership. The men fighting in Korea can have nothing but contempt for it.

Red China is guilty of unprovoked aggression and should be so branded by the United Nations.

This is a made-in-Moscow war and Russia should be told by the United Nations to stop it, under penalty of expulsion from the UN if she fails.

The timid souls in the State Department will contend that we could not win support for such a demand.

Very well. We can put ourselves on record and we can find out what other nations we can depend on as this war continues. We are losing the war now because our vacillation has encouraged a drift toward appeasement that is rapidly becoming a rout.

If the United Nations cannot deal with Russia as determinedly as it did with North Korea, then the organization should be abandoned until the one-world idea has firm support instead of mere lip service.

Meanwhile, if the United Nations will not support the American troops fighting under its banner in Korea, our troops have no business being there. They should be withdrawn and held ready for the real show-down with the real culprit in this situation—Soviet Russia.

Regulation W

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EARL C. MICHENER
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, November 30, 1950

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, I have just returned from Michigan and while mingling among my friends and constituents I received many protests about so-called regulation W. In fact, I met with several groups of constituents, all of whom were injuriously affected by this regulation as now being administered.

I am in receipt of a resolution passed by the Lenawee County Automobile Dealers' Association, which conveys the position of the folks back home with whom I have conferred. This resolution does not ask for the abandonment of the regulation in toto but does urge that the time limit in which a purchaser may pay for an automobile be extended from 15 months to 21 months. This is not an unreasonable request and I hope that those in authority will give favorable consideration to it.

The resolution is as follows:

Whereas regulation W as presently administered is working a great hardship on automobile dealers, their employees, people generally requiring automobile transportation in connection with their employment, and the public in general; and

Whereas this organization is interested in the national defense and is willing and anxious to do that which is in the public interest; and

Whereas practical experience and a study of the situation convinces our group that said regulation W is too rigid and because of this rigidity will destroy its purpose: Therefore be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of this meeting that the Congress should immediately reconsider and make more flexible said regulation to the end that the over-all time in which a purchaser may pay for an automobile be extended to at least 21 months; be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be forwarded to United States Senators ARTHUR H. VANDENBERG and HOMER FERGUSON, Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C., and Representative EARL C. MICHENER and GEORGE MEADER, Congressman-elect, House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

Award of Posthumous Medal of Honor to Al Jolson

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LOUIS B. HELLER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, November 30, 1950

Mr. HELLER. Mr. Speaker, I should like to call to the attention of the House that on November 27, 1950, I introduced H. R. 9766 authorizing the President of the United States to award posthumously a Congressional Medal of Honor to Al Jolson, beloved entertainer and friend of three generations of Americans. It seems to me eminently fitting that Congress should bestow the highest honor at its command upon one who in the course of a long and colorful career upon the American stage gave wholesome pleasure to countless thousands. He was essentially a minstrel in the grand tradition. Every country has its folklore and its folksongs. Our foremost living dramatic critic once remarked, "I care not who writes the laws of a country so long as I may listen to its songs."

In Al Jolson was to be found a type of authentic genius which reflects the popular humor of the era and at the same time something of the yearning, the wistfulness, of the little man, the very humble citizen, who would fain reach out to a world of poetry and melody which he senses but to which he knows he can never attain save by the help of others. Stephen C. Foster, of course, is the most towering figure in the history of American minstrelsy but Al Jolson has his place, too. The beloved black-faced singer of the famous mammy song upon which millions of his countrymen hung year after year between tears and laughter; the world-famous central figure of The Jazz Singer which practically created the era of the talking picture, was a very important figure, indeed, in keeping up the morale of our troops throughout the last war.

After Pearl Harbor, Jolson immediately volunteered for war service. He toured every war front singing the old songs Mammy and Sonny Boy which, as had been the case with their fathers before them, he found to be the favorites with our troops from Alaska to the Southwest Pacific, from England to north Africa and from India to Brazil. While he appeared under the banner of the United Service Organizations he went out of his way to give independent performances to any post that could produce an audience of two people, always paying his own expenses. He was in Sicily soon after the first invasion barges.

Then came Korea. Once more the gallant old trouper responded to the call of duty. Flying halfway across the world the brave old minstrel gave 44 performances in 11 days. It was too much. His valiant heart could not stand the strain. He flew back to this country and died in San Francisco on October 23. He died as surely and as truly in defense of his country as any soldier in the front line.

So, as I said at the beginning, it seems to me fitting and proper that Congress should pay its lasting tribute to a true and noble patriot who will be forever enshrined in the history of the American stage and screen.

Address of Leon H. Keyserling

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, November 30, 1950

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, at the closing session of the National Planning Conference for Israel and Jewish Rehabilitation, Sunday, October 29, Mr. Leon H. Keyserling, chairman of the President's Council of Economic Advisers, discussed certain economic phases and conditions in the United States in 1950. I am sure many of my colleagues will find his views extremely interesting at this time. His address was as follows:

I am particularly glad that this is called a planning conference, because despite the aspersions that are sometimes cast upon the idea of planning, despite the idea that some people seem to think that the word "planning" is something for the totalitarians but not for the free people, I always like to recall that the really simple definition of "planning" is the one thing that separates most of all, the civilized man from the savage or the barbarian. The main difference between the civilized man and the barbarian is that the barbarian lives from day to day, and the civilized man has ideals and hopes and aspirations and plans for the future. That is the central difference between society and the dark days before there was organized society.

So I am very glad that the accent of this meeting is upon planning, upon the idea that however things may be today—and part of the picture day is good, and part bad—that we are concerning ourselves mostly with looking toward the future, that we are concerning ourselves mostly not with the idea that the future will represent simply the unraveling of circumstances beyond our control under some immutable laws, but rather that, broadly speaking, the future will be what we make it, that it will be, above all, what it is made by free men and women all over the world, using the instruments of freedom not for irresponsibility but for planning, for setting goals, high goals, ever-increasing goals, and seeking always to work together to achieve them.

For that reason I am glad, as I have observed in the press and elsewhere, that this conference is concentrating upon long-range planning, upon recognition that there is nothing magical about the day or the month or even the year, and that while none of us can see too far ahead in these parlous times, and while none of us can see a century ahead, we must look at least 3 or 4 or 5 or 10 years ahead to get our bearings and to be able to make our plans large enough and imaginative enough and realistic enough.

I do not think there is a conflict between being imaginative and being realistic. I think they are the two most closely wedded together things in the world.

We must look far ahead enough in this planning conference to realize that we must make big plans and long-range plans and have confidence that the future will give us the chance and the opportunity to carry them out.

I will, I suppose, despite my declarations to the contrary, have to say a few things about conditions in the United States, because, rightly or wrongly, that is one of the reasons why I was asked to be here with you today; and, while I want to say a few things mostly about economic conditions in the United States as a foundation for our thinking about the problems of Israel and other problems, perhaps I ought to say a word first and be even more presumptuous, to say something about the general international situation, not because that is my particular field, but because that is a field in which there are no specialists, because that is the field of everybody, because that is the field upon which we must all rivet our thinking if we are going to have an understanding of the underlying conditions underneath all of our economic problems.

Stated most simply, the new programs, economic in character, upon which the United States is now embarking, are not based upon the inevitability of a world war III. On the contrary, they are plans directed toward working our way, maybe slowly and painfully, but working our way, nonetheless, toward more assuring conditions of peace.

But while in that sense they are idealistic plans, they are also realistic plans, and that illustrates the close connection between the two. They are realistic plans based upon the experience which shows that we cannot have peace simply by hoping for it, that we cannot have peace simply by neglecting real problems, that we cannot have peace through appeasement or weakness but only through a build-up of the strength of the free peoples of the world to the point where they will be in a better position to act with firmness, to act with courage and resolution.

That is the road to peace.

I submit, without having the time to document it in the short time that I have to talk here, that all of the experience within the recollection of everybody within this room shows that the history of this century has indicated that that is the surest road that we can travel toward peace, and, in any event, it is the only road which a free people can choose to travel, because there is no alternative, neither the alternative of closing our eyes and falling asleep about the difficulties confronting us nor the alternative of thinking that we can settle them quickly and more securely by traveling the road to war.

We must travel that moderate, middle ground, trying surely and securely and substantially but gradually to build up our defense effort, in which we must work with the other free peoples of the world.

That has very important consequences for the American economy, and because it has important consequences for the American economy, it has important consequences for any thinking about the relationship between the people of this country and what they can afford to do with respect to assistance in the problems of Israel.

Some of you may recall that in 1949, at Atlantic City, at a time when many people in this country were concerned, when some were throwing up their hands about economic conditions on the ground that there was some softening of the economic situation, I appeared before you at the height or depth of the 1949 recession and said that not only in the long run but also in the short run, the economic prospects of the United States were very good, not only very good but better than they had ever been before—not only very good but prospectively better even than they had been in 1948, which was the all-time peak year up to that time.

I was not surprised that there were some who looked upon that with a raising of the eyebrows; perhaps there were some who even thought—very wrongly—that as somebody within the structure of Government dealing with economics, it was my job to go around the country beating up signs of optimism when none existed.

But by the middle of 1950, even before there was any effect upon the economy resulting from the quickening of defense activity following the outbreak in Korea, in the middle of 1950, even before then, it must have been very clear to everybody that that was the condition of the American economy, that the economy was not only stronger and more prosperous but also more stable than it had ever been before World War II, that the speed of the recovery from the modest recession of 1949 had been quick and reassuring and that by the middle of 1950, in terms of employment, in terms of levels of business activity, in terms of national income, in terms of any of the measurements that we might use, we had reached new peaks, peaks not only incomparably greater than any before the war, but greater than those reached in 1948; and if we had not had the change in the international situation, it would have become by then perfectly apparent that the law of the American economy was the law of growth, that the economy would not, could not be stabilized by standing still, and that in each succeeding year we were going to make new records of economic prosperity, of national income and of general economic well-being; because we have a growing population, because we have a limitless technological skill, limitless resources, because we have, with all its blemishes and defects, the best general economic system and I think also perhaps the best political system that the mind of man has yet put into application on a large scale, although there are defects, and we are going ahead from year to year doing better and better.

Under those circumstances, it seemed absolutely inconceivable to me and still seems absolutely inconceivable to me that any economist, inside or outside of the Government, should have the temerity to stand up here and try to make a case for whether or to what extent or how we can afford to continue responsibilities already assumed and responsibilities becoming larger because the problems are larger.

The only kind of argument that can be relevant to that question would be on the part of those who say, "Haven't we done so much in the past for so long a period of time that we must look forward to a cessation in the near future?" And I say to you in all sincerity that anybody who says that seems to me to be neglecting the first law of life, and first law of history, which is that there is no end to problems; there is no end to responsibility.

The only question is whether we have reached the end of our capacity to live up to our responsibilities. And if we have reached the end of our capacity to live up to our responsibilities, then we are indeed in a shabby state and would be creating a sore spectacle before the free peoples all over the world, a spectacle on the part of the greatest, the richest, the most powerful Nation of peoples in the world, not only now but in the outlook for the future.

The effect of the defense program, since it is a substantial but gradual build-up in the cause of peace, is going to have a substantial effect upon our economy. It is going to make it necessary for us to pay higher taxes; it is going to make it necessary for us to—I don't like to use the words "do without" because whenever I use the words "do without" I again think vividly of the contrast between our condition and that of peoples anywhere else in the world, that when we talk about doing without a narrow fringe of luxuries which people in other countries have not even begun to dream of having or enjoying.

Although we may have to pay somewhat higher taxes—in fact will have to pay somewhat higher taxes—and will have to do without some of this narrow fringe of luxuries that anywhere else in the great world are unknown, nevertheless the power and strength of the American economy are such that I believe that after that increasing burden is borne, and as it helps us to work our way to a more pacific situation, we will have more left over for other purposes year by year than we have had in 1948 or in 1949 or in 1950.

What I mean to say in another way is that the increasing productive power of our economy and its expansion in the years ahead will be able to absorb the increasing defense burden which we are assuming in the interest of ourselves no less than of others, and will leave over enough for us to enjoy standards of business activity, standards of living which by any prewar tests in our own country—and certainly by any test of comparison with any other nation in the world—are so high and will continue to be so high that the test will be not what we can do but whether we are awake to what we must do.

Just to give you one example of that—and then I am nearly through—since I talked with this group or part of this group in Atlantic City a year ago the national output on a yearly basis, the national production, that is, the measure of the creation of our wealth in the United States, is well over $20,000,000,000 a year higher in annual rate than it was when I last talked with some of you.

Just think of it: Within the space of a year or less than a year we have increased our annual national income, we have increased our annual production of goods and services by one-third of our total national income in an average year and by many times the total wealth or the total national income of most other countries in the world.

When we think about that, and when we think that that is merely the result of a normal and steady rate of economic progress in the United States, which will be repeated again and again in the years ahead, I do not see how we can look to figures for any test as to whether we shall be able to bear larger responsibilities than we have in the past. It is simply a measure of how we face those responsibilities.

As I understand the situation with respect to Israel, Israel is moving economically into a situation where it is gradually transforming from a country engaged in rescue and relief to a country engaged in the upbuilding of its economic strength and resources.

Now, that is a broad generalization, and it is not 100 percent accurate, because there is still need for rescue and relief, and there will continue to be, and many great economic efforts toward economic strength and building up have already been accomplished, as some of the other speakers have indicated much better than I can, but, broadly speaking, something is occurring which is tremendously heartening, something which is tremendously inspiring, that within a period of time which is very short in the annals of history, within a period of time which is immensely short, even compared to the history of the United States—and we think of ourselves as a young country—this new nation of Israel is gradually moving from a relief and rescue operation to an operation where it is concentrating upon problems of economic development, upon problems of making itself self-supporting, upon problems of becoming stronger and stronger, so that it can carry more and more of the responsibilities which it itself is assuming.

Now that is all very well and all very good, if we don't allow it to mislead us, if we don't allow it to mislead us in the belief that because Israel is attempting to stand on its own feet—and I am sure will—we should not be misled into believing that because it is standing on its own feet it can stand alone.

No nation in the world, no free nation in the world in these times can stand alone. The United States is standing on its own feet, but the United States of America cannot for a moment stand alone in these times, and if anybody in this country thinks that we can, if anybody in this country thinks that we do not need help—not precisely the same kind of help, but help nevertheless—from the other free peoples of the world, the kind of help that every partner gives to every other partner, although some may be senior partners and some may be junior partners, he is terribly mistaken.

When they are all standing and working together, they must be mutually helpful, and anybody who thinks that we do not need that help has a fundamental misconception of our problems here in the United States.

By the same token, if we here in the United States cannot stand alone, certainly none of the junior partners in the sense of being younger, in the sense of being smaller, in the sense of being weaker—and I do not mean that in any critical or invidious sense; I am simply describing the conditions—certainly they, standing on their own feet, cannot be asked to stand alone; and therefore our responsibilities in the United States, for a continuation—even if all circumstances change—of help to those countries, to help them stand on their own feet, is becoming even more imperative today than it ever was before; and that help, I suppose, will take two forms: that help will take the form of the kind of aid which has been granted in large measure in the past and also will begin more and more to take the form of investment, begin more and more to take the form of participation, not in a rescue and relief operation, but participation in that more heartening in some ways, more promising for the future, effort to build up the economic strength of the State of Israel.

In that effort I am sure that American Jews, and others, I hope, too, but primarily American Jews, realizing the economic conditions in this country, over here, realizing the largeness of the problems of the future, realizing that all must stand together, will find that that opportunity for that kind of participation—and I like the word "participation" better than "aid"—will find the opportunity for that kind of participation even more stimulating, even more challenging than the opportunity which has existed over the last few years for participation in an operation more in the nature of rescue and relief.

And as we go ahead with that, let me say, in conclusion, that I think that the greatest contribution our thinking through the centuries has made to the progress of the world has not been primarily in the area of economics, has not even been primarily in the political area, but has been primarily in the moral area, has been primarily in the realization that, no matter what state of development civilization happens to be in at any particular time, the final solvent of its problems, whether military, defense, economic, or political, is moral leadership, a sense of righteousness.

Never in the history of the world, and certainly never within the history of this country nor in the memory of anybody within this room, was the crucial importance of moral leadership so acute as it is at this time, when the free nations of the world are seeking to protect themselves and to win their way through in the face of a mess which I happen to think is greater than any that we have faced at any time in the past.

And it is because we, as inheritors of the Jewish tradition, can take particular pride in that aspect of moral leadership, and because we can realize that as citizens of the United States we are participating in a national endeavor directed toward primarily the execution and embodiment of that moral leadership which must be transformed into economic action, into political action, into material action to be effective, that it seems to me that there is no way by which we can so fully demonstrate what this is all about, of our acute realization of our historical role in this process, as by continuing on an increasing scale, the increasing scale which our resources make feasible and which must be matched only by our realization of our ability to do so, on an increasing scale, as American Jews, proceed both with the rescue and relief operation and with the new and potentially more important economic development and strengthening operation on the fullest scale to which our sense of responsibility can carry us, because wherever we may be carried by our sense of responsibility there can be no question in the minds of sensible and realistic men and women that we in the United States have the material ability to meet whatever goals our moral judgment may lead us to set.

Still Up to the Doctors

OF
HON. JAY LeFEVRE
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, November 30, 1950

Mr. LeFEVRE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Indianapolis Times of November 17, 1950:

STILL UP TO THE DOCTORS

The American Medical Association set aside and presumably spent $1,100,000 this election year on an advertising campaign calculated to deliver a knockout blow to the Truman program for compulsory health insurance.

Doctors as individuals, and their wives, were active in many State contests, seeking to defeat candidates they considered friendly to socialized medicine. This found them working mostly for Republicans against Democrats, since the health-insurance plan is an administration project.

The Republican gains at the polls last week undoubtedly afford considerable satisfaction to the organized doctors. In at least two contests where they waged an intensive fight, the candidates they supported won, and in dozens of others they contributed materially.

Net result is that, along with other Truman domestic programs, compulsory health insurance is likely to be a lost cause in the Eighty-second Congress.

Nevertheless, a timely warning to the medicos came this week from one of their profession. Dr. Hamilton W. McKay of Charlotte, N. C., retiring president of the Southern Medical Association, addressing a St. Louis meeting of the organization, spoke sharply to his colleagues.

He warned them that if they did not clean their own house they would lose their professional freedom in this country. Too many doctors are bunglers in their relations with patients and with their communities, he added. And:

"If the people cannot convince themselves that organized medicine is taking vigorous steps to correct its own shortcomings, they will insist that the initiative for action be transferred to other hands."

Doctors have done a sorry job of self-discipline, Dr. McKay charged. Once a practioner got his license and joined a county medical society he was practically fixed for life, even though he might overcharge, neglect his patients, and ignore the art of human relations.

"Our competence," he concluded, "is being weighed against the American standard of competence in other professions. Our charges are being weighed against the budgetary demands of other services which are essential to life in America."

Dr. McKay's advice is sound and sensible. This newspaper has opposed the Truman health-insurance plan—but not without repeatedly urging the doctors themselves to take the lead in correcting conditions that prompt support for that plan.

They would be fatuously shortsighted to sit back now under the illusion that they made decisive and permanent political gains in the recent election.

Colton Union High School, Colton, Calif., Wins Freedom Foundation Award

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HARRY R. SHEPPARD
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, November 30, 1950

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. Speaker, at Valley Forge, Pa., on October 28, 1950, Colton Union High School, Colton, Calif., was awarded the Freedom Foundation's highest award for its work in furthering the American way of life. This award consisted of a beautiful gold medal encased in plastic and a library of books and other educational materials dealing with the American heritage.

Representing Colton Union High School in receiving this award were the district superintendent, a teacher and a student, whose expense-paid trip from California to Valley Forge for the ceremony was a part of the award from the Foundation.

Freedom Foundation was organized in the spring of 1949, as a nonpolitical, nonsectarian, nonprofit group, set up to encourage others to speak up for freedom.

Schools throughout the nation were invited last spring to submit materials used in the curriculum and student life. In selecting schools for the award, judgment was based on the philosophy on which the foundation is chartered: "To create and build an understanding of the spirit and philosophy of the Constitution and Bill of Rights and of our bundle of indivisible political and economic freedoms inherent in them." "To inspire love of freedom and to support the spiritual unity born of the belief that man is a dignified human being, created in the image of his Maker, and by the fact possessor of certain inalienable rights."

Young people in Colton Union High School are offered a wide diversity of courses and co-curricular activities created to train them for effective living in America. To promote intercultural unity as part of the pattern of freedom and the American heritage, Spanish courses are taught by Mexican-American teachers. These Spanish-speaking Americans, through personal and academic leadership in the classroom and through a large and effective organizaton, the Mexican Youth club, are constantly working to build a somewhat confused racial minority into responsible citizens in our democracy. Courses and organizations for homemakers are built on the principle that sound homes are the arsenals of free government. Here young women are learning that to create homes in which American heritage can be preserved and passed on is woman's greatest destiny.

For four weeks each year every major department of the school works together on an intensive study of the Constitution of the United States. Every student writes and delivers an essay on the Constitution. An all-school contest from which winners may go to county, State, and national contests is held and awards are presented by the American Legion. While this is a national contest, few schools realize 100 percent student participation as does Colton Union High School.

Social studies and history classes emphasize the basic principle of democracy, that good government can be achieved only by the active participation of an informed citizenry. Understanding of the past is stressed as a tool of enlightenment and guide for the future.

Student service clubs, an active student governing body, athletic programs where sportsmanship as well as competition is stressed, music festivals, public speaking and dramatics activities, a system of counseling and guidance, and participation in an interschool student congress are a few of the student experiences that prepare the Colton boys and girls for democratic living. A series of vocational trips for seniors are also arranged to afford an opportunity for each pupil to see the worker at work under regular working conditions. By means of this visit to the plant or office the boys or girls are acquainted with the job opportunities and the opportunity of the job within the local area. They learn at first hand what qualifications and training are necessary for the job.

In spite of agencies seeking to completely eliminate moral and religious teaching from the curriculum of the public school—the program of Colton Union High School operates on the principle that belief in God, as the fundamental principle of freedom, must continue to be taught, as it is found in our great songs, great documents, our currency and the lives of the founding fathers. By helping students to apply the principles of moral standards to their problems of daily living, the school seeks to guide young people in orienting themselves to adult standards of right and wrong. School discipline is based on a merit system which offers an opportunity to earn awards through desirable citizenship. Student concern with group conduct is stimulated by privileges and penalties which have been set up. Any conduct unworthy of a good school citizen results in the loss of merits. A fair hearing by impartial student and faculty representatives is given to those who feel that justice is not done. Through the actual life situation of having to earn privileges and assume responsibility for his own action, each student, we believe, achieves a realistic understanding of adult behavior.

In every phase of the school's activities, youth in Colton Union High School have opportunity to learn about democracy and the American way of life and to function as young American citizens. In addition to the traditional three r's, this school maintains that young people need to know and to practice respect, responsibility, and reason.

Last Call To Improve on Excess Profits

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THRUSTON B. MORTON
OF KENTUCKY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, November 30, 1950

Mr. MORTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Louisville Courier-Journal:

LAST CALL TO IMPROVE ON EXCESS PROFITS

It is interesting to see American businessmen protesting against a specific form of taxation but entirely willing to accept higher Federal taxes. That was the message carried to Washington last week by Louisvillians Thomas Graham and George Eggers. They went up to tell the House Ways and Means Committee what they thought was wrong with the proposed return to an excess-profits tax. But, as Graham put it, "industry realizes it must pay the cost of the present national emergency."

This approach deserves plenty of attention from Congress. The "lame duck" session knows it must adopt a stiffer tax program, but it will not hurt to wait long enough to consider what American business thinks about the excess-profits tax. It would be the easiest tax to put on the books, since it simply returns to a method followed in World War II. There is grave doubts, however, whether it would be the easiest tax to administer, or the fairest or most efficient.

The Louisville businessmen rounded up the arguments against the excess-profits levy. It is inflationary, since it fosters loose spending by corporations that would rather throw the money around than pass it on to the tax collector. It is inflexible, in that it requires the adoption of a base period which may be fair to some industries and unfair to others. It is, above all, destructive to small business and to new business. It is not merely an emotional matter to protect the new and smaller enterprises. America needs a constantly expanding industry in order to meet the Soviet challenge to our strength. Our economy can't stay healthy if new businesses can't spring up and prosper.

Graham and Eggers spoke for the Louisville Chamber of Commerce and for American business groups in general. Their points were well taken. The only weakness to the American business position is the lack of an adequate tax program to propose as a substitute for the excess-profits tax. The time is short. If the business world can act quickly and decisively, it may still save the day.

Bureau of Mines Research May Save Millions on Manganese

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLAIR ENGLE
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, November 30, 1950

Mr. ENGLE of California. Mr. Speaker, the Federal Bureau of Mines at its ferro-alloy research branch at Redding, Calif., is conducting research on manganese requirements for steel which may aid the stockpiling program for manganese immensely.

In the manufacture of steel about 14 pounds of manganese is used to produce 1 ton of steel ingots. This country is producing approximately 100,000,000 tons of steel a year at the present time. This means that about 700,000 tons of manganese is used yearly for the production of steel. Most of the manganese used in steel making is imported, there being very little domestic production. Up until a year or two ago most of the Nation's manganese requirements were imported from Russia. Recently our shipments from Russia have been greatly curtailed so it has been necessary to obtain our manganese supplies elsewhere. Manganese, being so important in steel making is a strategic material so stockpiling is necessary in order that we have sufficient material on hand in case of war.

Manganese is used in steels for three purposes all independent of one another:

First. Manganese is used to react with the iron oxide present in molten steel. The manganese oxide formed is principally removed with the slag.

Second. Manganese is used to combine with the sulfur always present in steel to improve the hot forging and rolling characteristics.

Third. Manganese is used as an alloying element to produce steels that are used for such items as crusher plates, railroad frogs, dredge buckets, and dipper teeth where resistance to abrasion is required.

In peacetime less than 5,000,000 tons of manganese steel are marketed per year and during World War II only about 15,000,000 tons were used. Other alloying elements might be substituted to produce such steels.

For use in deoxidizing steels, other elements which are available from domestic sources, such as aluminum or silicon, may be used.

This leaves the one necessary use of manganese that of controlling the sulfur present in the steel. There appears to be no correlation between the amount of manganese used and the concentration of sulfur in the steel. It is known that steel containing a small amount of sulfur will require less manganese than a steel containing, say, 0.05 percent sulfur.

Metallurgists consider that the sulfur in steel is originally combined with the iron and is in the form of iron sulfide. When the molten metal solidifies, the iron sulfide separates from the solidifying iron and forms thin films of iron sulfide on the grains of iron. When such material is hot forged or rolled these thin films form planes of weakness and the metal breaks apart.

The addition of manganese to steel reduces the "hot shortness" or "red shortness," thereby enabling the metal to be hot-worked. Manganese is outstanding in its power to combine with sulfur. It generally forms as separate globules which have a much less adverse effect on the hot working properties of steel. No other element appears to possess this unique property of preventing "hot shortness."

The purpose of the experiments being carried out at the United States Bureau of Mines laboratory at Redding are to determine just how much manganese will be required for a steel with a known sulfur content. Such experiments are of necessity long and tedious and are beyond the scope of the problems solved by steel companies. The problem is of vital national interest. In order to carry out the tests quantitatively the starting materials must be uniform composition.

I understand that at Redding the starting metal is practically pure iron, with an analysis of less than 0.001 percent phosphorus, manganese, and silicon. As the carbon content would probably effect some of the physical constants of the steels produced, I understand that the experiments are being conducted on material whose carbon content is between 0.20 and 0.30 percent.

I recently visited the laboratory and saw some of the preliminary work being carried out on steels containing no manganese but on which the technicians had varied the sulfur content. A unique method has been devised for testing the hot working characteristics of the steels which have been made in the plant. Rods are twisted at a uniform rate at several temperatures. I saw rods containing 0.002 percent sulfur which broke after about 50 turns and rods containing 0.015 percent sulfur which broke after only three or four turns. The experimenters told me that they were unable to forge manganese-free steels that contained more than 0.015 percent sulfur. I was informed that steels will be made containing varying amounts of sulfur and also varying amounts of manganese. With additions of manganese the sulfur content of the steel may be raised several times above 0.015 percent and still be hot worked.

When this problem is completed it will be possible to determine exactly the manganese requirements for a steel of any sulfur content. If the Bureau of Mines tests indicate that the amount of manganese additions may be lowered to the point where only 6 or 7 pounds will be required for each ton of steel, a stockpile of manganese that would last for 5 years would be extended to 10 years or more, or a 5-year stockpile of manganese would require one-half or less shipping space. The completion of this one problem alone should increase our self-sufficiency enormously.

The Story of the Plot To Communize America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, November 30, 1950

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include the following article from the Detroit Free Press of October 23, 1950:

THE RED RUSSIAN CONSPIRACY—THE STORY OF THE PLOT TO COMMUNIZE AMERICA

This is a brief outline of the long struggle against communism in America.

Sixteen years ago, Dr. William A. Wirt, superintendent of schools in Gary, Ind., and a widely respected educator, wrote a letter stating that he had learned from unidentified brain trusters of what was on foot. He quoted them:

"We believe we have Mr. Roosevelt in the middle of a swift stream and that the current is so strong he cannot turn back or escape from it. We believe we can keep Mr. Roosevelt there until we are ready to supplant him with a Stalin. We all think Mr. Roosevelt is only the Kerensky of this revolution."

The reading of this letter to a congressional committee and its subsequent publication caused a tremendous sensation.

A special House committee of three Democrats and two Republicans summoned Dr. Wirt to prove his statements.

Wirt told of one dinner party at which were several Government employees and the Washington correspondent of Tass.

All were called before the committee.

All ridiculed Wirt as Hiss ridiculed all his accusers.

Congressman J. J. O'Connor, Democrat, New York, threw the gallery into a gale of laughter by asking one of the ladies if she had ever planted a Red flag on the Capitol. She paused, as if trying to recall past events, and then replied that she could not recollect ever having done so.

The man toward whom Dr. Wirt pointed the finger of accusation most directly was Rexford G. Tugwell, Assistant Secretary of Agriculture.

All attempts by the Republican minority to get Tugwell and other suspected brain trusters before the committees were blocked as was done by TYDINGS in the Amerasia case.

Wirt was a fool, an alarmist, a troublemaker, a red-herring trickster.

That was in 1934.

Thus early was the pattern of concealment set. Thus early, too, was the atmosphere of public opinion so poisoned by subtle Communist propaganda that millions of Americans were ready to believe the worst of Wirt and all others who were to follow.

Two years later George N. Peek quit the Department of Agriculture and wrote a book in which he stated that he had attended numerous parties given Rexford G. Tugwell, at which this fair-haired boy of the Roosevelt entourage openly boasted of how they were planning to make America into a Socialist state.

Whittaker Chambers' accusation of Alger Hiss led to the uncovering of one plot to which Wirt had called attention.

The central figure in it was Harold Ware, a son of Ella Reeve Bloor, whom the Communists have canonized as "Mother" Bloor.

Ware was ordered by Moscow to set up Communist cells in various Government departments.

Ware's prize find was Lee Pressman.

Pressman was assistant counsel for the AAA in the Department of Agriculture from 1933 to 1935. He became the dynamo of Washington Cell No. 1 of the Communist Party, which also included John Abt, Nathan Witt, Charles Kramer, Alger Hiss, and others.

Cells were also formed in the State, Treasury, War, Labor, Commerce, and other departments.

When the Nye investigation opened, Hiss became counsel of the committee.

This gave Hiss a chance not only to assassinate characters, and stir up dissension in this country, but also to get his hands on a lot of defense information for Moscow.

John Abt and Charles Kramer, two other members of the cell, became counsel and investigator, respectively, of the La Follette committee.

Pressman was one of the principal authors of the Wagner labor law, which put Red union leaders above and beyond the laws of the United States.

The second step was to have Nathan Witt appointed general counsel of the NLRB, which administered the Wagner Act.

The third step was for Pressman to become general counsel for the CIO in 1936. He was known as Phil Murray's "brain."

The inside story of the plot might never have been known if in 1948 the Un-American Activities Committee of the Eightieth Congress had not listened to Whittaker Chambers' confession.

Chambers' exposure of Alger Hiss' activities as a Soviet spy in the State Department appeared to most uninformed Americans as grotesque and impossible as Dr. Wirt's story had seemed 14 years before.

The day Hiss appeared before the committee to defend himself President Truman snapped the lock on the files that would have aided his conviction.

Then Mr. Truman denounced the committee's investigations as a "red herring."

The statute of limitations had interposed to save Hiss from prosecution for transmitting Government secrets to a Soviet espionage ring.

A Federal Grand Jury indicted him, though, for lying in connectoin with the charge.

Yet even then the administration tried to shield him by delaying the trial until it could be brought before a judge sneaked on to the bench by Truman against the protests of the five bar associations. The jury disagreed.

At the second trial Hiss was convicted, and sentenced to 5 years in prison.

Secretary of State Dean Acheson still stands by him.

The administration had done its best to cover up for Hiss and had been beaten by an indignant Congress, an aroused public opinion, and an honest judge.

The same Congress, following public sentiment, enacted the Taft-Hartley law, which restored the balance in labor-management relations that Lee Pressman's Wagner Act had destroyed.

Also, it denied the services of the NLRB to unions whose officers did not file affidavits that they were not Communists.

President Truman vetoed the bill in a wild and incoherent message believed to have been written for him by Pressman. Then he went on the air and attacked the bill in an even more violent speech, also said to have been written by Pressman.

What alarmed Pressman about the Taft-Hartley law was that it killed his racket.

With the Communist invasion of Korea under way, and public opinion in this country aroused, Pressman got scared.

He resigned from the American Labor Party.

Then he appeared before the Un-American Activities Committee and testified August 28, that in 1934, while in the AAA, he had joined the Communist party.

Caught in the toils of Whittaker Chambers' testimony in 1948, Pressman went on to identify, as fellow members of his Washington cell, John Abt, Nathan Witt, and Charles Kramer.

Abt, Kramer, and Witt, as well as Pressman himself, had been cited before the House committee in August 1948, and had stood on their constitutional rights.

Two years later, facing the possibility of a stretch behind a barbed-wire fence, Pressman "sang."

Now let's go back to 1934.

That was the year Pressman joined the Communist Party with Alger Hiss and many others.

That, too, was the year when Dr. Wirt sounded his warning.

The same pattern of cover-up and concealment has been pursued by the administration ever since.

The Amerasia espionage case of 1945, involving 1,700 Government documents found in possession of a Communist-front outfit in New York, was hushed up, then was whitewashed by a Democratic Congressional committee in 1946 and again by the Tydings committee this year.

The refusal by President Truman to open pertinent files in Senator TYDING'S trial, not of Senator MCCARTHY'S charges of communism in the State Department, but of Senator MCCARTHY himself, followed the precedent of obstructing justice he set in 1948 in the Hiss investigation.

The McCarthy charges remain unproved, and undisapproved, for the simple reason that the administration has the evidence and will not produce it in court.

The McCarran anti-Red law is not perfect, and probably no Representative or Senator who voted for it thought it perfect. It needs many changes.

They passed it and repassed it over President Truman's veto because of his consistent record in blocking efforts to expose the Communist plot in this country and to protect the Nation from it.

The herd of Communists agents that have come to light would still be working underground if a bipartisan Congress had not lifted the stone under which they were crawling in their treasonable slime and held them up for the Nation to look at.

At the polls on November 7, the American people, if they know where internal security lies, will send to Washington another Congress that will kick in more doors and drag out what is hiding behind them.

The last chapter in the story begun by Dr. Wirt in 1934 has not been written yet.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, November 30, 1950

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, the career of the Reverend Father James Leo McGovern, S. J., of Boston, Mass., as a priest-instructor in colleges and high schools for 50 years, in honor of whom his many friends, both clerical and secular, recently paid him, and properly so, great honor. In recognition of his achievements as a revered leader of youth in spirit and mind, I take pleasure in submitting, for inclusion in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, the following poem by his lifetime friend, James Patrick McGovern, of the District of Columbia bar:

FIFTY YEARS A TEACHER

(By James Patrick McGovern)

Fifty years a teacher of our youth!
What dedicated heart and steadfast mind
Can serve so faithfully the love of truth
With beauty and with holiness entwined?
Your students, sons and daughters, rise
As leaders with the lore you taught the soul,
Champions of the freedoms which we prize,
Crusaders whom in God's ranks you enroll.
How many minds you lit with wisdom's rays,
How many hearts you warmed with hope and peace,
In countless crises and in myriad ways,
Which in futurity will find release.
What nobler mortal mission can there be
Than Christ-like teaching half a century?

Hon. Sam Hobbs, of Alabama

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LOUIS E. GRAHAM
OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 30, 1950

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Speaker, when at the opening of the session, 435 Members are brought together, many for the first time, curious indeed are the reactions and sensations. Then when committee assignments have been made and Members come in close contact with their fellow committee members these feelings are intensified. So after 12 years' service on the Committee on the Judiciary we come to the parting of the ways with our good and true friend SAM HOBBS, of the Fourth District of Alabama, who voluntarily retires at the close of this session.

Personally, I shall always remember SAM HOBBS, with the most affectionate feeling. From the very inception of our association, he has been a guide, counselor, and friend, and no man could be a more devoted friend than he.

Blessed with a kindly spirit, an unfailing sense of humor, a great reserve of good common sense, and an intense desire to be of help, no man has served his State, the Nation and his fellow man with greater honor and distinction than has SAM HOBBS.

The law has been his first love and zealously has he applied himself to its study and application of its principles to the manifold requirements of our modern life. Today, upon the statute books of our country there are many laws, which bear the handiwork and reveal the deep erudition of this very able and distinguished man.

His departure from these Halls will be sadly missed. First elected to the Seventy-fifth Congress he has served continuously in this body since that time.

A forceful debater, well grounded in his knowledge of the facts and the law, he was indeed a formidable opponent and one worthy of the best steel of any man. Yet he was always kindly, gracious, and considerate. Never did he resort to any cheap tricks, and the pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD are replete with his splendid contributions.

One of the wisest counselors in committee, he was particularly able in the drafting of intricate legislation. And in the writing of reports he had no superior. Some of the finest reports that have ever come out of the Committee on the Judiciary have been the handiwork of this truly able man. He will be sorely missed.

So in bidding farewell, to this old and good friend, I do so, with a deep sense of personal loss. I shall miss his kindly presence, his wise suggestions, his helpful admonitions, and above and beyond all this, the gentle spirit of a splendid Christian gentleman and true patriot.

The Workingman Is Waking Up

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRED L. CRAWFORD
OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 30, 1950

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, throughout the United States certain labor leaders have, during recent years, in my humble opinion, gone far afield in their attempt to dictate to Members of Congress how they should vote and for whom they should vote. Time and again in my public utterances and written statements I have pointed out that the rank and file members of the unions, in a great many instances, exercised their own judgment and voted just as they pleased and without being influenced by the labor leaders.

I am reliably informed that the arrangements between the Democratic Party and the labor bosses did not work as they planned, indicating the labor leaders were not able to deliver the votes of individual members and their families. Apparently 14 labor-backed candidates for the United States Senate were beaten. The CIO-PAC campaigns, especially in Ohio, Colorado, California, and Illinois, just did not get anywhere in their extraordinary effort to stigmatize Republican candidates and to make rank-and-file union members believe that their salvation rested in the election of only Democratic candidates. There were 16 Republican governors up for reelection and these men were victorious and Republican governors were elected in six other States. The outcome in Michigan has not yet been positively decided.

The independence on the part of union members is as it should be. If the day ever comes when organized labor, as such, as represented by the two great labor unions—the CIO and the A. F. of L.—take the position that their only chance for fair and decent treatment is through the activity and protection extended by a certain and specific and single political party—whether Democratic or Republican—that will be a sad day for organized labor, and for all of our citizens generally. Our type of government just does not operate in any such manner. It has never so operated and let us pray that it never will.

For the benefit of those who are interested in this general subject, I submit for the Appendix of the RECORD the following editorial which appeared in the Washington Times-Herald, November 28, 1950:

CATCHING ON

The CIO public utility workers have made a great discovery. It is that a man is better off, more independent and nearer his own boss when he is working for a private employer, than when he is on the Government payroll.

Consequently, they are now leading the fight against a Government monopoly of electric power.

Last week in Chicago the politicians in charge of the CIO's resolutions committee had a hard time sitting on the utility workers' proposal that the whole CIO condemn the use of taxpayers' money to push that monopoly. The CIO politicians, who work hand in glove with the Federal monopolists here in Washington, may as well face the fact that they are fighting a losing battle.

The workingman is waking up. He is coming out from under the ether. He is catching on.

Under the management of the union politicians, the workingman has been led right up to the trap of Government ownership for all the means of production and distribution, a state of things sometimes called socialism, fascism, or communism, and all the time meaning bad news for the independent working citizen.

Now the public utility workers, struggling to escape, demand of other workers, "How would you like to have your jobs taken over by the Government?"

LABOR GOES REPUBLICAN

Which calls to mind some remarks made a few days ago by Representative GEORGE H. BENDER, Republican of Ohio. Mr. BENDER, who is a six-term Member of the House and chairman of the Cuyahoga County, Ohio, Republican organization, said:

"Organized labor has been boycotting the Republican Party during recent years in the mistaken belief that the Republican Party is hostile to the interests of the working people of our country.

"It is evident from the results of the election that the rank and file of labor organizations do not share this view. Obviously, large numbers of working men and women voted for Republican candidates and were in part responsible for our election.

"I have asked repeatedly that responsible labor leaders participate in the work of the Republican Party in Cuyahoga County. Our organization has invited them to serve as members of our executive committee and with our advisory committees. * * * I hope that the leaders of organized labor will accept this invitation to be represented within the Republican Party."

Mr. BENDER'S invitation is wise as it is generous. It comes after an election which small minds might take as an occasion for vindictive pursuit of beaten opposition. The election mentioned is, of course, that of Senator TAFT. Never in the history of current times, so far as we can recall, has there ever been a more open and plainly decisive contest than the senatorial race in Ohio.

Mr. TAFT won it with the largest vote ever cast for Senator in Ohio's history.

Now he is back in Congress for another term with a record indorsement from the rank and file of Ohio's labor, given against the pressure of union politicians.

Mr. BENDER could take advantage of that to start revolts within the unions. He does not. He merely invites all union leaders to come on in, meet the Republicans and see what they have to offer.

THE IDEA OF LIBERTY

What is that? It is an idea of government which speaks—and acts—to keep the citizen free and independent. If you want an example of it, ask the CIO public utility workers. They know.

Is it a good idea? It is if you believe in government as a servant of the people, and if you are opposed to the principle of making people servants of the government. The idea can be expressed after all, in just one word—liberty.

The rank and file of labor has caught onto it and so goes Republican. How soon will the union leadership catch up with the rank and file?

Graduation Address by James A. Farrell, Jr., New York State Maritime College, Fort Schuyler, Bronx, N. Y., Wednesday, September 27, 1950

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. EUGENE J. KEOGH

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 30, 1950

Mr. KEOGH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include the following address, delivered by Mr. James A. Farrell, Jr., at the graduation ceremonies at the New York State Maritime College, Fort Schuyler, Bronx, N. Y., on Wednesday, September 27, 1950:

Admiral Leary, Fleet Admiral Halsey, trustees and faculty, members, parents, and friends of the graduates, gentlemen of the class of 1950, my heartiest congratulations go to each and every member of this distinguished class, in equal share to those whose technical and academic achievements vary from the least to the greatest, in equal share to the prize winners and those whose degrees and tickets were hardest won. You are the end product of a great tradition and a great school—a school which over the long years has trained and developed outstanding leaders in American merchant shipping, outstanding men in peace and war, men who have made their mark at sea and on shore. You have joined a fraternity of alumni of which you may be proud, and which I know is proud to welcome you.

It is my own observation that among American nautical colleges or academies, New York State most nearly approaches the essential balance between form and substance; between the military and civilian approach; between the curricula and extracurricula; between theory and practice. Over the years, it has been my privilege to associate with merchant officers of many nationalities and varied backgrounds; but, in the zest for continued study, in zeal for professional advancement, and in pride of cloth, none excel your predecessors. This is a heritage of immense and lasting worth.

You, gentlemen, are about to exchange a life of order lived in historic, familiar, and solid surroundings for a life in a disordered world, to be lived in an atmosphere of blind uncertainty and in a future unpredictable as to peace or war, beneath impending doom of atom and hydrogen, the scientists' modern and shameful sword of Damocles. If you are not confused, you stand alone above the rest of us. If the complexities are not awesome, your adjustment is extraordinary, and yet it is sure that you will not be overcome by the disillusion inherent in our present situation.

Disillusion is dispelled by hope, and hope is the flower of the seed which is faith. All seamen have faith or gain it—faith in a supernatural control of forces beyond other control, and faith in their fellow men. It is impossible to despair, no matter what the odds, no matter what the danger, when one has had the stars to guide him through the long night watch to the golden dawn, or has experienced the climatic stilling of the tempestuous sea and the gentling of the raging wind just as the ship was all but overwhelmed. To have been a member of a ship's company among men of every color, race, and creed, men of many origins, is to learn that more men are good than evil, and that the forces of good in the end prevail. So, while we know that the making or avoiding war is man decided, even so a just war must be justly won. So also must we believe that the horrendous forces of fission are as safe in the hands of the law-abiding as is armament, and as dangerous in the hands of the lawbreakers as are smaller and better-known weapons. The problem is of degree, intensity, and morality and not alone that of so-called scientific advance.

One cannot, of course, rationalize away the danger of the present conflicts. The conflict is hot in Korea, warm throughout the Pacific perimeter, and no longer cold in Europe. But war is not inevitable. If the Western World speaks out, if our strength is greatly developed and made absolutely clear to the aggressors, and if social justice, individual freedom, and free enterprise are practiced in the west while being fostered in the east, I am convinced peace is assured. In the interim, your daily life and desired occupations may be interrupted. You may be called upon to take your place alongside other seamen in combat fleet and supply train. That your service and special training can be of immeasurable service has been demonstrated twice in one generation and evaluated as of first importance, equal to any, by General Eisenhower, Admiral King, and Winston Churchill.

But, it is not so much the matter of war and war service that is of paramount interest to you and me. Rather, it is the hoped for peacetime service of the American Merchant Navy and the individual part you, as graduates of this fine school may take in it.

That I am convinced there can and should be a bright future in American flag shipping must be obvious by my own active participation in the industry, both as a part of management and as an investor. That such a future is assured is by no means certain. In spite of a cyclical United States history of over 100 years as a sea power, in spite of the cruel and unnecessary lessons of two world wars, in spite of the advance of this country from the position of international debtor to international creditor, and in direct contradistinction to the pledge and purpose of the Merchant Marine Act of 1936, the period January 1, 1949, to June 30, 1950, marked a steady decline in American participation in world trade. That it did not take place sooner was due to a short-lived shortage of ships in the merchant fleets of the other major maritime powers. That the decline has been temporarily arrested is due entirely to the current need to support our Armed Forces in Korea, Japan, and western Europe.

The causes of the decline are manifold, the panacea not yet discovered. Among the causes still existing are, overtonnaging of trades, and the world-wide dollar shortage. Overtonnaging would have been tempered by a more judicious disposal to overseas buyers of surplus American tonnage. The dollar shortage could have been ameliorated by an extension of ECA funds and shipping controls to colonial governments and a more ardent prosecution of the Federal stockpiling program. Overtonnaging (at least as far as dry cargo liners are concerned) can still be met by an international shipping congress convened among the maritime nations, in which both government and shipowners can participate. At such a congress, the extremely unsatisfactory problem of flag discrimination, stemming from intense nationalism, can be discussed in the light of the United States tradition of nondiscrimination and freedom of the seas and ports.

However, the most important need of the American merchant marine today, and the one most vital to its future, is the continuous, day-to-day, prompt and full implementation of the Merchant Marine Act of 1936, by the Federal Maritime Board and the Federal maritime authority.

Under the recently adopted Presidential Reorganization Plan No. 21, the executive branch responsible to the people and to Congress for the promotion and development of a merchant marine was placed with the Secretary of Commerce and revitalized. A Chairman and two Commissioners of outstanding ability and integrity, in whom all interests concerned, the taxpayer, the Government, labor and management have implicit confidence, have been appointed.

It remains to be seen if, as I firmly believe will happen, the newly manned Federal Maritime Board can and will forthwith take a strong hold of its own staff to see that: That which has to be done is done daily; the obligations respecting contracts and determinations are fulfilled and on time; that the work of the Commission is not hamstrung by other agencies; and, in particular, that the policies and appropriations of Congress be not diluted by the influence of other departments whose responsibilities may be many, but do not include the welfare of the American Merchant Marine. You, gentlemen, are directly concerned and should be alive to the necessity of prompt and complete implementation of congressionally determined policy respecting shipping legislation. If by delay and dilution the Merchant Marine Act of 1936 is made ineffectual, then your peacetime livelihood is at stake, our peacetime commerce is threatened and our national security imperiled.

It could be that a few individuals employed in staff positions by certain important Government bureaus prefer to have our commerce move in foreign ships or in Government-owned ships. But irrespective of individual opinions, our Congress has spoken long and loud and clearly.

As to your own part when you ship, may I recommend that your study continue and that your technical skill be further developed. In particular, I suggest that you devote your best talents to the care and supervision of cargo, and the maintenance of the vessels in which you serve and their machinery and equipment. Were I asked to compare the prewar merchant officer with his postwar counterpart, I would say that the prewar man was deficient in theory and strong in practical application, while the postwar man has radically reversed the combination. Perhaps your group and generation will bring both necessities into better balance.

It is conceded that no subject is quite as delicate as labor-management relations, and were I more discreet, I should avoid touching thereon. I do, however, have some non-controversial thoughts which may be of some assistance. Due in large measure to my great respect for seafaring men as professionals of the highest caliber, labor unions as we know them have never seemed to me to be adequate representatives of licensed personnel. But, be that as it may, the law so recognizes unions and you will be importuned to join them and managers are required under certain conditions to recognize unions as your representatives. Accordingly, it seems to me of the greatest importance that where unions can and may represent you, all of you, should take a most active interest in union policy making and elections in order to guarantee that those who do bargain on your behalf are first qualified to do so, qualified in national and educational background, and do in fact represent the men at sea as fully as the men on the beach and that unions not be permitted to alienate the sympathies and understandings that are sine qua non between companies and their own seagoing licensed personnel.

Perhaps from my opening words you may have inferred a note of sympathy towards a group of your age and occupation advancing into a new and troubled era. Such an inference of pessimism is neither intended nor warranted. What I was really disguising was great envy. At your age and with your training and attainment I should like to advance with you upon man's common enemy, the days ahead, so sure am I of your successful future. Congratulations.

Address of Secretary John W. Snyder

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 30, 1950

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, at the recent National Planning Conference for Israel and Jewish Rehabilitation, held in Washington during October 27–29, and attended by some 1,200 Jewish leaders from all parts of the country, Secretary of the Treasury John W. Snyder delivered a significant address on Friday, October 27, the opening of the conference. He said:

I feel greatly honored at the invitation to join you today at the beginning of this National Planning Conference for Israel and Jewish Rehabilitation. I am happy to add my personal good wishes to the welcome which has been accorded the distinguished representatives of the Government of Israel who are with us today.

The large number of organizations and individuals who have come together from all parts of our own country for this conference are evidence of the encouragement which every true American is anxious to render the cause of democracy and freedom in other lands. To every American, the new state of Israel has been an inspiring example of the achievements which can be realized through the pioneering efforts of a free people determined to forge a strong nation.

Israel is one of the newest nations to join the freedom-loving peoples of the world. But from the earliest days of their history, its people have stood for moral and spiritual strength. They have stood for the dignity and freedom of the individual. And of equal importance, their leaders have stressed the responsibilities which each individual must accept if he is to be worthy of membership in a free society.

These are the ideals which have been the hope of men everywhere in their long struggle to break the bonds of tyranny and dictatorship. These are the ideals which inspire the peace-loving peoples of today in their joint battle to preserve the peace and to promote friendly relations between all nations.

For hundreds of years the democratic nations of the world have struggled, each in its own way, to preserve freedom and to achieve strength through the voluntary, cooperative efforts of individual citizens. In our country, and elsewhere in the world, it has been successfully demonstrated that an economy which provides ever-increasing benefits to the common man can be achieved without autocracy. It can be achieved through the individual efforts of a free citizenry, united in faith, in will, and in determination to promote the welfare of all.

The events of this year, however, have demonstrated a further truth. They have made it clear to all of us that responsibility for the common good must be a governing principle of international relations as well as the guiding light of domestic policies. As President Truman stated on October 24, the idea of an association of nations able to keep the peace has lived as a dream in the minds and hearts of men for many years. But it is only since the founding of the United Nations in 1945, and particularly since the decisive action taken by the United Nations in June of this year, that this dream has made a significant advance toward reality.

Through its membership in the United Nations, the State of Israel, which came into being as an independent nation only a little over 2 years ago, has already played a significant part in the struggle of the free world against aggression. In a cable on July 2 to the Secretary General of the United Nations, the Foreign Minister of Israel pledged full support to the Security Council in its efforts to restore peace in Korea. This pledge was immediately followed by the tangible offer of such things as medical services and supplies for the forces of the United Nations engaged in Korea.

Israel has undertaken a vigorous program in support of individual freedom and peaceful progress. The plans for irrigation, for afforestation, for swamp drainage, for soil improvement, for agricultural development, for schools and highways and transportation facilities, for the encouragement of settlements in areas formerly considered barren—all of these things recall to Americans our own pioneering days. Every American has watched with great interest as the new State of Israel has tackled and begun to surmount its tremendous economic problems. All of us have been impressed by the progress which has already been made toward the rehabilitation and advancement of their country.

Possibly the most inspiring thing about the rehabilitation program is the high goal which has been set for individual, community, and national effort. The leaders of Israel have taken up the challenge of proving that in the East, as in the West, ever-increasing benefits for the common man can be combined with political freedom and the protection of human rights. Despite tremendous problems, internal and external, Israel has been able to record important progress in strengthening its economy during the short period of its independent life.

To take only one example of a problem which had to be met, and met quickly: The inflow of homeless people from other lands has resulted in a population increase of 50 percent in the space of about 2 years. This would be comparable to increasing our own population by 75,000,000 in a similar period of time—and increasing it, moreover, through immigration, with all of its attendant problems of adjustment and assimilation.

Quite aside from these special difficulties, the mere increase in production needed to keep pace with the unprecedented population growth posed a tremendous problem. It is not surprising that Israel, in this short period, has been unable to win completely its race with time. But it has made great steps forward.

I am told that agricultural output, on the average, has risen 50 percent in the current farm year as compared with 1947–48. The number of cattle has increased by one-third; poultry numbers and the number of eggs produced have more than doubled; and milk production in 1950 is greater by almost one-fifth than it was 2 years ago. The area devoted to vegetable cultivation is twice as great this year as it was in 1948, and the acreage on which cereals are grown has increased by more than 175 percent during the same period.

These gains reflect in part the heroic efforts of individual settlers, groups of settlers, and the Government of Israel to develop water resources in areas which have been neglected and barren for many hundreds of years. The record of irrigation and water development during the resettlement period is in itself one of the most dramatic chapters in the modern history of the Middle East. Each year, further progress is recorded and new areas are transformed from desert land into productive soil. Each year, Israel moves further toward a food output which will provide a large share of its own needs and at the same time produce a surplus of agricultural specialties for export. This goal is of particular importance, of course, in view of the need for finding ways of solving the present urgent trade problems.

While the agricultural gains of recent years have been outstanding, industry, also, has been forging ahead. The rate of increase has been slowed down by the need to import raw materials and a large part of the necessary machinery. But factory output has nevertheless registered a steady advance. Industrial production, according to recent reports, has increased by more than 20 percent in the past 2 years.

This record of progress in agriculture and industry is particularly noteworthy in view of the complex and difficult problems which Israel has had to face during this period. The very fact that domestic output of needed commodities has been steadily increasing has had a stabilizing effect on the economy of the new nation. The citizens of Israel have confidence that their growing national production will effectively safeguard the economic integrity of their state. And we who have watched the achievements which have been made to date can share in that confidence.

When we turn our attention from the urgent problems of the present and look toward the future, the opportunities which lie ahead of Israel appear almost limitless. If firm and lasting peace can be achieved—in the area of world politics and in the smaller orbit of the Middle East itself—this strong, young nation can play an important role in the advancement of the entire area of which it is a part. With further intensive development of its exceptional mineral resources, its potentialities for specialized agriculture, its sea and air routes to other lands, and above all, its abundant supply of human skills and human resources, Israel can look forward to a secure and prosperous future.

In the troubled world of today this may seem like a distant dream. But the progressive and forward-looking leaders of Israel have already evidenced their determination to build up the economic strength of their own country. They have shown their will to promote the larger goal of greater peace and greater prosperity within the family of nations. They have evidenced their faith in the economic future of the region which embraces their homeland—an area already rich beyond measure in its heritage of cultural and spiritual values.

But for Israel, as for every other nation in the world today, the opportunities of the future wait on our ability to achieve a lasting peace. We have learned that we must work unceasingly for peace. We must be prepared at all times to defend it. But we must meanwhile never relax our faith that arms may some day be supplanted by peaceful negotiation. It is only then, as President Truman has said, that men in every land can devote the full measure of their inventiveness, their energies, and their resources to creative effort. It is only then that the nations of the world can join together in fufilling the great vision of the Promised Land for all men—a land of plenty, and a land at peace.

Remarks of Secretary of Defense Marshall at the Graveside of General Pershing

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HOWARD W. SMITH
OF VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, November 30, 1950

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, among the many solemn and noble words spoken on Armistice Day 1950 none served better to recall the inception of our annual commemoration of our military dead than those of Secretary of Defense George C. Marshall at the graveside of Gen. John Joseph Pershing, who won the armistice we once thought insured a lasting peace.

Ties of friendship bound General Pershing and General Marshall. Their association and their friendship dated from the days before World War I, and continued through World War II. Standing at the graveside of the general he had once served as aide, General Marshall typified the millions of Americans who have fought for our country in two catastrophic World Wars; but he typifies also the spirit of self-sacrifice that patriotic and freedom-loving Americans must continue to maintain and devote to the cause of security and peace. George C. Marshall, honorably retired from active military service, has been the President's Special Ambassador to China, Secretary of State, chairman of the American Red Cross, and is now Secretary of Defense.

General Marshall is also General Pershing's successor as Chairman of the Battle Monuments Commission. In that capacity, he spoke of the work of the Commission in caring for the overseas resting places of deceased veterans, and of the memorials being erected to commemorate their heroism and their sacrifice. General Marshall's reference to the men who have died in Korea, was a solemn and a sad reference to the fact that war has not yet been outlawed, and other sacrifices will yet be required to insure our national security and the liberties which are our inalienable rights.

In facing the dark future, we should be heartened by the example of General Pershing himself. "General Pershing," said General Marshall, "left a lasting impression on our Army and also on our people. He was a great soldier, without evasions, cool and determined in time of crisis and capable of tremendous power of command and control."

Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I insert in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD Secretary Marshall's solemn reminder of the task our Nation faces.

Secretary Marshall's remarks follow:

This ceremony this morning is of deep personal significance to me because I was closely associated with General Pershing when he commanded the First Army during the San Mihiel and Meuse-Argonne battles. Later, after the cessation of hostilities, I became his aide and served him for 4 years.

When I returned to Washington in the summer of 1938 to become Deputy Chief of Staff of the Army and later Chief of Staff, I saw the general frequently; as a rule, regularly about once a week, and talked over the critical world situation or the progress of hostilities in which for a time we were not engaged.

General Pershing left a lasting impression on our Army and also on our people. He was a great soldier, without evasions, cool and determined in every crisis and capable of tremendous powers of command and control.

On his death I succeeded him as Chairman of the Battle Monuments Commission. He devoted the last 20 years of his life almost exclusively to the direction of the work of that organization in establishing our national military cemeteries abroad.

As Chairman of the Battle Monuments Commission, I am concerned with the final resting places of our deceased veterans in sacred plots of ground all over the world. There are 22 such cemeteries overseas, and in each we have erected, or are in process of erecting, a beautiful chapel containing a permanent graphic record in stone, bronze, and mosaics of the achievements of the American forces who fought in these regions. Memorial references are included for those tens of thousands of missing or unidentified dead to whom the tragedies of war denied a known and honored burial. Their names will be inscribed on the walls for all to read.

These memorials will serve to remind the peoples of Europe, Africa, and the Far East that American men fought, bled, and died side by side with their own sons to make life more abundant for all of us.

These chapel tributes to the heroism and sacrifices of our men and women are national in character and therefore far more enduring than any individual could provide. They are the product of the finest work of the most noted architects, sculptors, artists, and landscape authorities in this country. As a Nation we are entrusted with the honor of perpetuating these shrines and keeping them always beautiful.

Each year official representatives of our Government and of the governments of the friendly countries in whose lands our men served and died, visit these cemeteries. Thousands of visitors from home and abroad also visit the cemeteries, especially during the summer months. These visits will be in increasing numbers when all the splendid structures and plantings are completed.

Armistice Day this year has for us unusual significance. Earlier occasions were marked by special homage to those who gave their lives in the First World War, and later to the fallen in the recent world conflict. November 11 this year we are also doing honor to 4,000 or more of our men who recently gave their lives in Korea, and today at this very moment other names are surely being added to this list of sacrifices in our behalf.

Each of these casualties represents a precious life, precious to the individual and precious to his family and friends. We can do nothing to restore life to these men, but we can keep faith with them, remembering and honoring their sacrifices and doing our very best to support the ideals they courageously represented. They will not be forgotten. Their Government will see that their last resting place is kept beautiful and peaceful, and a reminder to all peoples that we believe in the dignity of the individual and stand ready to make any sacrifice in defense of his inalienable rights.

Panama Celebrates Its Forty-seventh Anniversary of Independence

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARK W. THOMPSON
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, November 30, 1950

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. Speaker, on November 3, 1950, the Republic of Panama, amidst traditional Isthmian ceremonies, celebrated the forty-seventh anniversary of the birth of that nation, the independence of which was proclaimed on November 3, 1903.

As the attainment of independence by Panama was an essential chapter in the history of the Panama Canal, the forty-seventh year of independence takes on added significance because of the enactment of Public Law 841, Eighty-first Congress, approved by President Truman on September 26, 1950.

This law, which creates a Canal Zone government and the Panama Canal Company to replace the existing predominantly military organization, is—in large measure—the fulfillment of a historical cycle. It is by far the most important act of Congress concerning the Canal since the Panama Canal Act of 1912. Based, as it is, upon treaty relationships between the Republic of Panama and the United States in what is a unique diplomatic set-up affecting the affairs of the Canal Zone, it is especially fitting that the forty-seventh anniversary of Panama's independence be more widely recognized.

To that end, I am extending my remarks to include the following editorial published in the Panama Star and Herald of November 3, 1950:

ON OUR FORTY-SEVENTH ANNIVERSARY OF INDEPENDENCE

Today the Republic of Panama reaches another milestone in its national life; today we celebrate the success which attended the efforts of the Panamanians of 1903 to reestablish the independence of the Isthmus and confirm the existence of a Panamanian nationality.

On November 3, 1903, at 5 p. m., the young manhood of this Isthmian capital literally poured down Central Avenue from Santa Ana Plaza and down what is today Avenue "A" on their way to the Plaza de Arms, now known as Plaza de Francia, there to acquire the necessary arms with which to uphold the independence of the Isthmus proclaimed by the leaders of Isthmian public opinion, and to make a supreme effort to recover the political independence which the Panamanian of 1821 effectively secured from Spain on November 28 of that far away year.

The movement for independence was spurred by events in Colombia which threatened the possibility of the interoceanic canal being built at Panama. The Panamanians acted to challenge Colombia's right to continue the sacrifice of the centuries-old wish of the Panamanian people that a waterway between the two oceans, across the American continent, should be built here at Panama.

In the face of Colombia's rejection of the Hay-Herran Treaty, virtually sealing the doom of the Isthmian transit, the Panamanian people reasserted their right to self-determination and resumed the direction of their own destinies. And Panama had every right to independence, because in 1821 she shook off, unaided by any of the other nascent American nations, the yoke of Spanish colonial misrule.

The forty-seventh year of independence finds us still struggling, still trying to establish our economic independence which we acknowledge is a vital part of our national independence as a whole. Economic independence is just as important as political independence for any nation, big or small.

That is why, on this day of such great significance in our national life it is proper that we also devote a few moments to mediation on the responsibilities that rest on our collective shoulders for the future growth and prosperity of our nation.

What is our record, briefly?

The opinions of a vociferous few notwithstanding, our Nation has earned—and still is earning—respect for itself abroad, despite its sometimes difficult dealings with its powerful neighbor, the United States. In that field our country stands alone because no other nation in the world has had to cope with the unique problems that our privileged geographical position has created.

In our internal political life the road still is long. There still is too much petty politics. We are still too prone to settle our family quarrels by force or by skulduggery, and we cast aside constitutions with too much ease and too little regret. We have yet to learn to respect the other man's opinion and to grant to others the sincerity and the good faith that we proclaim for ourselves.

But we have done very little, almost nothing, to achieve self-support. It is not that it cannot be done. It is simply that we have not tried as diligently as we could. We, particularly some of our present generation, have just begun to think about it. Restless voices have pierced the wilderness. But we have yet to grasp the fundamental fact that this independence from want cannot be achieved overnight by one generation; that it is an unending task for this and for all the generations to come.

Beyond our terminal cities which live off the Canal and such transient tourist trade as may develop, we have done little to develop our rich interior—that vast portion of our country we forget through the year except on the occasions of patron saints' festivals or when the vacation season rolls around. Yet, it is in that unexploited land, its virgin forests, and its up-to-now primitively tilled fields, that the Nation's real independence—its economic independence—lies.

The challenge is there. May the succeeding anniversaries of our independence find our Nation moving along the road to independence in the fullest meaning of the word. But it must be a continuing action, not subject to the vagaries of politics and its enervating spoils system. To achieve this progress we must strive ever to have the right man in the right job, and not try to fit around pegs in square holes.

Hawaii's Voting Record Among Best in Country—Territory's People Alert to Responsibilities of American Citizenship

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH R. FARRINGTON

DELEGATE FROM HAWAII

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 30, 1950

Mr. FARRINGTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I present herewith an excerpt from a letter by Urban Allen, member of the editorial staff of the Honolulu Star-Bulletin, containing an analysis of the voting record of Hawaii's citizens as compared with those of the States.

The excerpt from the letter follows:

In the November 5, 1950, issue of the Detroit Free Press, Publisher John S. Knight wrote a very forceful editorial on the number of Americans who are not exercising their right of franchise.

He published a table, State by State, showing how each voted in the 1946 off-year election. The best record was made by Montana, where 64 percent of persons of voting age cast their ballots. Only 10 of the 48 States were able to muster a majority of eligible voters at the polls.

Hawaii has long been proud of its voting record. We regularly have more than 60 percent of our registered voters take part in our elections, and in some counties the figure goes to 90 percent or higher.

However, registered vote and persons eligible to vote are two different things, so I asked the Bureau of Statistics of our Territorial government to give me an estimate of the number of people in Hawaii who are eligible to vote.

They reported the number as 187,558. For our general election this year we had 141,319 registered voters. This is 75.3 percent of the estimated number of eligible voters.

(I might say that many recent arrivals from the mainland have not transferred their registrations from their home States. If Hawaii were granted statehood, they undoubtedly would reregister here, as most of them retain mainland registrations, when they can, to be able to vote in Presidential elections.)

But, back to our statistics. Of our 141,319 registered voters, 118,704 actually voted. Territorial percentage of better than 80, and a percentage of voters to persons eligible of 63.3 (just seven-tenths of 1 percentage point behind the Montana turnout of 1946).

When I look at the turnout of such great States as Ohio (44), California (36), Iowa (35), and Maine (31), I am more than ever proud of our record here.

South Carolina reported only 26,000 out of 992,000 eligible voters going to the polls, a percentage of 3. Mississippi did better, 4 percent; Louisiana had 7; Georgia and Texas 8; Tennessee 11; Alabama 12; Florida 13; and Arkansas 14.

I was happy to note that Wyoming, where I enjoyed a pleasant visit in 1946, is well up among the leaders, with a 48-percent turnout in 1946, but still not quite up to Hawaii's record.

Of course, these statistics do not prove that the quality of democracy is better here than it is on the mainland, but they do show, I think, that we, by and large, take our government a great deal more seriously than the average mainlander. What is more, I think we take a greater personal interest in it, not only at election time, but throughout the year.

Why Not Be Consistent?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. NORRIS POULSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 30, 1950

Mr. POULSON. Mr. Speaker, while the President is asking that Congress saddle on to the necks of the landlords the subsidizing of millions of tenants throughout this country, he is at the same time sanctioning the subsidizing of a small group of potato growers at a rate far in excess of last year. The tragedy is that the landlords are the only segment of our population who are to do the subsidizing. The Government does it in all other cases. Why? Because there are few votes among the landlords. I am not appealing in behalf of the landlords as much as I am on the basis of equal justice. If it is necessary that the tenants be subsidized, the Government should take the load. Personally, I think we should stop a lot of this subsidizing.

I am inserting this article out of the Washington Post which in itself should sicken you on potato subsidies and make you realize what a travesty it is to ask the small home owner to subsidize someone who, in all likelihood, is making more money than the small home owner is.

The article follows:

TWENTY-SIX MILLION SEVEN HUNDRED THOUSAND BUSHELS—UNITED STATES DOUBLES RATE OF SPUD DESTRUCTION

(By John Ball)

So far this year the Agriculture Department has destroyed enough potatoes to meet the normal needs of the inhabitants of 16 States for a year.

Bureau of Agriculture Economics figures show that Americans each eat about 105 pounds of potatoes a year. About 26,700,000 bushels of potatoes were destroyed under the Government farm price support program up to November 15, enough to feed all the people for a year in Oregon, Nebraska, Colorado, Maine (the biggest potato State), the District of Columbia, Rhode Island, Arizona, Utah, New Mexico, South Dakota, North Dakota (another big potato State), Montana, Idaho (the home of the big potato), New Hampshire, Vermont, Delaware, Wyoming, and Nevada, with some left over for Kansas.

The potato destruction this year is running at a rate more than twice that of a year ago, Agriculture Department figures show. Up to November 15, 26,700,000 bushels had been dumped. A year ago on November 15, only 10,700,000 bushels had been thrown away.

Although the net cost per bushel to Uncle Sam is less than half last year's cost, the total crop cost is running far ahead. Until November 15 the cost this year was about $20,000,000, with the unit cost going up. The price Uncle Sam is paying under the support program has recently jumped from around 70 to 80 cents a bushel. Last year it was approximately $1.40—it varies in different areas, and the total had reached about 15 million bucks.

The whole program last year was $83,798,000. That's a lot of money in anybody's bank account, but it was small potatoes compared with the 24 million plus the 1948 crop cost.

It develops, too, that that wasn't the total cost of the 1948 program, big as it is. Agriculture Department potato men last week were trying to get some alcohol makers to take a lot of potato starch, made by the Government out of surplus Maine potatoes that year, that Uncle Sam still has on his hands.

This month's Commodity Credit Corporation's catalog, listing the surplus commodities CCC has for sale, shows about 6,100,000 pounds of potato starch in storage since 1948, somewhere in the Boston area.

Reports from Boston indicate that the Boston area is an Army warehouse there, but Army officers won't give out any details about the hoard of potato starch, declaring it is to be a military secret.

CCC is offering the starch for sale at two prices. For export the price is $5.10 per 100 pounds, freight at shipside, Boston. For domestic users, the price listed is $4.50 per 100 pounds, f. o. b. Maine shipping points.

Domestic distillers, in spite of the dangerous shortage of alcohol, have turned down the offer. First they are afraid the starch may be deteriorated due to its long storage, and second, the price is too high to make alcohol. It takes 13 pounds of starch to make a gallon of alcohol. At that price for starch, a gallon of alcohol would cost around 65 cents, without any other expenses—and that is more than alcohol will bring, even when sold to the Government.

The story behind the starch stored at Boston is interesting in itself. In 1948 there was a potato shortage in central Europe, but it wasn't feasible to ship whole spuds there. So the Army got a brilliant idea to ship potato starch and flour. They used 30,000,000 bushels of potatoes and made 347,000,000 pounds of flour and a few million pounds of starch for Germany. But the Germans didn't like it. It wasn't cooked. The potato flour they make is cooked. What was left of the potato flour was distributed domestically, and the starch stored in Boston.

The Agriculture Department would like to get rid of that potato starch stored in Boston. Then, maybe, they can forget about the 1948 potato scandal.

"That Harmony of Purpose Which Is Essential to Our Security in the Years To Come"—Remarks of Secretary of Defense Marshall at the Unveiling of a Monument Erected in Arlington Cemetery in Recognition of the Outstanding Services Rendered by Sir John Dill to the United Nations

OF
HON. HOWARD W. SMITH
OF VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, November 30, 1950

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, on Wednesday, November 1, in the Arlington National Cemetery, Secretary of Defense George C. Marshall spoke at the unveiling of a monument to Field Marshal Sir John Dill, who was the senior British representative on the Combined Chiefs of Staff at the time of his death, November 4, 1944. It was to the dedication of this monument, I may remind this House, that President Truman was going when two misguided fanatics made the shameful attempt on his life. The name of Sir John is familiar to many Members of Congress. Shortly after his death the Seventy-eighth Congress passed the joint resolution that recognized the burial of a foreign national in Arlington, and the outstanding services rendered by Sir John Dill to the vital cause of British-American military cooperation and to the United Nations.

In words as felicitous as any it has been my privilege to hear, Secretary Marshall spoke of the man who was his friend and intimate associate during most of the World War II years. He quoted the tribute of President Roosevelt on the day after Sir John's death: "Sir John made an enduring contribution toward the victorious conclusion of the war and also to that harmony of purpose which is essential to our security in the years to come."

Mr. Speaker, harmony of purpose existed and, thank God, continues to exist between our Nation and the nation of Sir John Dill. Harmony of purpose must bind together the countries in the North Atlantic community and the members of the United Nations. Harmony of purpose must bind together the Members of this Congress, and all who have at heart the security of the United States.

The monument of Sir John Dill is a monument to the spirit of cooperation that is as essential as the spirit of sacrifice to the winning of victory. American friends have made this monument possible because they appreciate that the things Sir John stood for were things that were good for America. Collective security under the North Atlantic pact represents an extension of Sir John's ideals.

Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I insert in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the remarks by Secretary of Defense George C. Marshall at the unveiling of the monument to his friend.

The remarks are as follows:

Here before us in Arlington Cemetery, among our hallowed dead lies buried a great Englishman, Field Marshal Sir John Dill. He was my friend, I am proud to say, and he was my intimate associate throughout most of the war years, commencing with the historic meeting at Argentia in Newfoundland, in August 1941.

He gave his life in the service of his own country and of this country and for the hopes of all free peoples. On the morning following his death, President Roosevelt, in making a posthumous award of the Distinguished Service Medal, characterized his services in part, in these words, "Sir John Dill made an enduring contribution toward the victorious conclusion of the war and also to that harmony of purpose which is essential to our security in the years to come." It was these last words referring to "that harmony of purpose which is essential to our security in the years to come" that moved a group of the American leaders in this war, Fleet Adm. Ernest J. King, General of the Army Henry H. Arnold, myself, and others to undertake the erection of a memorial to Sir John. But more especially we wished to commemorate down through the years and in a manner that would meet the eye of thousands of Americans, the vast importance of that harmony of purpose between Great Britain and the United States which is so essential to our security and the peace of the world in the years to come.

The Congress of the United States established a precedent in passing a joint resolution recognizing the burial of Sir John in this national cemetery and the outstanding services rendered by him to the United Nations.

For those who did not have the good fortune to know Field Marshal Sir John Dill and for those who did not have the rare opportunity of working with him, I wish to say here today that in my opinion, and I know in the opinion of others intimately associated with the conduct of the war, his influence was greater than that of probably any other individual in welding together the military forces of our two countries. It was this complete accord that more than any other single factor gave us the victory in Europe.

I have never known a man whose high character shone so clearly in the honest directness of his every action. He was an inspiration to all of us in those trying days, and I think it is peculiarly fitting that this memorial to his memory should stand prominently at this crossroads where the avenues bearing the names of Roosevelt and Grant converge. It is especially fitting that the road to the Tomb of the Unknown Soldier should pass within a few feet of this statue, for it will enable the thousands upon thousands of Americans who annually visit this shrine to pause for a moment and read the resolution of the Congress and the citation of President Roosevelt in testimony of a great service rendered our two countries and its importance to us in the future.

Captain Cal-y-Mayor

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HARRY R. SHEPPARD
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, November 30, 1950

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include the following news release by Lester Healey, of the California Electric Power Co.:

BISHOP, CALIF.—California's three-year-old rainbirds may be flying south any day now. Their destination is Mexico, because Mexico is badly in need of additional water.

Five years ago the United States allocated by law 7,500,000 acre-feet of water annually from the Colorado River for Mexico. To put this water to its utmost beneficial use, our good neighbors to the south have constructed the Moreles Dam on the lower Colorado, making available water for the development of thousands of additional acres of agricultural land in a rapidly growing, newly developed area.

The ever-increasing population with the demands for land development, and the luxuries that electric energy can provide, surrounds the problem of obtaining more water to be put to beneficial human use.

An American public utility, California Electric Power Co., which has served sections of Mexico with electrical energy for the past 25 years, has opened the "good neighbor" door and a new hope for additional Mexican water.

At a recent power conference in Mexico City, Gilbert C. Delvaille, vice president and general manager of Industrial Electrica Mexicana, S. A., Mexicali, B. C., hearing of Mexico's water plight, mentioned casually to the Mexican power commissioners that the California Electric Power Co. had been increasing its water needs "with a P-38."

Briefly, Delvaille told the commissioners of the company's 3 years of successful cloud nucleation in the High Sierra of California, where California Electric operates a large network of power plants.

Mexico City, the commissioners reflected, has a similar power plant set-up, including Ixtapantonogo and Santa Barbara plants, and the Tingambato, construction on which starts next January. These comprise the Sistema Hidro-helectric Miguel Aleman. The mountains that tower above these reservoirs are 15,000 feet in elevation, making the watershed similar to the 14,000-foot range of Bishop's High Sierra where the American power company's experimental program has been so successful.

An immediate invitation was extended, by President Albert Cage of the California public utility, to Mexico to study the cloud-seeding and "rain-making process."

Mr. Cage explained that for the past 2 winter seasons, his company's P-38 has been engaged in dry ice bombardment of reluctant cloud formations over the towering Sierra peaks, and has successfully pinpointed "bonus" snowstorms in a 5- by 20-mile area of the Bishop Creek watershed.

During the winter months this dry-ice artificial nucleation of High Sierra clouds, has netted an annual estimated bonus precipitation of approximately 6,500 acre-feet, capable of generating 14,300,000 kilowatthours of electricity annually, Mr. Cage related.

Alejandro Paez Uriquidi, director of the Commission Federal De Electricidad of Mexico, took immediate steps that his country might learn the full process of artificial cloud nucleation. He has assigned one of his country's top air force pilots and engineering men to handle the task.

First Capt. Julio Cal-y-Mayor of Mexico City, who learned his air force training in the United States during World War II, is now at Bishop (California) working with Robert Symons, California Electric's areologist and pilot.

Capt. Julio Cal-y-Mayor is honored with his new assignment. He was a pilot in Squadron 201 of the Mexican Air Force during World War II, taking his training at Pocatello, Idaho; Majors Field, Tex.; St. Petersburg, Fla.; and North Island, Calif. He flew with a squadron of 32 pilots and a total crew of 300 in fighting for the Allies in the South Pacific. His squadron flew 14 bombing and strafing missions in the Philippines, Formosa, and other South Pacific areas. Recently General Kinney of the United States Air Force, with Secretary of Defense Gilberto R. Limon of Mexico, appeared in Mexico City and decorated the captain and others with the American Air Medal, which he wears with pride among other decorations.

Captain Cal-y-Mayor knows personally of Mexico's deficiency in water and power. He has lived under power-rationed conditions, and has seen lakes and reservoirs on the west side of the Sierra Madre Range recede tremendously in past years. Industrial Mexico needs more power, and in some areas the past year, Mexican hydro plants operating from 7,000 to 14,000 feet elevations have received only a few days of rain. There are plenty of clouds in the mountain ranges, but they don't produce rain.

This was the same situation that confronted California Electric Power Co. in 1947 when a succession of dry years cut operations in the Bishop Creek plants to 65 percent. Stuart Cundiff, California Electric Power Co. engineer, who had been following the work of Dr. Vincent J. Schaefer and Dr. Irving Langmuir, General Electric scientists, who had developed the dry ice seeding technique in 1946, was put in charge of plans for the artificial snowfall program. Mr. Cundiff had noticed that the alto-stratus and cumulo-stratus clouds, typical in the high Sierras, would roll over the 13,000- to 14,000-foot peaks to be dissipated over the Owens Valley. They literally disappeared into the atmosphere, without leaving any precipitation. If these clouds could be made to produce rain and snow, more water would be available to operate the five powerhouses operating in tandem at different elevations in the Bishop Creek area. And these five plants furnish 75 percent of all hydro generation of the company's northern Sierra system.

Symons was picked to do the actual flying and seeding. He had been an experienced pilot in the high Sierra since 1928; has held four United States and world glider records; and had served as flight commander of the United States glider training program at Wickenburg, Ariz. His intimate knowledge of thermal conditions in the high Sierras was to play a large part in the successful pin-pointing of storms in the Bishop watershed.

Actual flights began in the winter months of the 1947-48 season. At first, both the dry ice and silver iodide methods of artificial nucleation were considered. The latter was discarded, however, because it had to be released below the cloud formation, and since most of the time the clouds actually encompassed the peaks, the silver iodide method was not practical.

A BT-13 was the first plane test, and then an AT-6. Both proved unsatisfactory because of their ceiling limitations. A ceiling above 30,000 feet was needed as some clouds were more than 15,000 feet from top to bottom hovering over a mountain range with a 13,000-foot crest average. To meet these specifications the company purchased a P-38 which has operated efficiently under all weather conditions.

Successful nucleation flights require specific cloud formations, and during the 1948-49 season 21 flights were made.

"To release snow it is necessary to work on a supercooled cloud where the temperature is below 32 degrees Fahrenheit," Pilot Symons explained.

"Then just the right amount of dry ice chopped to the proper size is needed. Most of the seeding takes place above the clouds, although sometimes we fly through them. Clouds averaging 3,000 feet or under in thickness are seeded with dry ice the size of rice grains. Larger clouds require pieces ground to the size of a human thumb," he revealed.

The dry ice used in a seeding operation varies in size depending upon the thickness of the cloud; however, the amount used will average approximately one-half pound per mile of seeding.

When the dry ice hits the supercooled cloud it changes the water droplets to ice crystals as it passes them. As the ice crystal has a lower vapor pressure it attracts other water droplets which adhere and when heavy enough, drop as snowflakes. This process releases energy in the form of heat which creates a tremendous suction that draws in moisture from the atmosphere, thus setting off a process of chain reaction. This accounts for the phenomena of seemingly peaceful cloud formations being transformed in a matter of 30 minutes into a seething storm mass. If too much dry ice is introduced, however, it changes all of the water droplets into tiny ice crystals and the cloud is dissipated.

Elvyn C. Pye and Charles S. Patterson, in charge of the United States Weather Bureau at Bishop, have furnished meterological information and the full cooperation of their office during the entire project. Ferguson Hall, Assistant Chief of Staff of the United States Weather Bureau of Washington, D. C., spent weeks at Bishop making detailed maps, records, and diagrams of the seeding operations.

Records of the California Electric Power Co. which go back 40 years, were used to evaluate the effectiveness of the cloud nucleation program. With the aid of this extensive statistical data, each April many company engineers are able to correlate actual snow measurements at lower elevations, and estimate with amazing accuracy what the runoff precipitation will be from the snow pack in the inaccesible back country in the Bishop Basin. At the end of flight operations in April 1948, the estimate was made but the actual runoff showed an approximate 14 percent increase due to the additional "bonus" snow dropped at the high elevations. In 1949, a cold winter with very little moisture, the runoff was 12 percent over the spring estimate.

Translated in terms of electrical consumption, the 1948-49 cloud-seeding bonus of approximately 6,500 acre-feet can generate enough power to supply all the domestic and industrial needs of a city of 50,000 persons for 3 months annually.

In the case of the Bishop Creek operation, all of the water becomes the property of the city of Los Angeles, and makes a 265-mile trip in a giant aqueduct to the United States fourth largest city.

"Our experiments have convinced us that pin-point nucleation of clouds is not only possible, but it is economically profitable," Engineer Cundiff declared in summing up the results of 2 years' experiments.

UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN-MADISON

"We have obtained sizable snowfalls from clouds that would have disappeared in thin air. We believe we have the method to add to the permanent snow pack reservoir that will permit full-scale operations throughout the year, even during dry year cycles.

"During the past 2 years we have commercially pioneered a method of operation that might aid these other similar areas to add to their water supply in years ahead," Cundiff concluded.

And that is specifically what Captain Cal-y-Mayor plans to find out. He will grind dry ice on an improved machine, designed to accelerate effectiveness of the nucleation. He will train in the latest type electrically heated flying suit, complete with heated shoes, oxygen masks and other equipment needed to fly at elevations of from 25,000 to 35,000 feet. He will photograph from the plane snow markers, a new method for measuring snow by pictures, rather than the old method that took two men 5 days to make the check. Now a plane gathers the data on a 35-minute run.

All of this aerial activity and inter-communication is wire recorded for accurate record.

He will study new hydrographic installations, including telephone equipment known as "telemark" that automatically takes water level readings of reservoirs, and opens and closes valves to regulate the flow of water into power plant intakes.

All of this information will go to a special congressional subcommittee appointed by Congressman HARRY R. SHEPPARD, chairman of the California delegation on cloud-seeding and headed by THOMAS WERDEL, Republican, of Bakersfield, Calif.; and CLAIR ENGLE, Democrat, of Red Bluff, Calif. A constant flow of reports will be forwarded to President Miguel Aleman of Mexico, through Power Commissioner Paez, and the Mexican consul in San Bernardino.

Captain Cal-y-Mayor's job will be to return to Mexico and train a staff to seed clouds in specific areas. If the Mexican experiments prove successful, Mexico can look forward to further industrial progress.

Captain Cal-y-Mayor is finding out that a little snow from cloud seeding has tremendous results. In the Bishop watershed one-tenth of an inch of water over the watershed is capable of producing 925,000 kilowatt-hours of electricity by running it through the six power plants. Near Mexico City the same results can be obtained if California's rainbirds of the High Sierra prove successful instructors.

Another Bureaucratic Power Grab?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. NORRIS POULSON
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, November 30, 1950

Mr. POULSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include a warning against a contemplated power grab by the Department of the Interior:

[From the Los Angeles Times of November 22, 1950]

ANOTHER BUREAUCRATIC POWER GRAB?

Secret efforts of the Department of the Interior to revolutionize the mining laws of the United States, as disclosed by the Times last Sunday, emphasize again the lengths to which this power-hungry bureaucracy will go to increase its grip upon the Nation's resources.

PROPOSED CHANGES

The proposed changes in the mining laws, it is declared by mining authorities, would cripple prospecting and small mining operations so seriously that the search for uranium and other vital war minerals would be virtually ended.

Plans for the sweeping changes in the law were contained in an Interior Department document marked: "Confidential—neither this memorandum nor the information it contains is to be made available to the public."

Why?

Many persons are genuinely puzzled why Secretary of the Interior Oscar Chapman's Department would attempt such a move, so obviously detrimental to the best interests of the country.

Only one answer seems possible. This is that a Federal bureau, once embarked upon a quest for power, is unable to stop. It moves ever forward, grasping, conniving, scheming, pulling strings, planning new conquests. It seeks to perpetuate itself.

Many ominous signs and portents have indicated the ravenous course of the Department of the Interior in this direction under the last three Secretaries—Harold Ickes, Julius Krug, and Oscar Chapman.

ATTACK ON WEST

They have moved, successively, to gain control over the essential elements in the daily lives of the people of the United States, and particularly in the phenomenally growing West.

These elements are water, electrical power, oil, land, and minerals.

By clever appeals, they have gone far along the road to the accomplishment of their purpose. They have pitted class against class, arrayed the poor against the well-to-do, and promised great rewards to their satellites.

Secretary Ickes started the overt acts about 1936 by junking the essential spirit of the Reclamation Act of 1902, and embarking upon a "Share the Wealth" program backed up by all the resources of his Department. Then there began the taking over of the internal resources of States—such as the water, electrical power, and oil of California. The enormous wastefulness of the California Central Valley project under Federal control has been one of the bitter fruits of the Interior policy—as the farmers who pay the bill are beginning to discover.

Even now the battle is going on over the efforts of the Department to seize the electrical power resources of the Central Valley. This effort of the Interior schemers was aided and abetted by Representative HELEN GAHAGAN DOUGLAS, who now has been so thoroughly repudiated by California's awakening voters.

And now comes the devious mining maneuver.

CLEVER WORDING

The Interior Department seeks, through cleverly worded amendments, to destroy prospecting and small mining, which have been the twin bases upon which America's discovery of vitally needed uranium and other A-bomb and defense-weapon minerals have depended.

Disclosure of this latest scheme should result immediately in action by Congress to thwart any such proposals from becoming reality. The Interior Department's use of such seemingly innocent means as the Taylor Grazing Act in its attempt to gain domination over mining activities illustrates the lengths to which it will go. It works, deviously and in the dark, to worm forward toward the goal—more power.

Western Senators, now that they have been informed of what is going on by The Times' disclosure of the mining-law maneuver, can work to prevent destruction of this important aspect of national life. The West, indeed, should become ever more vigilant to protect its people and its resources from the onerous raids of the Washington "planners."

What Patrick Henry Said 175 Years Ago

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LOUIS B. HELLER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, November 30, 1950

Mr. HELLER. Mr. Speaker, in yesterday's Evening Star the words of a great American were printed. They were uttered by Patrick Henry in another day of crisis. As aptly stated in the Star, those words may find an echo in the thoughts of many Americans today. The only deletions made referred to the specific situation then pertaining between Britain and her North American colonies. The speech was delivered at the Richmond convention on March 23, 1775.

WHAT PATRICK HENRY SAID 175 YEARS AGO

Mr. President, it is natural to man to indulge in the illusions of hope. We are apt to shut our eyes against a painful truth, and listen to the song of that siren, till she transforms us into beasts. Is this the part of wise men, engaged in a great and arduous struggle for liberty? Are we disposed to be of the number of those who, having eyes, see not, and having ears, hear not, the things which so nearly concern their temporal salvation?

For my part, whatever anguish of spirit it may cost, I am willing to know the whole truth—to know the worst and to provide for it. I have but one lamp by which my feet are guided, and that is the lamp of experience. I know of no way of judging of the future but by the past. * * *

I ask gentlemen, sir, what means this martial array, if its purpose be not to force us to submission? Can gentlemen assign any other possible motive for it? * * *

And what have we to oppose to them? Shall we try argument? Sir, we have been trying that for the last 10 years. Have we anything new to offer upon the subject? Nothing. We have held the subject up in every light of which it is capable; but it has all been in vain. Shall we resort to entreaty and humble supplication? What terms shall we find which have not been already exhausted? Let us not, I beseech you, sir, deceive ourselves longer.

Sir, we have done everything that could be done to avert the storm which is now coming on. * * * Our petitions have been slighted; our remonstrances have produced additional violence and insult; our supplications have been disregarded and we have been spurned with contempt. * * *

In vain, after these things, may we indulge the fond hope of peace and reconciliation. There is no longer any room for hope. If we wish to be free; if we mean to preserve inviolate those inestimable privileges for which we have been so long contending; if we mean not basely to abandon the noble struggle in which we have been so long engaged, and which we have pledged ourselves never to abandon, until the glorious object of our contest shall be obtained, we must fight. I repeat it, sir, we must fight. An appeal to arms and to the God of hosts is all that is left us.

They tell us, sir, that we are weak; unable to cope with so formidable an adversary.

But when shall we be stronger? Will it be the next week or the next year? • • • Shall we gather strength by irresolution and inaction? Shall we acquire the means of effectual resistance by lying supinely on our backs and hugging the delusive phantom of hope until our enemies shall have bound us hand and foot?

Sir, we are not weak, if we make a proper use of those means which the God of nature hath placed in our power. Three millions of people, armed in the holy cause of liberty, and in such a country as that which we possess, are invincible by any force which our enemy can send against us.

Besides, sir, we shall not fight our battles alone. There is a just God who presides over the destinies of nations, and who will raise up friends to fight our battles for us. The battle, sir, is not to the strong alone; it is to the vigilant, the active, the brave.

Besides, sir, we have no election. If we were base enough to desire it, it is now too late to retire from the contest. There is no retreat, but in submission and slavery. Our chains are forged. • • • The war is inevitable—and let it come. I repeat it, sir, let it come.

It is in vain, sir, to extenuate the matter. Gentlemen may cry, peace, peace—but there is no peace. The war is actually begun. The next gale that sweeps from the north will bring to our ears the clash of resounding arms. Our brethren are already in the field. Why stand we here idle? What is it that gentlemen wish? What would they have? Is life so dear, or peace so sweet, as to be purchased at the price of chains and slavery? Forbid it, Almighty God.

I know not what course others may take. But as for me, give me liberty or give me death.

If Crooks, Cutthroats, and Communists Had Their Way

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BEN F. JENSEN
OF IOWA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, November 30, 1950

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Speaker, if the crooks, cutthroats and Communists here and abroad had their way, then not only the Federal Bureau of Investigation, but also every law enforcement agency in our land worthy of the name, would either be abolished or corrupted.

As one who has known that great American, J. Edgar Hoover, personally, for the past 12 years, and having closely followed the activities and good works of the FBI in stopping sabotage in times of war and in bringing to the bar of justice thousands upon thousands of criminals of every stripe, it is alarming to me, as I am sure it is to every American worthy of the protection guaranteed by the laws of our land, to read the rantings of the smear artist Mr. Max Lowenthal against the FBI, while that great organization fights to protect even his inalienable rights to be at liberty in this free land of ours.

Now is the appointed time for every loyal American to come to the aid of clean, decent government and true Americanism by everlasting and wholehearted support of the FBI and its Director, J. Edgar Hoover, as a well financed, well organized band of crooks, cutthroats and Communists right here within our own shores, as well as abroad, are this minute doing all in their power to destroy the Federal Bureau of Investigation which has done so much for America—and for every law-abiding and patriotic citizen in our land. The FBI must not be destroyed or even hindered in the slightest in the doing of its good work.

Gen. Hoyt S. Vandenberg, Chief of United States Air Forces, Warns That America Must Not Be Deluded Into Fighting a Preventive War or Deceived by Russia's Efforts To Involve Us in Wars of Limited Aggression

OF
HON. JOE L. EVINS
OF TENNESSEE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, November 30, 1950

Mr. EVINS. Mr. Speaker, on November 17, last, Gen. Hoyt S. Vandenberg, Chief of Staff of the United States Air Force, delivered a most thought-provoking address before the members of the National Association of Radio News Directors in convention at Chicago. Those who were so unfortunate as not to hear General Vandenberg's bold denunciation of warmongers, accompanied by his assertion of faith in the strength of American democracy, will be doubly unfortunate if they miss reading his remarks. General Vandenberg asserted his belief in the doctrine of peace through diplomacy and power. He insisted that this is not an easy way which spares neither trial nor tension, but insists that this is the only way that offers freemen a rational hope of survival.

During these days, Mr. Speaker, when we hear speeches and remarks on every hand regarding preventive wars, limited wars, and wars of aggression, as well as talk of the inevitable war, I think it is appropriate that we should remind ourselves that there is only one kind of war, namely, destructive war—such that saps our strength, despoils the youth, and endangers the democracy of nations who engage in it.

I commend the reading of this address by General Vandenberg to the Members of the Congress and, under unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include General Vandenberg's challenging address.

The address is as follows:

If we would reject the reprehensible proposition that America can avert a war of annihilation only by pulling the trigger first, we must do more than cry out against so absurd and desperate a delusion. For this delusion is the product of hopeless resignation to the prospect of inevitable war. To demolish it we must first destroy this myth of unavoidable conflict. We must reassure the American people that power can be employed to prevent war. We must hold out a rational hope for peace through strength and resolution.

Impatience, inconstancy, and cynicism, these are the enemies of hope. And the most perilous of them is cynicism. For it is difficult to believe that war can be averted through early or foreseeable agreement. To obtain peace through agreement, nations must live in the same moral order. Each must acknowledge truth and good faith as the rudiments of human conduct.

When a nation employs the deliberate lie as an instrumentality of statecraft, it rejects this moral order. And having rejected it, such a nation becomes incapable of respecting the sanctity of agreement. However fervidly we may press for peace through agreement, so extravagant a hope will be an illusory one until international communism proves its willingness to abide by first principles of human conduct.

Yet to admit that agreement is unlikely in this present-day world, we need not submit to the cynical assumption that the only alternative left us is inevitable war.

Midway between those extremities of illusion and despair, there exists a middle way. It is the way to an armed peace through diplomacy and power. And admittedly it cannot promise immediate peace through agreement, but it may hold off conflict until those nations whose ambitions imperil the world accept a moral order in which differences can be peaceably resolved.

This way of diplomacy and power can spare us neither trial nor tension. For it is a way of interminable struggle that will demand realism and risk-taking. But it is the only way left to a free people between the distant alternative of agreement and the near alternative of war.

Diplomacy and power can offer free men a rational hope for survival. It will tax them, however, not only in resolution but in resources as well. For to prevail with power and diplomacy against the Communist world we must outpoint its lies with truth and challenge its threat of aggression with a superior military force, and we must banish subversion by helping free peoples banish the cesspools in which it spawns.

No more formidable a task has ever confronted the American people. No more fearful a judgment has ever awaited them should they fail.

The power problem of America, however, is unique in a world strained under the burden of rearmament. For our test shall come not in the creation of power; in this we know our capabilities. Our most difficult task lies in the employment of power—in the wisdom, the courage, and shrewdness with which we use it to benefit the lives of free men.

For if we are to use power not only to safeguard ourselves but to safeguard freedom and minimize the danger of eventual war, then we must exercise power with such boldness that we weaken the purposes of our enemies; exercise power with such foresight that we strengthen the resolve of our friends; exercise power with such judiciousness that we do not squander our resources; exercise power with such prudence that we do not derange our political life; exercise power with such strength that no enemy shall miscalculate our resolution; exercise power with such constancy that our friends need never doubt us.

The task is made more difficult by our traditional aversion to power politics in the world. For we have blinked the fact that nations must struggle for existence.

As a result, too many Americans have draped the world in a chintzy illusion of brotherhood, believing that nations can outlaw struggle over a friendly cup of tea.

Even more unrealistic are the outraged who while not denying that this struggle exists would have us isolate ourselves from it. So fearful are they that the world might despoil us, they would forbid us associate with it.

Though antagonistic to each other, these positions are equally ingenuous. Neither has faced up to the facts of life. Both have created timidity and confusion in the minds of the American people. And as a consequence we have shrunk from the use of power not because we abhor—but primarily because we have never known how, when, and where to employ it.

It was in 1946 that the United States declared it could no more abstain from the world struggle in peacetime than it could ignore it in war. With this new doctrine we blocked for the first time a rival power with power to initiate a new spirit of resistance in the free world.

Within 4 years we have not only reconstructed the free world's will to resist, but we have also forewarned aggressors as never before that armed invasion will be combated with force, that military adventurers shall hereafter trespass in peril of their own lives.

These successes, however, do not justify the assumption that we have made aggression unlikely. For the most effective deterrent to aggression today is the threat of retaliation.

And yet if we would deter an aggressor, it is not enough that we threaten him with retaliatory attack. Instead we must also deny him his immediate objectives upon the ground. For the achievement of those objectives would provide him with additional resources, which might warrant his taking the risk of war even in the face of retaliation.

Nowhere is this more likely than in Europe. For there a vast industrial treasure offers so remunerative an objective that an aggressor might willingly risk extensive destruction at home to secure it.

It is in Western Europe that Communist imperialism must ultimately resolve the decision as to whether it shall seek expansion through conquest or whether it shall seek accommodation with the free world. For Western Europe alone holds the balance of power that could spare communism defeat in a world conflict.

Knowing this, the Communists have conspired to distract the American people from their priority commitment of power to the defenses of free Europe. And to circumvent the superiority of American resources, they have endeavored to panic us like wet hens into a strategy of exhaustion. They would have us flit from alternate crisis to crisis, between the east and west.

But however devious these tactics of distraction may be, we shall not be diverted from Europe. For Europe is the theater of decision. Communist successes elsewhere might weaken the free world. Communist successes in Europe could destroy it.

While the United States can underwrite the preliminary costs of Western European defenses, it cannot by itself permanently endow the security of the non-Communist world. For although the European will to resist can be fortified by military aid, it cannot be purchased by American dollars. However liberally we contribute to the common defense, whatever our commitment of troops, in the last analysis Western Europe shall be defended primarily by the Western Europeans.

Any nation that would claim the right to pool its defenses must demonstrate its good faith by sharing fairly to the limit of its resources in the common defense. For if a people merit freedom, they will spend generously to preserve it.

In time of danger there is no limit to what a nation can safely spend for its preservation. Crisis, however, is not license to extravagance in defense. For if the United States is to maintain long-term military power, then it must assume a position it can support not for a year or two, but even for a decade or more. Although the issue shall always be one of what is needed for defense rather than what we can afford, we dare never forget that the health of our Nation is the prime military asset of the free world.

Because power is no more effective than the use to which power is put, the money we spend is no more important than the strategy with which we employ it.

In devising a strategy that would dispel the likelihood of inevitable war, we must accomplish three primary missions:

The first is to challenge the enemy's sources of strength that he will not risk unlimited war for fear of annihilation.

The second is to deny him easy opportunity for conquest by strengthening the defense of free nations.

And the third is to contain his satellite attacks without recourse to the strategic arms that might transmute those second-class wars into first-class conflicts.

In view of the wide range of these missions, it is apparent that no one single element of power can provide the miracle deterrent to total war by accomplishing all three missions.

Yet in strategic air power we do have for the first time a weapon capable of accomplishing the first of these missions—cracking an enemy's will to resist by striking at his home sources of strength. Nevertheless, it does not follow that air bombing alone could deter an enemy bent on the plunder of Western Europe's resources.

For to defeat an enemy by crushing his home sources of supply, it is essential that we prevent him from acquiring new ones. Unless Western Europe is adequately defended, an enemy might overrun its industrial plant and readily supplant its own logistical sources by those acquired through conquest. Thus were an aggressor to occupy the nations of Western Europe, it would have circumvented the decisiveness of strategic air power in the war.

For that reason, the decisiveness of strategic air power is peculiarly dependent upon the ability of ground armies to withstand an aggressor and limit him to his own home sources of supply. And since those ground forces are dependent upon the Navy for their logistical support, air power becomes no less dependent upon sea power than are the Allied land forces in Europe.

By the same token both are dependent upon strategic air power. For however speedily we recreate Atlantic community land strength and its supporting sea power, we shall never mobilize manpower to withstand Communist aggression unless air power can demolish the enemy's logistical sources and limit his armies to what they might have accumulated in stockpiles. Thus if the western world would deter Soviet aggression, it must not only build up the land and sea strength of the North Atlantic community, but must also offset the superiority of Soviet land strength with a comparable superiority in strategic air power.

On June 25 we were confronted by the threat and tactic of satellite aggression. By this risky resort to limited war, the Communist entente would engage us in attritional warfare with conventional weapons while averting retaliation against its heartland sources of strength. To aid the United Nations in quelling limited aggression of this type, we must maintain a mobile striking force of sufficient power in all three arms so as to avoid the necessity of expanding limited into a total conflict.

Just as a prolonged period of trial and tension is preferable to even a limited war, so are limited wars vastly preferable to the prospect of unlimited conflict.

If cynicism be the most insidious enemy of a people who would avert war, then inconstancy cannot be far behind.

For the way to peace through diplomacy and power offers no easy turn-offs to the timid except into disaster.

It is too long a path to be traveled by the impatient whose resolution must be recharged with the passing of each fiscal year.

It is too hard a path to be traveled by the faint-hearted who despair and who are as easily deceived by phony mirages of peace.

It is too steep a path to be traveled by those who value their comfort more than they value their freedom.

More than anything else our allies fear we lack the constancy to follow this path. They fear inconstancy may impair our resolution and cause us to default on our commitments. For they are not certain we have yet sensed the gravity of this struggle for survival.

But while our allies have feared inconstancy, the Soviet has banked upon it.

For they have sought to deceive the world into believing that Americans are incapable of resolution, incapable of the sacrifice such resolution shall require if we are to contest its claims to the future.

This danger of irresolution, however, lies more with us whose responsibility it is to inform the American people than with the people themselves.

For if the people are honestly informed of the tasks and dangers they face, they will respond with resolution. And if assured that power wisely employed may spare them eventual war, they will exert the effort, endure the sacrifice, and provide the power required.

But if we would panic them with exaggerated reports of Communist military strength, confuse them by doubling our requirements in hopes of securing half, lead them blindfolded step by step for fear blunt truths may shock them, then they may hesitate when boldness is needed for lack of confidence and understanding.

As never before this is a time for honesty and faith in the American people; a time for hard truths, a time for clear facts, a time for plain talk on what power will cost.

Given these, they shall willingly do what is needed.

Puerto Ricans Residing in Hawaii Denounce Revolutionary Activities in Native Land, Assert Loyalty to United States

---

OF

HON. JOSEPH R. FARRINGTON

DELEGATE FROM HAWAII

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 30, 1950

Mr. FARRINGTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include herewith an article from the Honolulu Star-Bulletin of November 6, 1950, and an editorial from the same newspaper of November 8, 1950. The article follows:

LOYAL TO THE UNITED STATES—TERRITORY OF HAWAII PUERTO RICANS DENOUNCE ACTS IN ISLAND AND AT CAPITAL

On behalf of the Puerto Ricans in Hawaii the heads of their four largest organizations on Sunday spoke out in full loyalty to the United States.

Their statement was caused by the recent uprising in Puerto Rico, soon followed by the attempt made by two Puerto Ricans to assassinate President Truman.

The following statement, addressed to the editor of the Star-Bulletin, was drafted and approved Sunday by the Puerto Rican leaders:

"We, the undersigned, wish to inform the people of the Territory of Hawaii and elsewhere that the Puerto Rican people of the Territory of Hawaii do not sympathize with the recent Communist inspired revolt in Puerto Rico and the attempted assassination of President Truman.

"The Puerto Rican people in Hawaii are loyal Americans and will continue to be so."

The statement was signed by the following:

Antone C. Martin, president, Puerto Rican Independent Association of Hawaii, Inc.

Augustine Montiho, president of Puerto Rican Civic Association of Hawaii, Inc.

Manuel C. Elisary, president, Puerto Rican Athletic Association of Hawaii.

Manuel F. Vegas, president, Puerto Rican Musicians Association of Hawaii, Inc.

The editorial follows:

THEY'RE LOYAL, COOPERATIVE, PROGRESSIVE

Timely action has been taken by the Puerto Ricans of Hawaii to declare their complete loyalty to the United States.

Four chief Puerto Rican organizations have joined in a declaration of this loyalty and of abhorrence for the recent uprising in Puerto Rico and particularly for the attempt to assassinate the President.

These groups are the Puerto Rican Independent Association of Hawaii, Inc.; Puerto Rican Civic Association of Hawaii, Inc.; Puerto Rican Athletic Association of Hawaii; Puerto Rican Musicians Association of Hawaii, Inc.

Jointly these organizations represent virtually all of the immigrant Puerto Ricans and the Americans of Puerto Rican ancestry, a group of some 10,000.

This message deserves and will get special attention in Washington, D. C.

Delegate FARRINGTON will carry with him to Washington this week end the news that the Puerto Ricans of Hawaii have no sympathy for the recent uprising in Puerto Rico, and completely repudiate any connection with any plot or intrigue aimed at the internal security of Puerto Rico or of the United States.

Members of the Puerto Rican community are justifiably proud of the fact that, when the Subcommittee of the House Un-American Activities Committee conducted its public hearings here last spring, not one person of Puerto Rican ancestry was brought before that committee as a suspect.

The lively appreciation of and active pride in their status as residents and citizens of the United States is one of the outstanding characteristics of the Puerto Ricans in Hawaii.

Economically, culturally, and socially, the Puerto Ricans have made and are making rapid and steady progress. Through the schools, the playfields, the churches, and the libraries and other institutions, the Puerto Ricans of Hawaii are merging into the general body of progressive, cooperative, energetic, and useful citizenry.

Their instant revulsion against the Communist-inspired uprising in Puerto Rico, and the fanatical (and probably also Communist-inspired) attempt to kill the President, is not only commendable in itself—it is fine reassurance that the Puerto Ricans in Hawaii are proving their value as loyal citizens of the United States and happy in that loyalty.

South in Control of Next Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HENRY D. LARCADE, JR.
OF LOUISIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, November 30, 1950

Mr. LARCADE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to submit the following editorial from the Southwest Citizen of Lake Charles, La.:

SOUTH IN CONTROL OF NEXT CONGRESS

If Mr. Truman expects to get any more of his Fair Deal programs enacted into law, his last chance for at least 2 years will begin tomorrow, when the "lame duck" Congress meets.

In January he'll have to deal with a new Congress over which his supporters will have only nominal control. And in the driver's seat will be the southern Democrats who will hold the balance of power.

However, there lies here a responsibility to the Nation as a whole that must be shouldered seriously. For with its veto power, the South will in effect be legislating for the whole country. The record of next January's Eighty-second Congress will be a severe test of our fair-mindedness, our political honesty, our statesmanship. There is a chance here to show the Nation in this atomic age what kind of government it would have if the capital were in Richmond instead of Washington.

Western Civilization Has Conquered Its Fear of Communism but the Struggle May Only Have Begun—Remarks of Secretary of Defense Marshall to the Defense Ministers of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization—Requirement for Collective Forces as a Practical Means of Mutual Defense

OF
HON. MELVIN PRICE
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, November 30, 1950

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, during the recent recess of Congress, there was held in Washington a conference of international importance. Representatives of 12 independent and democratic nations, signatories to the North Atlantic Treaty, met to consider what forces should be included in the supernational army that will be required if the defense of the North Atlantic nations is to be implemented. They discussed both the contribution of forces to be made now and long-range requirements, and they reached an agreement that is important to the future of democracy and the survival of our western civilization.

The meeting of the Defense Committee of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization was opened by the Honorable George C. Marshall, Secretary of Defense. No man alive today could so well have filled the role of host, keynoter, and leader as Secretary Marshall. One time Chief of Staff of our Army, one time Secretary of State, and now Secretary of Defense, General Marshall has already assumed in the history of our Nation a role comparable to that of General Washington. His name, through his suggestion of the European Recovery Program, has become, like the name of Washington, a token of hope and promise to all lovers of democracy and peace.

In remarks distinguished by their clarity and their directness Secretary Marshall set the tone of the meeting, and presented the foreign defense ministers with a challenge they could not ignore. "I hope," he said, "that the year that has passed will go down into history as the one in which western civilization conquered its fear of communism." Neither economic recovery in Europe nor military victory in Korea is so important as this conquest of fear everywhere. Just as the airlift supply of Berlin inflicted a humiliating defeat on Russia in 1949 so the successful action of democratic armies, acting under United Nations Security Council mandate against aggression in Korea, inflicted a shameful defeat on the very principle of communism in 1950. Concerted action against the North Koreans was an assertion of our determination to remain united against every act of aggression that threatens democracy and peace.

In our own country, the vigorous and successful direction of our contribution to the joint effort gave the lie to all the absurd and prejudiced charges of Communist sympathy on the part of our Government, and specifically of the State Department. Such charges, diverting our attention from the main task of combating communism where communism has greatest chance of success, had threatened to reduce our zeal in pursuing the objectives of the European recovery program, of the United Nations, and of the North Atlantic Treaty organization. But that danger, too, is passed. We have been awakened to the danger that is real, and put away the childish tendency to suppose every bush a bear.

We know now what the danger is, and we have confidence with which to face it. That confidence, however, must not be dissipated. Secretary Marshall warned:

> We must complete a plan that will make it perfectly clear to all the peoples we represent, and also to any who plot against us, that we are organizing, training, and equipping forces that can successfully resist aggression in any form.

The blueprint for mutual defense considered at the Washington meeting will be implemented by recommendations that will make the signatory nations stronger to meet present and immediate threats. Such recommendations should also produce action more quickly than it has done in the past. Those recommendations, of course, will be deliberated by the legislative bodies to which, under democratic process, the delegates to the Washington meeting will report them. But parliaments of other nations will certainly be impressed, in their deliberations, by the actions our own country and our Congress have already initiated. As Secretary Marshall outlined them:

> We are increasing our own defense budget. We are adding to our armed forces. We are producing weapons and distributing them in constantly increasing quantities to the armed forces of (other North Atlantic Pact) countries.

Mr. Speaker, this Congress, now nearing the end of its existence, can take great pride in the fact that it has made so great a contribution to the common defense of the free nations that border the North Atlantic Ocean. As the eyes of the world, in Secretary Marshall's phrase, focused upon the Washington meeting, they must have observed what we have done, and what we are doing, and appreciated what, under the inspiration of our leadership, other free nations are now determined to do.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

Plans have been made that can quickly and effectively be translated into military strength, and that strength, overcoming the last vestiges of fear, will effectively meet, and repel, the Communist challenge and the threat to peace.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and insert in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the text of Secretary Marshall's words that were at the same time an expression of courage and of faith, and a challenge to the foreign delegates to support us in our defense of democracy.

The address by Secretary Marshall is as follows:

On behalf of the United States Government, I extend to the members of this Defense Committee of our North Atlantic community of nations a warm welcome. A year has passed since the first meeting of the Defense Ministers here in Washington. It has been a year of significant progress toward security and peace, to the attainment of which the nations we represent have pledged their political, economic, and human resources.

I hope that the year that has passed will go down into history as the one in which western civilization conquered its fear of communism. Economic recovery and increased military strength have given us greater courage to resist the Communist challenge. Victory in Korea is impressive evidence that the determined efforts of United Nations will have the backing of powerful military, naval, and air forces to defend the peace of the world.

The added confidence we now have gained must not be dissipated. We must not sink into an attitude of complacency or overconfidence, for the struggle may only have begun. That is why this meeting of ours at this time is so important. This is the time that we must complete a plan that will make it perfectly clear to all the peoples we represent, and also to any who plot against us, that we are organizing, training, and equipping forces that can successfully resist aggression in any form. We must adopt mutual defense plans that will exploit the full military potential that we possess among all of our 12 nations. We must develop plans in such a way that they not only are consistent with our principles and our traditions but are realistic in the appreciation of the present critical situation. We must face facts without prejudice. We must now work together as a team and back our promises with positive actions.

For my own country, I can say that we are wholeheartedly supporting a program for our mutual defense. We are increasing our own defense budget. We are adding to our Armed Forces. We are producing weapons and distributing them in constantly increasing quantities to the armed forces of your countries. But this treaty of ours is mutual in character. Each of us must contribute to the common defense in accordance with our respective capabilities.

What has been done so far, good as it may be, is far from enough. The potential collective force of the United Nations was not enough to deter the aggressors in Korea. The actual collective forces of the North Atlantic States may not be enough to deter aggression in our North Atlantic area and definitely is not enough to resist attack without serious and critical initial losses. That gap in military strength we must now close as quickly as possible. Out of this meeting should come definite recommendations that not only will make us stronger to meet the present threats but to do so more quickly than past procedure would indicate.

The processes of our governments among all of us are democratic, we must have time for deliberation and discussion of our national policies. We have had a year now in which to make our position clear to each other and to our respective peoples. We have passed through the creative phase of establishing the North Atlantic community. All of our peoples appear fully determined to accept the principle of mutual defense and to work together for its success. Now today they are entitled to a bill of particulars from us.

In the next few weeks I will be called upon as Secretary of Defense of the United States to appear before our American Congress to defend the expenditures of vast sums of money for our mutual aid and to ask for a continuation of many of the constructive steps we already have undertaken. I imagine every one of you under our respective democratic processes faces a similar challenge. We must convince our legislative bodies and the millions they represent that we have actually developed practical means of mutual defense and that each of us is contributing fairly and fully to the common cause. We will have to prove that our plan can be put in successful operation and that it merits the wholehearted support by our peoples and our governments.

The eyes of the whole world I imagine are focused upon this meeting today. Our citizens are eager to ascertain what forces are to be raised, how, and when, and what every nation under the North Atlantic Pact will contribute. They are clearly entitled to such information. Therefore, let us make an effort to give it to them clearly and unmistakably; and then let us go about the business of translating our plans into military strength quickly and effectively. That appears to me to be the primary mission of this conference.

Fourscore and Seven Years Ago

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LOUIS B. HELLER
OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, November 30, 1950

Mr. HELLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the New York Times magazine section for November 19, 1950:

FOURSCORE AND SEVEN YEARS AGO—THE GETTYSBURG ADDRESS, WHICH LOOKED BACK TO 1776, FORESHADOWED THE STRUGGLE WHICH CONTINUES IN 1950

(By R. L. Duffus)

"Fourscore and seven years ago our fathers brought forth on this continent a new nation, conceived in liberty and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal."

Today it is exactly fourscore and seven years since Abraham Lincoln made "a few appropriate remarks" at the dedication of a cemetery for the Union dead who had fallen in the Battle of Gettysburg. The man who was expected to be the principal speaker was Edward Everett, of Massachusetts, a justly renowned orator. President Lincoln had received and accepted a form invitation precisely like those sent to scores of other dignitaries. It was not until November 2, after his acceptance, that he was asked to speak—as, indeed, the President of the United States had to be asked if he were present at all.

Lincoln had read Everett's address, which was prepared and sent to him—and to all important newspapers—well in advance. Mr. Lincoln had no desire to compete with that imposing, scholarly, and eloquent document. He had to be brief and it was his instinct to be simple. He knew his words would be read by those whose sons or lovers or brothers had died at Gettysburg and on other battlefields and he must have hoped they would be read by the many thousands in the North who had begun to doubt if these sacrifices, this pain, this grief, were not too great a price to pay.

Mr. Lincoln turned back to the birth of the Republic, much as we today turn back to the Gettysburg Address. He took a noble five-word phrase from the Declaration. Are men equal in intelligence or in goodness? He did not say they were. They are equal in their rights. They have an equal claim to liberty.

"Now we are engaged in a great civil war, testing whether that Nation or any nation so conceived and so dedicated can long endure."

We now know that the Confederacy was doomed by those July days of 1863 which saw Pickett's charge repulsed at Gettysburg and the Stars and Stripes flying again over Vicksburg. But Lincoln could not be sure. The Confederate General Bragg had come within an ace of crushing Rosecrans at Chickamauga in September. There were 16,000 Union dead, wounded, and missing in that battle. In the spring of 1864 Grant was to lose 55,000 men in his advance from the Rapidan to the James.

When Lincoln spoke at Gettysburg, the war could still have been lost by military disaster, by political defeat, by compromise. Lincoln had to find words to stir the faltering spirit of the North. He had to find words to stir the peoples of Britain and France, so that their Governments would not dare take action against the Union.

Perhaps a Nation so conceived and so dedicated could not long endure. That thought would come to him in the sleepless hours of the night.

"We are met on a great battlefield of that war. We have come to dedicate a portion of that field, as a final resting place for those who gave their lives that that Nation might live."

The Gettysburg battlefield in November 1863, was no well-tended park, where visitors might spend a few mildly melancholy hours. It was a place of thinly hidden horror. The armies had moved away without burying their dead. The civilian authorities had done what they could. Some of the original graves were too shallow. The vultures circled on slow and heavy wings. The Peach Orchard, the Big and Little Round Tops' Culp's Hill—the squeamish who did not wish to be too realistically reminded of what it costs to be and remain free had better not visit those places.

"It is altogether fitting and proper that we should do this. But, in a larger sense, we cannot dedicate—we cannot consecrate—we cannot hallow this ground. The brave men, living and dead, who struggled here, have consecrated it, far above our poor power to add or detract."

The Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States was humble when he considered the private soldier in the ranks. More than that, it was his purpose to make a symbol of that soldier—a man who may have been drafted or who may have enlisted for the $300 blood money by which another man had bought exemption from the draft.

The drafted men, the $300 volunteers, were not of the quality of those who had joined in the rising of the North after Sumter fell. But Mr. Lincoln seemed to be saying that all those who stood their ground in the face of the enemy belonged to a democracy of honor. The wilderness battles, the final fighting around Richmond, were to testify to that faith. In time of great stress, in such encounters as the Battle above the Clouds, men's souls were purified.

Death was the final great companionship of the free. The living could not enter there. They could only be reverent in its presence.

Other fields, ahead in the black shadows, had still to be consecrated. Again the cannon would thunder, again the rifle fire break out in the woods, the color sergeant would fall and another take up the flag, the wounded might think no freedom worth their agony, there would be weeping in many a home. Lincoln was perhaps weary of words. In the presence of this multitude of the living, he was closer to the unspeaking dead.

"The world will little note, nor long remember, what we say here, but it can never forget what they did here."

Lincoln believed this. He told Ward Lamon, "That speech won't scour * * * The people are disappointed." But there was immediate praise, some of it in the press, as well as the usual sneers and jeers. Everett wrote Lincoln he wished he could flatter himself he had come "as near the central idea of the occasion in 2 hours as you did in 2 minutes."

More than one reporter took down the words, for neither Lincoln nor his secretaries had thought it worth while to have spare copies for the newspapers. The man from the New York Times did this. Writing, probably in long hand, he spoiled some of the best phrases but the full speech, as he got it, was published in this paper on November 20. Everett's followed it.

"It is for us the living, rather, to be dedicated here to the unfinished work which they who fought here have thus far so nobly advanced."

There was plenty of unfinished work. Defeatism, pacifism, even treason were vociferous in such Northern States as New York, Indiana, Illinois, and Ohio. Nearly a year was to pass and still Lincoln wouldn't know before election day 1864, how he stood with his fellow citizens and with destiny; he wasn't sure of victory of any kind.

He went on in the voice that many long remembered, high pitched, not the big boom that you might have expected from so tall a man. There are no more beautiful cadences in the whole of English prose.

"It is rather for us to be here dedicated to the great task remaining before us—that from these honored dead we take increased devotion to that cause for which they gave the last full measure of devotion—that we here highly resolve that these dead shall not have died in vain—that this Nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom—and that government of the people, by the people, for the people, shall not perish from the earth."

Sandburg tells us how he went back to a big lunch and reception at the Wills home, attended patriotic services in the Presbyterian Church, and rode home to Washington lying down in the drawing room of his car with a wet towel laid across his eyes and forehead. There is no sense of triumph in these details. He was, and his photographs show it, weary to the depths of his soul.

But he had said the words and they were immortal. They were armies with banners. They were artillery. They fought for the North in every subsequent battle. The new birth of freedom came, though not as he desired it, not with the magnanimity, the pity for the defeated enemies who were to be enemies no more, that if he had lived he would surely have striven for.

Now the Gettysburg address is fourscore and seven years behind us and the voice of Lincoln has been silent for five and eighty years. He stood at Gettysburg at the halfway point of the Republic's progress from the Declaration to the dedication of our own and other nations to stand against aggression in Korea.

The cause for which the men who fell at Gettysburg gave the last full measure of devotion has not been lost, nor has it won its final victory. Liberty is still threatened, it is still not certain that nations dedicated to it can long survive; there is ground far away in a strange land newly hallowed by the brave men, living and dead, who struggled there; anxious humanity still yearns for a new birth of freedom; government of the people, by the people, for the people is not a gift from heaven but must be defended anew from generation to generation.

But the voice of Lincoln, in these few remarks, speaks to the whole world. This is what we like to think democracy means, what freedom means. Time and new inventions and the sweep of history, war, and sorrow and despair, hopes broken on the wheel of dark events, the challenge of a new slavery and a new conspiracy against mankind—these have changed no basic principle.

Fourscore and seven years from now the battle may not even yet be finally won. But the cause will live and the words of Abraham Lincoln will be still remembered.

Air Power Is Truly Peace Power—"Air Power Is Everything Within Our Nation That Has To Do With the Air; It Includes Our Aviation Production Line, Air Education, Commercial Transport, Private Flying, Maintenance Facilities, and Research Laboratories as Well as All Branches of the Military Establishment for Air" (From American Legion National Convention Resolution on Aeronautics)

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK W. BOYKIN

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 30, 1950

Mr. BOYKIN. Mr. Speaker, there is no group of citizens upon which the Congress places greater reliance, nor whose studied findings merit greater consideration by the Congress of these United States, than do those of our veteran organizations. I need not point out to you, sir, that when the American veteran speaks, the Congress of the United States lends an attentive ear.

Mr. Speaker, that is as it should be, for the American veteran merits that confidence. No nation in this world can point to any citizen group that is more loyal, disinterested, and altogether concerned with the patriotic, ethical, cultural, or moral well-being of their country than the group of veterans that comprise the American Legion; and it is not, therefore, any happenstance that, when the Legion speaks—it speaks with a mighty voice. True to its constitution, however, it does so only on matters that have to do with the peace, well-being, and the security of our country.

Mr. Speaker, I remember one of America's top flight military leaders, a man who had spent his entire life in the United States Army, saying on one occasion. "Frank, within the rank and file of the American Legion will be found some of the most brilliant-minded military strategists in the whole world, and, while their conventions might present a sort of carnival appearance, the fact remains that anyone in attendance upon their committees will rapidly see that here are men—all of them experts in the matters whereof they speak."

Mr. Speaker, my son, James Robert—"Bob"—last week handed me a copy of the resolutions adopted by the 1950 American Legion Convention recently held at Los Angeles. In doing so, he remarked, "Dad, these resolutions are in accord with the very things you have been saying for the last 2 years. I remember that in several of your speeches you said that the men who work in the aviation production lines were just as much a part of the air power of the United States as were the men who flew the B–29's or the B–36's," and now comes the American Legion resolutions, stating that "air power is everything within the Nation that has to do with the air"; that "it includes air education, commercial transport, private flying, maintenance facilities, research laboratories, and the Military Establishment for Air."

It is well for the country that such activities as the Legion carries on are part and parcel of their group activities because out of their fact findings comes to us here in these United States some of the most fundamental military concepts.

Mr. Speaker, the United States is now and has for several years been on the fringe of all-out global warfare. More than ever I am convinced that the only thing which has contained the Russians to date and prevented them from outright and direct attack has been our possession of a stockpile of atom bombs and our unquestioned ability to deliver them by air—with precision and with dispatch.

It is because of these things that I am so concerned every time I hear some word spoken that would tend to disrupt the splendid work that has been done by the United States Air Force and the Navy air arm, not alone in the skirmish that has engaged us at such a terrific cost of life in Korea, but in achieving supremacy in the air.

Inasmuch as I have heard rumors that attempt might be made to again, if not amend the National Security Act with respect to the Air Force, to congressionally establish some new form of organization, I was happy to learn that the Legion, in anticipation of that move, recommended "that the present structure of the Air Force be maintained without change."

It was only after years of study and debate covering the last quarter of a century—subsequent to the adoption of the Reorganization Act and the consolidation of the Armed Services Committee, that the Congress, in its wisdom, finally adopted what we now have come to know as the National Security Act. It was under this act that the Department of the Air Force was established as a separate unit.

Just a few short months ago and upon the suggestion of Louis Johnson, the act was amended. At that time, the operation of the act as a whole was made a subject of extended study. Inasmuch as the Congress did not at that time see fit to change the present organization of the Air Force, it should certainly not now and within a few months, by ill-conceived legislation, force that great branch of our armed services into an altogether new type of structure and responsibilities. Prudence dictates that no changes be effected until such time has elapsed as might enable us to learn exactly what it is that should be done in order to obtain the maximum air defense at a minimum of cost to the American taxpayers.

I am of one mind with the resolution of the Legion—there should be no organic change made with respect to the Air Force until we have had time to study the development of that new branch of our armed services as it has been laid down, and certainly there should be no more organizational legislation than was provided in the National Security Act of 1947, and amended as recently as a year ago.

It is because of these facts that I was pleased to see the following paragraph among the resolutions adopted by the aeronautics committee of the Legion, and indorsed by its national convention:

The current appropriations for the Air Force and naval aviation are for immediate needs. There is yet to be established, by legislation, a succession of 5-year programs, reviewable yearly, for research, development, and procurement of aircraft for the Air Force and the naval air arm for the purpose of maintaining a rapidly expandable production industry, and we renew our recommendation made in 1949 that such a program be established by the Congress at the earliest practicable date.

Mr. Speaker, I shall not undertake, in the time which I have allotted to myself, to discuss at great length the time it takes to build an airplane from the drafting board to the time that it is rolling off a production line. I have heard it variously estimated as requiring from 5 to 7 years, and heaven knows that time is running out on us. All of these facts are well understood by the American Legion, and it is because of that understanding that that organization steadfastly adheres to its recommendations for a consistent long-term program of aircraft procurement sufficient in size to provide an economical and stable aircraft aviation industry, efficiently operated to the end that the United States Air Force, as well as the Navy air arm, will be equipped at the earliest possible moment with modern combat planes of the latest design and type.

Mr. Speaker, I am personally disposed to feel there still exists a great deal of misunderstanding with respect to the size of our current defense effort expressed by the 70-group air force and its supporting units, as recommended not alone by the President's Aviation Policy Commission, but by our own Joint Congressional Air Policy Board and as legislated and authorized by the Congress in the Army and Air Force Authorization Act of 1949.

It is to be remembered at all times that even now our Air Force is not being built to a size that will put America on a wartime footing. What we in Congress have done to date looks merely to building a peacetime air power program which would provide an adequate base for expansion in the event of war. That is what the Congressional Aviation Board recommended, and that is what the Presidential Air Policy Commission reported to this Congress should be done some 4 years ago.

What we have recently authorized and made appropriations to build, as of this hour, is an Air Force sufficient merely to—

A. Withstand an initial blow intended to cripple these United States.

B. Form the basis for a strong territorial defense.

C. Provide effective retaliation but not a sustained defensive action.

To my manner of thought and in this hour of peril, that is not enough.

What America must accomplish with all dispatch is to both achieve and maintain unquestioned supremacy in the air.

Mr. Speaker, knowing that air power is truly peace power, under unanimous consent of the House to extend my remarks, I include the aeronautic resolution passed by the American Legion at its Thirty-second National Convention held in Los Angeles, together with the statement of policy agreed upon by their aeronautic committee, and which was adopted.

The resolution reads as follows:

We reaffirm our declaration of policy contained in a 1949 report of this committee and in the bulletin of the American Legion entitled "The Fifties—Decade of Air Decision," as follows:

Air power is everything within the nation that has to do with air. It includes air education, commercial transport, private flying, maintenance facilites, research laboratories, and the military establishment for air. No nation that merely has airplanes in the hands of its professionals can be said truly to possess air power. A nation must also understand air power and its significance.

The job of the American Legion is to develop that statesmanship of the air within our own ranks. We must recognize that without a healthy aircraft manufacturing industry, a financially stable air transportation industry, and a genuine research program, military aviation cannot be supported.

The current appropriations for the Air Force and naval aviation are for immediate needs. There is yet to be established, by legislation, a succession of 5-year programs, reviewable yearly, for research, development, and procurement of aircraft for the Air Force and the naval air arm for the purpose of maintaining a rapidly expandable production industry, and we renew our recommendation made in 1949 that such a program be established by the Congress at the earliest practicable date.

We note with approval that the Congress has enacted legislation to develop prototype cargo and transport aircraft, primarily for commercial use, but suitable for military use in the event of emergency, to be administered by the Secretary of Commerce in conjunction with the Air Force, in line with our recommendation of 1949.

In the interest of both civil and military aviation, we recommend that the Civil Aeronautics Administration and other appropriate agencies of the Government be given adequate funds to continue and complete research and development in the field of all-weather flying devices.

We recognize that in the interest of military effectiveness, the Air Force must maintain complete control, jurisdiction, and command of all its present components and to that end we recommend that the present structure of the Air Force be maintained without change.

We have heretofore recommended tha the Air Force and the Naval Air Arm be expanded in accordance with the principal recommendations of the President's Air Policy Commission and the Joint Congressional Aviation Policy Board, and we record with satisfaction that considerable progress has been made toward the attainment of those objectives. We recommend that the goals set by those boards be further revised and the program be adjusted to meet the present and reasonably foreseeable world conditions.

We renew our recommendation that the appropriate agencies of the Government explore fully and establish an adequate program for military, naval, and commercial airships under our flag.

We recommend to the national membership committee of the American Legion that it establish effective liaison with the Air Force in order to aid the Air Force in its recruitment program.

(The above statement of policy was agreed upon by your aeronautics committee and was adopted.)

Resolution No. 54 was consolidated with resolution No. 694, which was approved and reads as follows:

"Resolved, That the American Legion in national convention assembled in Los Angeles, Calif., October 9–12, 1950, recommend that a United States Air Academy be established."

(Resolution No. 439, referred to the standing committee.)

(Resolution No. 180, rejected.)

The Negro, Misled in "Rights" Fight

OF

HON. HENRY D. LARCADE, JR.

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 30, 1950

Mr. LARCADE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to submit the following article from the Daily World of Opelousas, La.:

OTHERS SAY

The following is reprinted from the October 22 issue of the Telegram, a weekly newspaper published in Washington, D. C., by Davis Lee, a Negro. Time magazine recently, in an article about Lee, gave the newspaper's circulation at 110,000. A previous article by Lee was widely reprinted in newspapers, including this one.

"THE NEGRO, MISLED IN 'RIGHTS' FIGHT

"(By Davis Lee, publisher)

"The more I travel, listen, and observe, the more convinced I become that the Negro has been grossly misled in this matter of integration and civil rights.

"It appears to me that the first things should come first, and that our economic well-being is of greater significance than the privilege or right to attend a white school or to associate with white people on an equal basis provided by Supreme Court decisions and pressure legislation.

"As a Negro, and an American, I naturally want to see my race enjoy every right, privilege, and opportunity enjoyed by any other American, but I am opposed to any type of agitation designed to deprive the other fellow of a right to be associated with his own kind exclusively, if he so desires. I would like to reserve such a right for myself and definitely would not like it encroached upon by a Supreme Court edict or any other kind of interference.

"The right granted to one or two Negroes in Virginia or some other Southern State to enter a State graduate school is of no benefit to the millions of our people who are in need of the bare necessities of life, and when the fortunately situated members of the race conduct campaigns of agitation for selfish gain the needy masses suffer."

NOR WHITES EITHER

"While the South does not provide ample or adequate modern school facilities for Negroes everywhere, neither does it provide completely modern facilities for white schools, because the money is not available for such a vast undertaking. However, rapid progress has been made, and in Montgomery, Ala., and several other communities the Negro schools far exceed the white schools in modernization and physical appearance. Neither do the majority of southern Negroes nor the majority of the whites approve of the present program to disrupt a custom which has served both races well down through the years and contributed so much to the Negro's economic security.

"Just what would be the future educational status of the Negro in the South if the legislatures of all of the Southern States would enact legislation withdrawing State financial support from all schools of higher learning, starting at the high-school level? Not only is this possible but if it should come to pass, the Negro would be unable to finance his own educational program. Negro-financed educational programs have been a failure in the past and nothing miraculous has happened which would cause a normal person to assume that the future holds any better prospect.

"Years ago southern Negro educators made annual pilgrimages to the North to raise funds for the support of their schools and this practice continued until northern philanthropists found out that the Negro educators were the beneficiaries instead of the schools. The AME Church, the Baptists, the Presbyterians, and some other minor denominations have been active in the field of Negro education, but their achievements have been nothing to write home about. Not only that, but every year charges have flown thick and fast anent the misappropriations of school funds. The operation of Negro schools has not only produced some of the Nation's juiciest scandals but is a damaging reflection of the Negro's integrity and his ability to operate and finance an educational program."

WHITE DOLLARS

"No race or nationality in this Nation has excelled or equaled the Negro in educational attainment and achievement, but this educational opportunity was not only created by white dollars but has been financed by white people throughout the Nation. It is an unfortunate fact, that Negroes contribute very little to their own community well-being and improvement and this fact should be taken into account by these agitators before they initiate their program for demands in the field of education.

"Instead of spending thousands of dollars to finance unnecessary court fights for privileges which will cost the race millions in lost valuable friendships and racial good will, our leaders should go into the Negro ghettoes and force the local grocer to carry prime meats and sell to our people grade A products which will make us healthy.

"I lived in Newark, N. J., one of the supposedly liberal cities, and it is impossible to find prime beef or grade A cuts of any kind of meat in the Negro sections of the city. This situation is true throughout the United States. Grocers in Negro communities carry the most inferior brands.

"Go into any Negro community and the meat market windows are filled with cheap, inferior smoked and salt meats. Some of it was put through some curing process after it had gone bad.

"It is no wonder that the death rate is so high among Negroes. When one considers the food situation plus inadequate housing, it is a wonder that the death rate is not higher.

"It appears to me that our leaders should direct their efforts toward correcting these abuses which are undermining our very existence. And these abuses are not practiced against us by white people alone; our own people are just as bad.

"Negro restaurants buy the cheapest food, and charge the highest price. Last week on a tour of five States I was not able to get a decent cup of coffee. Some of the coffee sold to me looked like mud and tasted worse.

"It is very apparent to me that the Negro leaders of this Nation have a distorted sense of real values. They appear to be more interested in breaking down racial barriers and conducting their campaigns of agitation, in spreading hate, than in spending their energies and money toward the attainment of a better way of life."

IMPRESSED BY SOUTH

"I was in Atlanta last week and was greatly impressed by the large number of outstanding and progressive Negro businesses. Atlanta is strictly a segregated city. I was in several New England cities this week where there is not supposed to be any segregation, and I found not one creditable Negro business.

"The only owned and operated Negro radio station is not in New York, but in Atlanta. Segregation has not only given the Negro in the South an opportunity to carve his industrial and economic destiny, but it has forced him to the fore as the most substantial and economically secure Negro in the world.

"The Negro in New York, Newark, and other supposedly liberal centers may enjoy the privilege to eat where he pleases or go to any theater or public place of amusement, but a Negro can't get a license to operate a liquor package store, and there are any number of fields that he can't enter business in other eastern and northern cities. But this is not true in the South; a Negro can enter any kind of business he wishes and southern whites will even lend the money. Some of the largest contractors in the South are Negroes.

"Northern Negro dollars spent to force southern white universities to admit Negroes will certainly not contribute anything toward continued good race relations in the South, and race relations were definitely on the improve until all of these school suits started.

"I find more race prejudice in the East than I have found in Georgia or Mississippi. Two weeks ago 10 tourist camps refused to rent me a cabin just outside of Pittsburgh, and Pennsylvania is one of the first States to enact a civil-rights law.

"If the NAACP is really interested in correcting a real evil in the school situation, then it should direct its efforts toward the schools in Harrisburg, the capital of Pennsylvania, which is a little closer than the nearest southern school target.

"The American race situation has not only taken on added alarming proportions but has developed into a serious problem which could explode and create a national crisis. Instead of trying to find peace in Korea and in other foreign lands, our leaders, both white and colored, should try to find a panacea for these racial ills and establish peace at home before advocating it abroad. We are not in a position to teach the other fellow how to establish unity in his bailiwick when we don't have it in our own."

Woodrow Wilson and His Clients

OF
HON. BURR P. HARRISON
OF VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, November 30, 1950

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix, I include an editorial by Norman Cousins entitled "Woodrow Wilson and His Clients," which appeared in the September 23 issue of the Saturday Review of Literature.

The recollection of Wilson's part in the continuing crusade for a world of law and order is appropriate, I think, as free men face what would seem to be their last grim chance to achieve that ideal.

The editorial follows:

WOODROW WILSON AND HIS CLIENTS

Monday, September 25, is the thirty-first anniversary of one of the saddest and most costly days in American history. It was on that day that Woodrow Wilson made his last public speech. He was fighting to win over the American people to the cause of the League of Nations, for he was convinced that the war just ended would become merely the opening episode of a continuing tragedy if the nations failed to establish world law. And the biggest test was right here in America. Public opinion was slow in seeing the connection between world peace and world law. Traditionally, too, the American people had been accustomed to waiting for a problem to come to a boil before doing anything about it. Wilson's case rested on the need to anticipate crisis as the best means of crushing it.

Imagine the unutterable anguish of the man who had managed to convince millions of people all over the world of this, only to return home to find that leaders of the opposing political party had been capitalizing on the desire of Americans to forget about the war, forget about Europe, forget about involvements. And the campaign against the League was succeeding. Hence Wilson's decision to carry the fight for peace to the people. It was to be a tour that would attempt to crack open the isolationist heartland. The compressed schedule called for about 100 speeches before audiences in almost every State stretching from Ohio to the west coast—all in a few short weeks.

The best account of that trip—Wilson's last public trip—is to be found in a compelling and evocative book, Woodrow Wilson as I Know Him, by Joseph P. Tumulty, his confidant and friend who served as private secretary for 11 years. The book appeared in 1921 and is now out of print, but it is hoped that the publishers can be persuaded to bring out a new edition, for what it has to say is even more timely today than it was a generation ago.

Tumulty wrote that the small group around Wilson resisted the idea of the trip as soon as it became known. The President had returned from Europe showing the effects of his exertions. He was suffering from violent headaches and was easily fatigued. When an attempt was made to postpone the trip, Wilson would have none of it. He told Tumulty that he knew he was "at the end of my tether," but insisted that a desperate effort had to be made to win over the American people in time.

"If the treaty should be defeated," he said, "God only knows what would happen to the world as a result of it. In the presence of the great tragedy which now faces people everywhere, no decent man can count his own personal fortunes in the reckoning."

Tumulty suggested a compromise. Set aside 1 week in the tour for a rest at a quiet place in the Grand Canyon. Even this the President rejected. "This is a business trip, pure and simple," he insisted, "and the itinerary must not include a vacation of any kind."

The trip got under way. As it progressed, Wilson seemed somehow to find a magical second wind that enabled him to speak three, four, or even five times a day, seven days a week. Tumulty and the President's staff marveled at his ability to mask his fatigue while talking. Never had they heard him more eloquent or more convincing. Many of the talks were extemporaneous but they all reflected Wilson's great talent for clarity and precision of thought and expression.

And Wilson's message was getting across. It was hard work but you could see the people responding to the call for sanity and the need to put decency to work in dealings among nations. There were hopes in the President's party that the encouraging early reactions would reach a crescendo by the time the tour ended. When the President spoke at Pueblo on September 25 he was more impassioned and effective than ever. It was a longer talk than usual, and it almost seemed that Wilson realized it might be his last. As he spoke the audience was deeply moved by what he said but they were also moved by his frail appearance. It was easy to see that something was wrong; his face clearly showed the effects of the constant strain not only of the trip but of his labors overseas for the League.

He began his Pueblo talk by saying that he had come to speak in behalf of his clients. Those clients, he said, were the next generation. He wanted to be sure that the measures would be taken here and now that would make it unnecessary for that next generation to be sent on another war errand. He spoke of the hundreds of American mothers who came up to grasp his hand during his trip—mothers whose sons had been killed in France. They had said, many of them, "God bless you, Mr. President."

"Why, my fellow citizens," he asked, "should they pray God to bless me? I advised the Congress of the United States to create the situation that led to the death of their sons. I ordered their sons overseas. I consented to their sons being put in the most difficult parts of the battle line, where death was certain, as in the impenetrable difficulties of the Argonne forest. Why should they weep upon my hand and call down the blessings of God upon me? They do so because they believe that their boys died for something that vastly transcends any of the immediate and palpable objects of the war. They believe that wrapped up with the liberty of the world is the continuous protection of that liberty by the concerted powers of all the civilized world.

"These men were crusaders. They were going forth to prove the might of justice and right, and all the world accepted them as crusaders. Their achievement has made all the world believe in America as it believes in no other nation in the modern world."

The President spoke of his visit to a hillside near Paris, at the cemetery of Suresnes, where American soldiers were buried. He then referred to the many men in Congress and public life who were now opposing the creation of a world society which, if all nations joined in giving it real authority, might be able to crush the causes of war, and he said he hoped these men might have been with him to see those graves.

"I wish," he said, "that they could feel the moral obligation that rests upon us not to go back on those boys, but to see the thing through, to see it through to the end, and make good the redemption of the world. For nothing less depends upon this decision, nothing less than the liberation and salvation of the world.

"Now that the mists of this great question have cleared away, I believe that men will see the trust eye to eye and face to face. There is one thing that the American people always rise to and extend their hand to, and that is the truth of justice and of liberty and of peace. We have accepted that truth and we are going to be led by it, and it is going to lead us, and through us the world, out into pastures of quietness and peace such as the world never dreamed of before."

As the President spoke, Tumulty looked around and could see the impact of his words. Hard-boiled newspapermen who had sat dry-eyed through the previous speeches were now visibly moved. He looked at Mrs. Wilson and saw tears in her eyes. The thousands of people in the large amphitheater were responding to moral leadership.

But the tour was never completed. Late that night, the night of the Pueblo speech, Dr. Grayson, the President's physician, summoned Tumulty. The President was seriously ill. His left side was paralyzed. One side of his face was limp and expressionless. His left arm and left leg failed to respond to stimulus. The searing headaches that were an old story throughout the tour now held the President's mind in a steel-like grip.

The western trip was over. Woodrow Wilson had fought and lost.

For at least 15 years Americans gave little thought to this defeat. All during the twenties and into the thirties it was fashionable to view Wilson kindly but somewhat skeptically. He was a great idealist, we said patronizingly, a great idealist who never realized we lived in a practical world. The word "impractical" became his epitaph.

But during the Second World War and, indeed, in the years immediately preceding the war the realization grew that Wilson was perhaps the most practical man of his time, for he had addressed himself to the basic needs of America and the world both. He spoke of ideals, certainly, for he believed that ideals were our natural assets and, in time of emergency, our finest weapons. Our failure to act on those ideals in time resulted in countless thousands of Woodrow Wilson's "clients" going on another war errand.

And what about Woodrow Wilson's ideals today? There is a United Nations, and the United States has accepted the responsibilities of membership. But is the United States exercising the type of leadership in the United Nations that can yet achieve world law? There are signs that we are, as in Korea. But there are also signs that the United States is still hypnotized by the false slogans of sovereignty, still willing to shelter the fallacy that world law can operate without compulsory obligations and commitments. We are reluctant to talk about the ideal of world citizenship, though it could be the most effective salient there is against Russian ideology. When we talk about ideals we mumble them somewhat incoherently, as though they are uncomfortable on our lips.

When Wilson spoke ideals he was not self-conscious, he did not stammer, he was not apologetic. He was representing the strength of America as he understood it and as history had confirmed it. We do not honor his memory unless we also honor his convictions. At the heart of those convictions was the belief that vision—vision with spaciousness and moral grandeur—is not only the solvent of potential danger but the natural setting for a human community at peace.

Address by Attorney General of the United States at Midcentury Homecoming Convocation of Western Maryland College

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HERBERT R. O'CONOR
OF MARYLAND

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, December 1 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. O'CONOR. Mr. President, on November 18, 1950, Hon. J. Howard McGrath, Attorney General of the United States, and formerly a distinguished member of the United States Senate, delivered an address before the midcentury homecoming convocation of Western Maryland College, at Westminster, Md., which truly deserves to be brought to the attention of all the people of the country.

The occasion furnished an auspicious setting for the trenchant remarks of the chief legal officer of the United States. Western Maryland College, in its many years of service to the people of Maryland and of the entire area, has made a contribution to the progress of our people and to the advancement of culture and enlightenment which is everywhere apparent in the splendid group of alumni, many of them now occupying prominent positions in the professions, in business and industry, and in public affairs. Hon. F. Murray Benson, chairman of the board of the college, and an outstanding attorney of Maryland, presided.

In his address Attorney General McGrath reviewed the changes in the economic, political, and social fields which have occurred during the half century just coming to a close and rightly singled out dictatorships in general and communism in particular as the most menacing of all the many problems facing the world today.

It was an address that invites the most thorough attention and consideration of all who had the pleasure to hear it or who will be privileged to read it.

I ask unanimous consent, therefore, that it be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

President Ensor, Senator O'CONOR, distinguished guests, members of the board of trustees, alumni, students, and friends of Western Maryland College, I deem it a great honor to be here with you this morning and participate in your observance of an occasion, unusual and extraordinary—your midcentury and home-coming convocation—even though I am here in a pinch-hitting role. I regret that illness has prevented you from hearing the distinguished Vice President of the United States, the Honorable ALBEN W. BARKLEY, who had eagerly looked forward to this visit with you, but who, on his physician's orders, is unable to do so. In all frankness, and with a deep and sincere sense of humility, I can never hope to match his forensic ability, his oratorical flawlessness and his bottomless source of wit and wisdom. I know you all join me in wishing him a very speedy and complete recovery.

It is fitting and proper that in the midst of a century which, judging by its first half, will be recorded in the annals of mankind as the most momentous in history, we pause at a meeting of this sort to examine and evaluate the events of the past half century, to assess the state of our civilization of today, to take inventory of all our values, and to endeavor to plan for the next 50 years. I am particularly impressed by your characterization of this gathering as a convocation as well as a homecoming. The term "convocation" owes its origin to the ancient assemblies of the clergy of the Church of England and later to all ecclesiastical councils. While a college homecoming is a happy event in the life of an alumnus, in enabling him to return to his alma mater, to revisit the scenes of a happy youth, to renew old acquaintances, to reminisce in joyful experiences, enrich memories, and renew allegiance to a beloved institution, a convocation connotes a serious tone to an assemblage. The state of world affairs necessitates sober reflection at any gathering these days.

As we reflect upon the 50 years which now have fleeted, we know that we have witnessed during those years the most revolutionary changes in economic, political, and social phases of human endeavor. The technological and mechanical progress of the past half century has far surpassed all that has been achieved in this respect throughout the centuries before 1900. Only by a proper comprehension of this phenomenon will we be able to evaluate our present stake in civilization and plan for the world of the future. You are all familiar with the enormous advances made in the sciences, in the arts, in the fields of medicine, transportation, and communication.

These mechanical and technological advancements have resulted in creating a complex and most confusing civilization. The entire universe has become one small neighborhood. But alas, we have not kept pace morally and spiritually. We have not as yet learned to live as close neighbors. We have made little, if any, progress in the vital field of human relationship. That is why our world of today is a welter of confusion and of fear. That is why we are living in a very critical epoch, which sees our democratic way of life in very grave danger of being completely destroyed. These are seething days in the lives of all. The earth has been contracted by the discoveries of man, but his power to control it has correspondingly been contracted.

Communism in its true essence is a real menace and danger to our institutions. There are over 2,000,000,000 people in the world, and over one-third—700,000,000—are enslaved by the self-made masters of a brutal totalitarian regime. Moreover, the reckless and irresponsible threat of atomic power and its secrets have added to our tension and fear of these diabolic enemies of freedom. This hour is a crucial hour in world history. We are living through a period when dangerous and powerful forces seek to test the enduring power of democracy as a form of government.

We have watched with growing alarm the series of events which have brought much of the world under the domination of these ruthless dictatorships. The present world crisis must be viewed in its true light—a threat of the most serious character to the democratic way of life as we know and cherish it.

World events have hurled our beloved country into a position of world leadership. Our responsibility in this respect is no longer confined to one continent. Enslaved humanity everywhere looks upon us as the citadel of all human liberties—their only beacon of hope. We must not and shall not fail. We have throughout our history met many threats and challenges to our liberties, and we must be prepared now to meet the most serious of all.

The danger we are now facing will require greater sacrifices than ever were demanded of us. It is not enough to gird ourselves with weapons of war and defense. It will not suffice to make our country an arsenal of weapons for democracy. It must also become the arsenal of things moral and spiritual, the weapons by which we shall be enabled to chart the tortuous road to world peace and universal brotherhood. We must provide, strengthen, and maintain the institutions which will train and educate the leaders who will be able to disseminate these moral and spiritual forces which alone can serve as catalytic agents in forging and molding our democratic system into an indestructible tower of freedom, good will, and justice.

Our hopes of avoiding disaster are in our ability to mobilize to the utmost our skill in the political and ideological fields, as well as the economic and military. We shall win only if we succeed in inculcating in ourselves the basic principles upon which our Nation was founded and which are responsible for its greatness. We shall be successful in establishing a just and merciful society if we can educate our people to discriminate between the true and the false, the genuine and the spurious. We must, in short, continue to strive for a high standard of education.

We must realize that whatever conflict exists is not primarily one between Russia and the United States, or between east and west, or between communism and capitalism as economic systems, as is so commonly said. It is far deeper than any of these. It is a conflict between two totally different philosophies of government. One believes that man's problems can only be solved from the top down; the other believes that most problems can best be solved from the bottom up. One puts its primary faith in a few supposed supermen—leaders—at the top; the other puts its primary faith in the good sense, resourcefulness, and capabilities of ordinary people, who are masters in their own houses and are able to choose their own representatives in genuinely free elections.

In reality, it is a conflict between two wholly different philosophies of life—two different concepts as to the nature of man; which means two different concepts as to the nature of God, and the nature of the universe in which we live.

To be victorious in this conflict we need a strong and deep faith in the indestructibility of our institutions and a renewed dedication to its principles. What our Nation and the world must have, if they are to be saved, is what Lincoln prayed for at Gettysburg—"Under God, a new birth of freedom"—a new understanding of that priceless privilege.

Moreover, to comprehend and thus be able to solve the complex and difficult problems facing us today, even in our own economic, social, and political world, we need increased knowledge. We must understand these difficulties and we must be equipped to think through their solutions. That is why our institution of learning assumes such importance today. The kind of intellectual training our youth receives today will determine the nature of our course in the life to come. That will resolve whether the world will remain free or slave.

We must have more of our men and women trained to think and lead. We must multiply the number of our men and women in public and private life, who have been disciplined to think for themselves clearly. That is why the American college, and especially the independent private college, plays so cogent a part in our plans for our march to freedom.

Such institutions are best able to instill in our youth the true essence of democracy, namely, that it is a personal way of life and a system of social and political organization; that it is a positive and not a negative philosophy; that it is a way of life that is of real worth and satisfaction; that it represents the sum total of ideals which must find expression in the lives of all human beings; that only through its processes can we achieve enlightened government.

Such institutions are best qualified to supply the trained leadership we need so sorely in this war of survival. The 600 small private colleges are best equipped to produce such qualified leaders. These leaders must be thoroughly educated in their responsibilities, and colleges like western Maryland have done so in the past and will, with your unstinted help and cooperation, continue to do so on a greater scale.

America needs today a generation of pioneers—American youth equipped and trained in such colleges as yours and mine, to explore and develop new frontiers of better human relationships, a more enduring world peace, a happier and safer world order.

It will be the function of our schools and colleges to serve as vehicles for the transmission of the recognized moral values which are basic to the maintenance of our civilization. While educators may differ as to the methods, the common objectives of all institutions of learning must be the reinforcement of ethical standards in the traits of honesty, integrity, and loyalty of our society. But our schools and colleges necessarily must also teach the methods by which a democracy can be maintained.

Since a democracy is based on truth, it is the function of the academic world to lead in the dissemination of truth so that the world will know what the daily world events signify. The sacred flame of freedom which is now in danger of being extinguished will continue to burn only so long as the academic world will steadfastly uphold its position as trustee of all those true values which mankind recognizes as the component elements of a real democracy. All educators and all institutions of learning must join hands in the endeavor to see to it that freedom shall not perish from this earth. There are too many citadels of ignorance on this earth, and like all citadels they cannot be taken by a frontal assault; they can only be taken by long-seige operations. The college tradition is a symbol of unity of civilization because truth is universal.

Daniel C. Gilman, the first president of Johns Hopkins University, summed up his conception of an ideal university—that it should function for "the advancement of learning, the conservation of knowledge, the development of talent, the promotion of spirituality, the cultivation of literature, the elevation of professional standards and the maintenance of repose." Every true university and college should serve those purposes.

I submit that the small private independent college is best equipped to enable a student to fulfill these purposes within its institutional environment. Within the precincts of a small college, it is easier for the average student to acquire those traits which enable him to benefit most from such an institution. Smallness is an advantage in the production of leadership because smallness tends to induce greater individual participation. In fact, individual interests initiating action in all matters that relate to man's contact with his fellow men generally seem to vary in inverse ratio to the numbers involved. This evident truth is manifest on an examination of the activities and thinking in small towns, small organizations, and small colleges.

The importance of the small private, independent college in our educational process cannot be overemphasized. It is surprising, but nevertheless true, that the larger percentage of the men and women listed in Who's Who attended small, independent colleges, rather than large universities. In a small college members of the faculty, who have such a profound influence on the student body and who in many instances often mold the personality of the student, are better able to maintain contact with their students as individuals and thus are able to discover and develop qualities that would remain hidden if those students were members of a huge student body. In small colleges, it is almost impossible for any student to remain aloof and apart from his fellow student body. There is greater opportunity for him or her to participate in the activities of the college, to make more intimate friendships, and thus derive greater benefit from his college education, curricular and extracurricular. No wonder we who have attended small colleges re-echo the immortal words of Daniel Webster, uttered in the Supreme Court of the United States when, in his closing argument in the Dartmouth College case, he said: "It is, sir, as I have said, a small college, and yet there are those who love it."

I say we, because I, too, was fortunate in obtaining my college education in a small private independent institution, Providence College. I know from my personal experience of the influence and the real nature of the training afforded by such institutions. Like Western Maryland College, my college was also affiliated with one of the great Christian churches, and while not the same denomination as Western Maryland, it basically, as a church-related college, stressed in its curriculum the moral concepts of life.

After all, university and college education in this country traces its origin to religious influences. Harvard University, the first college founded in this country in 1636, was founded for the purpose of training men in the clergy. That is true in the case of many other of the great universities and colleges of this country.

If we are to survive the ordeal of the present and future, our citizens must not only be able to think for themselves, but must blend their thoughts with the exercise of a moral idealism more elevated than any held by past generations. Sheer shrewdness will not be enough; it must be transformed by philosophic and religious insight into genuine moral responsibility. The two distinct capacities of the human mind—informed intelligence and moral seriousness—must blend into one powerful urge toward a national and international amity that will make us brothers the world over.

That function can best be performed by the small private independent denominational college. The denominational college teaches that there is more to education than the acquisition of a mere knowledge of facts and things. Education there cultivates a sense of right and wrong, of virtue and vice. It provides for all its recipients acknowledged principles of conduct, the secure habit of a good life based upon correct teaching and consistent example. It teaches just compliance with divine will. Moral facts are not ignored but are combined and commingled with every phase of human knowledge. It places high and above knowledge of facts, a love for God's moral law, a profound reverence and respect for those age-old sound and solid principles of complete and wholesome living that from time immemorial have been the mainstay of a decent life in every age and generation.

Such a school is Western Maryland College. From all I have heard, read and know about your institution, it has since its founding by the Methodist denomination in 1867 fulfilled the expectations of its founders and has served to provide the elements of a sound college education. It was the first coeducational institution south of the Mason and Dixon's line. It has for many years been a recognized leader in training teachers for the high schools of the great Free State of Maryland. It is also significant that it has had an active ROTC infantry unit since 1919 and thus has contributed its share toward the supply of military officers so necessary to the defense of our country. Indeed, in proportion to its numbers, Western Maryland College had more officers in the last World War than any other institution of learning.

In this connection, it is worth noting that though denominational in character, its doors have been open to all regardless of race, color, or creed. As a matter of fact, as I have been reliably informed, the numbers of non-Methodist students exceed those of Methodist affiliation. As in most other denominational schools I know of, there is not a breath of discrimination or favoritism because of religious affiliation. I myself was privileged to receive my legal education at Boston University, also first founded in 1867, as a Methodist school of theology. Throughout my years of attendance there, I was never made to feel that my church affiliations put me in a different category of treatment. I was an equal of all in every respect.

That is why colleges like Western Maryland should receive the unstinted support of all its alumni and friends. Inflationary costs have made it difficult for small institutions of this type to maintain their high standards. Your program to be launched today for the increase of your endowment to one and one-half million to improve facilities of this great school will, I am sure, receive your enthusiastic support. As a public official and servant, I feel duty-bound to exhort you to give generously to this institution because in my humble opinion the greatest beneficiary of an independent college like yours is the general public.

I salute you and wish you every success in your campaign. As the century rolls round, may this college grow in influence and in satisfaction to the people who support it. As you gather here today, and rededicate yourselves to the noble ideals for which this institution was founded, resolve to make every effort to the end that those ideals can be maintained for many years to come. With the passage of time, you will develop a deep and intense feeling of gratitude to this little college which you will endeavor to repay throughout your entire life. You will discover that the more you try to give yourself to your college, the more you will find yourself in its debt.

In a sense, we are all today pioneers, building a structure and erecting the heart of a new civilization which will lay the foundation for a greater new age. We Americans have the vision, the skill, the courage, and the faith to make it so. With God's help, we shall do it.

The Significance of Korea

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. H. ALEXANDER SMITH
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, December 1 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. President, on the 15th of October, which was Layman's Sunday, I delivered an address entitled "The Significance of Korea" at Calvary Episcopal Church, Gramercy Park, New York.

I ask unanimous consent that this address be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Today, as it becomes clear that our forces under the United Nations have the power to defeat the Communist aggressors in Korea, it becomes vitally important that we apply ourselves to the question: "What is the significance of the Korean episode?"

This is not merely a military question, nor is it a question confined to any one area of the world. It is a world-wide question involving not only military problems but also, and equally, political problems, psychological problems, and moral probems.

By saying this I do not in any way minimize the crucial importance of the military considerations involved in the battle for Korea and in our whole world position. We must face the fact that our military defenses around the world, in the face of possible new "Koreas" elsewhere, are dangerously thin. They must be built up with all possible speed.

But we must not allow ourselves to become completely preoccupied with battles and weapons. Military preparations and military victories, by themselves, cannot secure either peace or freedom. There is another kind of preparation we must make, and another kind of victory we must win, if our struggle against aggression in Korea is to have any meaning at all. We must prepare, and we must carry through to a victorious conclusion, a political and psychological program for all the world—a program worthy of our heritage of freedom and morality.

Our great need is not for a war program, but for a peace program.

The vital importance of spelling out this peace program becomes obvious if we ask ourselves this simple question: "What are we fighting for in Korea?" We cannot shrug off this question with the answer that we are fighting for our lives, for mere survival, or for peace. We could have life, survival, and peace—of a sort—merely by yielding meekly to Communist aggression. Such a peace would be the peace of a world-wide Communist prison. Any American would rather die than live in it.

Therefore it is our duty to set forth a program making plain to ourselves and to all the world what kind of life and what kind of peace we insist on. Only such a program can give a convincing and inspiring answer to the persistent questions in the minds of war-weary people everywhere: "Why should we join with you? Why should we risk our lives? Why should we fight communism? What stake have we in this struggle of yours?"

The program we develop must be such that any man of good will who sees it, anywhere in the world, will immediately recognize that our struggle is also his struggle, that he can have no hesitation whatever in throwing in his lot with us and not with communism. If this is to be so, it must be founded on a central principle which (1) is true to our national character and traditions; (2) has a powerful meaning for human beings everywhere; and (3) is the spiritual challenge to the appeal of the Communists.

I know of only one such principle. It breathes through the entire political and spiritual history of our great western civilization. It expresses the deepest longings of human beings in Europe, in Asia, in the Americas, everywhere in the world. It has been ruthlessly violated and obliterated wherever communism has come to power.

It is nothing less than the eternal message of human freedom under God.

So I suggest that this message of freedom must be made the message of America to the world. This thought is so inevitable, so apparently obvious, that it seems amazing that we have not yet carried it into effect. I think the reason is partly that we ourselves, living in an atmosphere of freedom, have tended to take it for granted. We have not realized what a tremendously powerful force this idea of freedom can be in the lives of other peoples who have not possessed it as we have, and who yet have enough knowledge of it to make them aspire to be free. But whatever the reason may be, our voice in the world has not even begun to speak clearly enough or powerfully enough on this magnificent theme.

As a result, we have allowed other impressions of American life and American policy to grow up in foreign countries—impressions which would astonish us who have lived all our lives in America, and which do not do us credit. Here are some of them:

1. America is the land of materialism. It is dominated by big business and Wall Street. Its people are fabulously wealthy and care nothing for the things of the spirit. They look down on other peoples who are poor.

2. America is the land of crime and gangsters and mob violence.

3. America is the land of the white man, the friend of European imperialists. Its people believe in the enslavement or exploitation of colored races.

4. America is planning to launch a great war against Russia and wants to use the little peoples of the world as cannon fodder in this war.

Most of these impressions have been built up by the ruthless Communist propaganda, but some of them are partly of our own making. To counteract them, Americans, both at home and abroad, must show in their personal conduct a clearer devotion to the cause of freedom for all human beings. But this by itself is not enough.

Freedom must also be the very backbone of American foreign policies throughout the world. As I see it, the main points of our policy flowing from this idea of freedom must be:

1. The peaceful achievement of independence, self-government, and unity for all peoples. This applies equally to peoples now in a state of colonial dependency and to peoples held under the brutal sway of Russian Communist tyranny.

2. Long-range international programs, carried out primarily through the United Nations, for the economic development of backward areas and their liberation from poverty, disease, and ignorance.

3. Continued unqualified support for the United Nations as a force for peace, and determined efforts to strengthen it for that role and to admit all free and independent nations to membership in it.

4. The building up of our military strength and the military strength of the free nations, in order to make it clear to the Russians and their satellites, including Communist China, that if they touch off a full-scale war they will bring utter destruction upon themselves. For this purpose we should urge early establishment of a powerful and mobile United Nations police force.

5. Constantly repeated proof, by both word and deed, that we in the United States have faith in the possibility of avoiding another world war; that we will never launch such a war ourselves; that we believe in peace and are building for peace.

Having set forth these great aims, we can then implement them in a definite peace program for Korea, and thus clearly tell our people and the world not only what we are fighting against in Korea—that is clear enough—but what we are fighting for.

Our program for Korea can be clear and simple. It must provide for surrender and disarming of the Communist forces; abolition of the Communist puppet regime; unification of the whole country; free nationwide elections, supervised by the United Nations, to establish the authority of the Republic of Korea on a basis of free self-government throughout Korean territory; United Nations aid to repair the ravages of war; a UN security force to guard Korea from further invasion or subversion; and admission of Korea to membership in the United Nations.

If the United Nations, with American support, can achieve this much for Korea, we will have established a pattern for action later in other areas, ultimately in China and in all the other unhappy areas which have fallen under Soviet control. The elements of such a pattern would be United Nations action for independence and self-government, for relief and rehabilitation where necessary, and for physical security against aggression. The spirit of such a pattern would be the spirit which animates our entire foreign policy—the spirit of human freedom.

Our action for Korea, following the military defeat of the Communists there, can be the beginning of a great new era of American and United Nations statesmanship. The cost and the risks of following such a program will be great, not only for ourselves but for other peoples who are with us in this struggle. That is why it is so vitally important that we make clear our unswerving devotion to a cause whose fulfillment will be worth the cost and worth the risks—the cause of freedom for all humanity under God.

This sacred cause is woven into the entire fabric of our western heritage. It is the only goal for which we can fairly ask the peoples of the whole world to risk their lives. I know from personal observation how all the peoples of Asia are yearning to achieve a condition of freedom in which they can live their lives in dignity and self-respect. If we are to win the great moral struggle with atheistic communism, the mortal enemy of freedom everywhere, it is up to us to bring this message of freedom to the whole world.

That is why I have greeted with such great enthusiasm the Crusade for Freedom movement which is being launched in this country under the leadership of General Eisenhower, Gen. Lucius Clay, former Ambassador Joseph Clark Grew, and other leading Americans. This crusade was effectively presented in this and other pulpits throughout the country last Sunday.

I hope also that our own Government's Voice of America program, whose mission is to inform the peoples of the world, will seize this challenge and make itself an ever more powerful Voice of Freedom, to bring our great message to all the spiritually hungry peoples of the world.

Let me sum up, then, briefly my own position in this important matter of our American foreign policy:

I have nothing but praise for the bipartisan cooperation in our Congress that brought about the constructive accomplishments of the Marshall plan and the collective security program of the Atlantic Pact. On the other hand, I am and have been a severe critic of the lack of policy of the administration in the Far East and the tragic mistakes that have led to the conquest of China by Russia's subversive underground methods of infiltration.

While I am wholeheartedly supporting the Marshall plan and the military assistance program in western Europe, I am convinced that mere military preparedness and economic rehabilitation are not enough at this time when the critical battle is for the minds of men and women. I shall continue vigorously to support the program of the so-called Voice of America and the battle to present to the other nations of the world the spiritual values of our western tradition. I will also support wholeheartedly the program to assist the backward nations of the world to get on their own feet economically, to meet the problems of starvation and human suffering, and to find their place in the family of nations. These are the constructive roads to peace that must be emphasized as equally important with the measure for collective security.

But if this program is to succeed there can be no compromise or half-way measures. I am unalterably opposed to the recognition of the Russian-controlled Chinese Communist Government in China and to the admission of the Chinese Communists to the UN. The Korean crisis has awakened us to the dangers in the world situation and has shown us the method by which Russia, using her satellites, is trying to conquer the world. Russia must be told in no uncertain terms that we understand now the dangers of her insidious propaganda, and that we through the UN propose to halt once and for all the further spread of communistic poison.

Let there be no compromise with the issue before the world. That issue is clearly the struggle between materialistic, atheistic totalitarianism as represented by the Communist movement, and freedom under God—the spiritual heritage of our western tradition. If we can succeed as bearers of this great message, we may well turn this century of destruction and despair into a century of hope and fulfillment.

This is the challenge to men and women of good will throughout the world.

This is the very special challenge to the Church of Christ.

Importance of Propaganda

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. MATTHEW M. NEELY

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, December 1 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article entitled "Importance of Propaganda," written by Frederick C. McKee, chairman of the Committee on National Affairs, which appeared in the Washington Post on the 19th of November.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

IMPORTANCE OF PROPAGANDA

The importance of propaganda in any war, hot or cold, cannot be overemphasized. "There are only two powers in the world: the sword and the spirit," said Napoleon. "In the long run, the sword is always defeated by the spirit."

This is emphatically the case in the present world-wide conflict between the forces of democracy and those of totalitarianism. It is a war of ideas as well as explosives, and its objective is to convince the underprivileged of the earth that they should embrace either democracy or communism. Guns can halt the physical advance of Communist-led soldiers, they can never halt the march of an idea, however erroneous.

In this war the side which uses words most effectively will triumph if the words are implemented by constructive action. The Russians know this; their appropriation for propaganda is greater than for any other item except armament. Since 1917 they have fought their major battles for the spread of neo-Marxism not with bombs but with words, not with guns but with verbal butter.

On our side we have been slow and reluctant to accept propaganda as a respectable and indispensable weapon; propaganda has long been a bad word in our vocabulary. Even today, as our State Department admits, we spend less in this field each year than does General Motors for its public relations. And because of an instinctive aversion to the employment of propaganda in world politics, we have neglected to train ourselves in its use.

The result? Up to now we have been losing the war of words. We have been placed, and kept, almost continuously on the defensive. A war cannot be won by defensive tactics alone.

Our selling campaign for the democratic concept has largely failed to reach its audience, partly for lack of funds, partly for lack of a grand strategy and the expert personnel to implement it. With all respect for their earnestness, those charged with operating our propaganda machine have not displayed a sufficient comprehension of the European and Asian mentalities. There is reason to believe that much of our barrage of words goes far over the heads of the depressed masses and bounces off the hard skulls of their masters.

We are the world's acknowledged leaders at selling gadgets, but we are laggard in selling democracy, perhaps because we are not ourselves entirely clear about the sales arguments for the product. To an intellectual, democracy means human rights and fundamental freedoms—free elections, free speech, and the like. But to an Asiatic who has never known civil liberties and whose greatest concern is keeping body and soul together, such talk is meaningless. He wants to know which system is going to keep him fed and clothed and housed and bring about an improvement in his condition. His requirements are fundamental: our propaganda to him must be equally basic. To win the underprivileged masses to the ways of freemen and in so doing to pull the fangs of totalitarianism, requires the application of the best brains backed by sufficient money.

What is specifically indicated is a new Government department or other agency of Cabinet stature, responsible directly to the President, as is the Economic Cooperation Administration, and closely coordinating its activities with the State Department. Its purpose should be to conduct an effective and amply financed world-wide propaganda campaign. It should be the sole governmental agency in this field. It should have teams of genuine experts and native talent in the sensitive political centers of the world shock troops who are familiar with the enemy's spiritual terrain and his methods of warfare, and who know what words will be most effective in winning away his support among the underprivileged. It should be represented by a full-time attaché in every American legation and embassy. It should supervise directly such material as publications, films, radio, etc., transmitted abroad by our Government. It should be headed by a man of unquestioned intellectual integrity and supreme intellectual capacity in the field of public relations, supported by the best staff obtainable without recourse to stuffed shirts or journalistic lame ducks.

The only way to win a war is to fight it; the only way to win a war of words is to produce and disseminate more and better words. We cannot lick communism by wishful thinking.

Universal Military Training

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
HON. EDWARD MARTIN
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, December 1 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a letter dated November 28, 1950, which I have received from Mr. Louis George Feldmann, department commander of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of Pennsylvania, on the subject of universal military training.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HON. EDWARD MARTIN,
United States Senate,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR MARTIN: For three consecutive decades, the Veterans of Foreign Wars of Pennsylvania, have implored the Congress of the United States to enact legislation that would provide universal military training, and through it, make available the necessary manpower to meet any national emergency that might arise, including full-scale war.

In July of this year, we again urged the Congress to adopt universal military training as a national defense policy.

In 30 years, the Congress has done nothing to make possible universal military training.

Today, the Department of Pennsylvania, Veterans of Foreign Wars wants you to consider with the utmost seriousness and without reservation whatever, and to take the solemn, probably final grave word of Gen. Douglas MacArthur, that "we are facing a new war."

It is not necessary for me to remind you of the countless and perhaps needless casualties the United States has again suffered in Korea, in a so-called "police action," that in reality is a war, simply because we were again unprepared in manpower to fulfill our obligations in that bleak country thousands of miles from the homes and hearths and loved ones of our youth fighting an apparent losing battle against overwhelming manpower odds.

It should not be necessary for me to remind you of your constitutional duty to defend to the utmost our Nation.

But, it does seem necessary, in view of what inevitably lies in the future, for me to solemnly remind you that we need enormous reserves of trained manpower to militarily protect ourselves from Soviet Russia's determination to destroy us.

So long as we remain weak in manpower, Communists everywhere can destroy us by gradual depletion of our resources, or by direct war. Choice of either is now theirs.

It is already past the time when Members of the Congress should have removed their heads from the sands and faced boldly as statesmen, not as politicians, the evident facts of our impending danger.

The Department of Pennsylvania of the Veterans of Foreign Wars no longer implores you to immediately provide a system of universal military training. We now demand that our Pennsylvania delegation in the Congress stop playing with national defense and our security and heed the word of General MacArthur that "we are facing a new war."

We suggest that all other proposed legislation be laid aside and adoption of universal military training be made the No. 1 priority at this short session of Congress, to make certain our Nation is secure from aggression and possible destruction.

Without security in terms of trained manpower, it eventually may not be necessary for you to enact taxes or pass lesser important legislation before doomsday actually arrives.

We have already wasted 30 years toying with universal military training plans. Our highest military leaders are of the opinion no more precious time must be wasted.

We ask you to confer with the leaders of your party. We want you to decide now on the measure best suited to meet our current and future manpower needs, then confer with leaders and members of your opposition, and between you finally agree upon a satisfactory bill that will give us universal military training within the quickest possible time.

Sincerely,
LOUIS GEORGE FELDMANN,
Department Commander.

Federal Judge J. Waties Waring

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. OLIN D. JOHNSTON
OF SOUTH CAROLINA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, December 1 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial appearing in one of the outstanding small newspapers in my home State of South Carolina. It is my belief that this editorial is extremely well written and should be drawn to the attention of people everywhere in this country so that they may know what we in South Carolina are having to endure as the result of the unprecedented action of a Federal judge who has sought to use his high office as a sounding board to express his antagonistic attitude toward the good citizens of South Carolina.

In my opinion, this man should not be allowed to wear the cloak of the high and esteemed office of Federal judge 1 day longer. No man of his caliber could render an unbiased decision in any case affecting the people of my State.

I desire to highly commend the Chester Reporter and its editor, James F. Tindall, for a job well done, and I hope that articles of this kind will serve as a good warning to the President of the United States that this judge is a danger to South Carolina and the Nation as a whole, and that he should be replaced without further delay.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JUDGE WARING

Judge Waring last week again revealed that he cannot by the slightest stretch of imagination be called a fair and impartial man, capable of thinking clearly and arriving at a just decision.

The case did not attract Nation-wide attention as has some of his past actions, but we think it one of the strongest cases against the judgment of the judge since his antagonistic attitude against the citizens of South Carolina began.

Briefly, this is what occurred. A rumor began in Summerville, near Charleston, that the judge had bought a home there and was planning on moving to the resort village. The publisher of the paper there, Jack Button, began investigating, finally placing a personal call to the judge.

The Federal judge, instead of acting like a rational man and stating that there was nothing to the rumor, launched into a tirade against Summerville, newspapermen in general in South Carolina, law enforcement in the State and in general against the citizens of the State. He acted like an untrained child in a tantrum, screaming and babbling into the telephone.

Judge Waring told Mr. Button that the rumor was a "lie, probably started by the Klan." He further said go ahead and publish it, as all newspaper men in the State published lies about him all the time. He further accused Mr. Button as being a member of the Klan, without even knowing the man and with no justification of such a statement whatsoever.

The judge proved by his vile attack and screaming conversation that he is not fit to sit on the bench, judging actions of others and making decisions on matters concerning the actions of citizens of this country.

First, the judge is very much uninformed and is making no attempt to become informed. If he would take the trouble to investigate the matter he would find that Mr. Button definitely is not a member of the Klan. The fact of the matter is that the newspaper publisher is one of the leaders in the lower part of the State in fighting the Klan. And the judge has had an opportunity to learn about this matter, as Mr. Button has personally mailed him a number of copies of his newspaper containing editorials denouncing the Klan.

Judge Waring was again wrong when he assailed the general field of newspapermen in the State as being companions of the Klan and guilty of telling lies on him.

The judge hit at an entire field of men who are constantly striving to search out the truth and get it before the public. The judge's claim that all the newspapermen in the State publish lies about him is untrue and definitely not a statement of a man with the capability of studying out a matter and making a just decision. We believe that the average newspaperman in the State is entirely unconcerned about the judge and his private life. However, they are concerned about a man of his capability sitting on the Federal bench.

We further believe that not a single newspaperman in the State holds against Judge Waring his decision in court giving the Negroes the right to vote in the State. Such a decision was inevitable and was bound to come sooner or later. The judge handed down the only decision he could and we believe that the average newspaperman in the State realizes this.

We admit that there has been a great deal written in the newspapers in this State and surrounding States about actions of the judge and his wife. But in practically every instance the stories came as the result of either he or his wife making statements to the press.

We personally know of three different instances when either the judge, his wife, or his secretary made long distance telephone calls to a newspaperman in North Carolina, giving this man stories of their actions. The bigoted judge or his wife in each instance instigated the publicity, which was faithfully written up as a true report on facts given this newspaperman.

Further, Judge Waring in each instance stated that he was giving the story to the North Carolina newspaperman instead of to a South Carolinian, saying that there were no enlightened citizens of the Palmetto State. If the judge had been the least bit smart he would have checked on this North Carolina citizen. He has lived in North Carolina only a few years. He was born and reared in South Carolina, attended a South Carolina school, and is a member of one of the oldest families in South Carolina. In short, the foolish judge was talking all the time to a decadent citizen of South Carolina.

We believe that Judge Waring, by his actions last week, proved definitely that his thoughts are governed by his emotions and not his mind. His statements and blanket denunciations of the South Carolina press definitely were not those of a rational man anxious to be just and trust. To our way of thinking a judge should make an attempt to see the entire picture of each and every situation. He should carefully investigate, weigh each detail carefully, and then try to reach a just conclusion.

He should not jump at every opportunity he has to castigate a group as a whole, denouncing everyone and not just those guilty of his alleged "lies" in the press. In short, the actions of Judge Waring convince us that he is not capable of making just decisions on the bench. Instead, any man ruled by his emotions and unbridled temper is liable at any time to do unrepairable damage while sitting in judgment of his fellowman. His eyes have been blinded by his rages and his actions are being governed by his foolish tirades against his fellow citizens of South Carolina.

The Threatened Destruction of Western Civilization

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. WILLIAM LANGER

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, December 1 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "Greatest Peril for United States," written by Hanson W. Baldwin, military expert for the New York Times, and published in the December 1, 1950, issue of that newspaper.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GREATEST PERIL FOR UNITED STATES—WESTERN CIVILIZATION FACES DESTRUCTION IF THREAT FROM EAST IS NOT MET BOLDLY

(By Hanson W. Baldwin)

The United States faces today the greatest danger in our history. Military, economic, or political destruction of western civilization and of our American way of life are definite possibilities if the danger from the east is not met boldly, imaginatively, and with united effort.

These conclusions are inescapable to this correspondent, who has just returned from thousands of miles of traveling to Korea, Japan, Formosa, Hong Kong, and French Indochina. The danger existed long before the recent Chinese Communist offensive in Korea; it has simply become more acute in the past few days. Americans in the Orient who were cognizant of the carefully planned strategy of the Chinese Reds of the close liaison that exists between Moscow and Peiping and of the immense military power of Red China backed by Russia have been amazed in recent weeks not only by the mistaken estimates in Tokyo but by the wishful thinking and unrealistic patter of some of the discussions in Washington and at Lake Success. To our troops in Korea fighting in some of the most terrible country in the world against the overwhelming manpower of the Orient the United States seemed to be living in a kind of "never never land."

Yet, the unparalleled danger of which Secretary of State Acheson has, at length, warned has existed in the Orient ever since United States troops were committed to the war in Korea. That danger increased as soon as we crossed the thirty-eighth parallel and grew when Gen. Douglas MacArthur—altering prior plans—sent our troops toward the Manchurian frontier north of the Sinanju-Song-jin line along which it had been expected we would hold our advance. Ever since the middle of August, when Chinese divisions crossed the Yalu, we have been at war with Red China. Thus today we are involved in precisely the type of war which we can never win, a land struggle on the Asiatic continent in a theater where no decision is possible against the hordes of Asia. The mistakes that brought us to this present crisis were numerous and major; some of them date back to World War II; others—particularly errors in intelligence and in judgment—have occurred during the past summer and fall.

NATION MUST BE UNITED

But this is no time to recapitulate errors; to err is human, and today the danger is too great to carp and criticize. There must be a united America, and we must face the situation as it is today and try to devise a strategy that will extricate us from our present completely untenable position in Asia.

To formulate wise policies we must first rid ourselves of certain basic misconceptions which still crowd our thoughts. The first and most important fact that must be understood is that the Chinese Communist government is Communist and not merely a new type of agrarian reformer. It is closely and intimately linked to Moscow; certainly during the present crisis the foreign policy of Stalin and Mao can be considered to be identical. Nor, in this observer's opinion, would any policy of recognition or appeasement have altered this relationship, at least for the immediate future. Over a long-term period it is possible, though by no means certain, that a kind of Chinese "Titoism" might develop. But no such schism could have been expected in time to alter the course of history in the future. The British policy of recognition of Peiping has gotten them nothing except some millions of profits in Hong Kong.

Today one inexorable fact dominates the development of history in the Orient; Mao and Stalin are playing as a team. Well before the Inchon landing the present Chinese Communist strategy in Korea and in French Indochina was carefully charted by Chinese and Russian leaders at a meeting in Peiping. The Russians promised, and have given, their support in arms, equipment, and advisers. Some Russian political and military advisers have even been present from time to time in Indochina and Czechoslovak arms plants are helping to supply the Communist followers of Ho Chi Minh in Indochina. Manchuria, and in that part of Siberia close to Korea, Russian forces have been mobilized and Russian equipment and help have greatly strengthened the Chinese Red armies.

AIMS OPEN TO QUESTION

What quid pro quo has been promised to China in return for her intervention in Korea and her help to Ho Chi Minh in Indochina is one of the great question marks of the Orient—possibly the inclusion of Korea and French Indochina in the Chinese zone of influence. The immediate objective of the Chinese Communist intervention in

Korea is also open to some question, but at the very least the enemy clearly plans to keep up fighting there indefinitely and the force of his present drive indicates he may have even greater ambitions—the destruction of the United Nations forces in Korea and our expulsion from the peninsula. And it is as true today as it was when we intervened in Korea in July that the Chinese Communists by sheer overwhelming weight of manpower can push us out of Korea any time they are willing to commit enough men to pay the price in lives—a cheap commodidity in the Orient.

The immediate objective in French Indochina is much the same as it is in Korea—to keep the French bleeding, to nibble off frontier posts, first the salient at Moncay, and later to overrun the whole rich rice area of the Red River delta with the key French towns of Hanoi and Haiphong. But the long-term objective in both these theaters—as in all other parts of the world—is clear and immutable; it is the conquest of the world by communism.

The second basic fact that must be faced if we are to emerge from our "never never land" of wishful thinking is that the modern Chinese Communist soldier is a good soldier—far different from the impressed, underfed Nationalist troops our officers tried to train during World War II. The Chinese Red Army is not the equal of western armies, man for man, in firepower or equipment, but it more than makes up for material deficiencies in numbers. The time for looking down our noses at the Chinese soldier has passed.

Hon. James W. Wadsworth

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LOUIS E. GRAHAM
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 1, 1950

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Speaker, when one has served in public life, almost continuously, since 1904 and then voluntarily retires after 18 years of service in the House of Representatives, the question may well be asked, What manner of man was this?

After graduating from Yale in 1898, JAMES W. WADSWORTH enlisted as a private, Battery A, Pennsylvania Field Artillery, and served in Puerto Rico. Then for a brief period he engaged in livestock and general farming.

First, elected member of the New York Assembly he served for 6 years in that body, five of those years as speaker of the assembly. For 12 years he served in the Senate of the United States, and on March 4, 1933, he began his service in this House. When he departs from our midst at the close of this session, only nine Members will remain who entered the House at the same time with him. And out of the 435 Members of that day only 36 remain.

Such are the mutations of time and circumstances. Mr. Speaker, no man has served with greater honor and distinction in the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States than has the Honorable JAMES W. WADSWORTH, of New York.

Full of days, riches, and honors, he retires to the quietude of domestic life, far removed from the anxieties, perplexities, and confusions of our modern public life and service.

To extol his virtues and achievements would be to paint the lily. His fame is secure in the record he has made. He leaves to his colleagues a memory of glorious achievement and to his fellow-citizens of this great Republic he bequeaths a heritage of splendid patriotism, of deep devotion to duty, of intense effort in behalf of the betterment of our country, and an inspiration to all Americans who desire to serve, protect, and defend our form of constitutional government. His like will not soon pass this way again.

Therefore, in paying tribute to the worth, achievements, and character of this splendid American we honor ourselves as well as our colleague. For we here testify to all the world and say in deep sincerity that "Here is a man." A man of whom America can be proud.

A man who served his country upon the battlefield in defense of its liberties, who presided over the deliberations of his own State assembly, who for 12 years performed the duties of United States Senator with fidelity and dispatch, and who, for the past 18 years has faithfully promoted the interests and welfare of the people of the United States in his capacity as a Member of the House of Representatives.

Well done, good and faithful servant, and may peace, contentment, and happiness attend the closing years of your useful life.

Operation of Golf Courses in the District of Columbia

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EARL T. WAGNER
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 1, 1950

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. Speaker, there has been some discussion in the press and in committees of the Congress regarding the operation of golf courses in the District of Columbia. These courses, now operated at a profit to the Government, have received frequent commendation from golf course operators elsewhere. From the day the present operator took over the courses to the present moment the records show the taxpayers have never paid a single cent for the operation of the local courses. Practically all the municipal courses operated by the various cities throughout the country are losing money, yet charge a higher fee than prevails here. The records also show that the present private operator of the District courses furnished most of the capital for the completion of the golf courses here and was repaid from earnings of the courses.

I have no interest in who operates golf courses anywhere, but I should like to call to the attention of my colleagues the thought that it might be well to examine the entire recreation program here before disposing of the services of a man who is actually turning some profits into the Federal Government through the operation of the public golf courses. I was amazed to learn that the agreement between Mr. S. G. Leoffler, the operator of the courses, and the Government provides that while the Government gets most of the profit the operator must pay all losses when and if they should occur.

For the present it might be best if those interested in a change of operation of the courses devote their time to the establishment of a USO or some other form of diversion for our Armed Forces visitors and thus allow the work-burdened Members of the Congress to devote their full efforts to the important tasks before it.

I submit for publication in the Appendix of the RECORD a letter on the subject of golf from one of the greatest authorities in the world on golf, Herb Graffis, editor of Golfdom:

Mr. HARRY T. THOMPSON,
Assistant Superintendent, United States Department of the Interior, National Capital Parks,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. THOMPSON: My observation of the public golf courses in Washington, D. C., area, is that the operation compares very favorably with most other metropolitan district golf operations.

The adverse soil and climatic conditions plus some original construction defects make the standard of Washington public course turf better, I believe, than could be normally expected unless there could be spent an amount that would involve a considerable raise in rates or a dip into the department budget.

Considering the rates that have prevailed in the Washington operation, I have my doubts that any private or political operator could have improved on the present situation and offhand I would have difficulty in naming even a few who might have equaled this performance.

It is fairly often the case that public-golf operations are self-supporting when the golfers by persistent protest manage to secure operation based on legitimate business balance of income and expense instead of political expediency.

In view of the public's increasing demand of public course facilities closely comparable with those of private clubs, but their reluctance to pay for the standard desired, the public course operators are due for plenty of headaches. Furthermore, as the number of golfers is steadily increasing and the younger people cannot afford private clubs, it's a sure thing that public officials' responsibility is that of providing facilities that are a bargain at the price.

According to my observation around the country, the Washington job has been well done.

Sincerely yours,
GOLFDOM,
HERB GRAFFIS, Editor.

Shipments to Communist China

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HERBERT R. O'CONOR
OF MARYLAND
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, December 1 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. O'CONOR. Mr. President, in order that Senators may be kept informed of developments in the matter, I ask unanimous consent that there be included in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Shipments to Red China," from the New York Times of November 27, 1950.

The question of policies regarding trade with such an avowed enemy as Communist China at the present time is one which transcends normal questions of trade policies and procedures. Judging from messages received, our people throughout the country cannot understand why our country should have supplied essentials of war to an enemy which is threatening our very existence.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

SHIPMENTS TO RED CHINA

The Department of Commerce has announced a meeting tomorrow with traders, bankers, and shippers at its regional office here in New York to discuss closer control of shipments of strategic materials to Communist China through United States ports. Senator HERBERT R. O'CONOR, of Maryland, hearing of this move, commented: "The Federal officials are now moving in the right direction; my only regret is that they did not act some time ago." A vast majority of Americans, we suspect, will be inclined to agree with the Senator.

Senator O'CONOR and his subcommittee have been doing a thorough job in investigating shipments to Red China. They have uncovered a number of cases that are nothing short of scandalous and have succeeded in preventing some shipments and transshipments. From the beginning of the investigation, however, the Department of Commerce has consistently defended its own laxity and usually, by inference, accused the Senator of exaggerating the gravity of the situation.

The Maryland legislator has now compiled a record of what he calls "huge" shipments of scrap rubber, steel, and oil to Communist China from west coast ports and from Japan that have gone forward since the start of hostilities in Korea. Full details of these shipments will now be laid before Defense Secretary Marshall with a request that he consider the possible dangers involved.

This request seems reasonable, to say the least. Active Chinese Communist intervention in the Korean hostilities, again critical with a renewed counter-thrust at the United Nations forces, make the supply of strategic materials to Peiping completely indefensible. The families of soldiers who have been killed or wounded by materials supplied by or through the United States will not take kindly to the suggestion that these shipments are of little importance.

The arguments that we must keep the trade door with Peiping open and that our common carriers have a right to carry what they please where they please are not valid in the face of the present situation. The Chinese Communist regime has made itself the enemy of the United Nations. Members of the United Nations have been called upon, in that organization's resolution, to refrain from giving any assistance to the enemy. At the time of the resolution the enemy was specifically North Korea. The Soviet Union did not see fit to comply with this resolution and the Chinese Communists have shown their contempt for the United Nations by open defiance.

Under those conditions the United States, as a loyal member of the United Nations, cannot do less than to see to it that all the loopholes in the strategic trade with Red China are plugged. This must be done now, and not after our casualty toll has become even more grievous. The actions that have been taken, as Senator O'CONOR has pointed out, have thus far been too little and too late. The executive offices will be well advised to stiffen their attitude and implement the policy that honor and prudence alike require.

The Internal Security Act—4

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ANDREW J. BIEMILLER
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, November 30, 1950

Mr. BIEMILLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am pleased to present the fourth of a series of editorials from the Milwaukee Journal on the Internal Security Act. The following editorial appeared on October 27:

THE INTERNAL SECURITY ACT—4

(This is the fourth of several editorials discussing the Internal Security Act of 1950, the so-called McCarran anti-Communist bill.)

The registration requirement of the Internal Security Act of 1950 offers the Communists a diabolical weapon for sowing distrust, consternation, and disunity throughout our Government and Nation.

The law requires Communist action groups to register and to list all their members with the Attorney General.

What would happen if, as Senator PAUL DOUGLAS, Democrat, Illinois, has speculated, the Communists registered a group and listed as members their opponents in government, in liberal groups throughout the country—men who have been victimized in Communist smears, people whose effective voice against communism might be discredited by any such false listing?

It would be a simple thing for Communists who openly quit the party to avoid registration—as some leaders of the fur workers' union have under the Taft-Hartley law—to testify that these falsely listed persons were Communists. It would be a simple thing for them to testify that they had met these people in cell meetings, that they had received information from them, that they had known them as Communists.

The security law, of course, provides penalties for false registration. But the penalties would be hard to impose. They could be fought through the courts for years, working untold hardship on those who were falsely registered. And for a Communist the penalties would be well worth risking in return for the havoc that false registration could create.

In a day when Communist smears have been all too common, an innocent person might have an almost impossible task disproving false charges of communism. The Attorney General has the duty to publish the names of registered persons after 30 days. If a person falsely registered could not disprove the charge within 30 days his name would be made public before he even had a hearing before the Subversive Controls Board. A reputation and a man's value as a Government official or employee could be ruined for all time by such registration, even though he could later prove in court that he was not a Communist.

The law could open the door for smears by Communists that could have serious results for hundreds of Americans, and for our Government.

To say that the Communists would not do such a thing would be to disregard the fact that Communists have proved themselves capable of anything. The mere fact that the law makes such an action possible points to the undesirability of the law as it stands.

The Communists have proved masters at creating division among their enemies. The new security law provides them with a perfect tool with which to cause confusion and to discredit those enemies.

Message From Methodist Commission on World Peace

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALEXANDER WILEY
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, December 1 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I have received an important spiritual document from Rev. Charles F. Voss, Jr., executive secretary of the Commission on World Peace of the Methodist Church, headquartered at 740 Rush Street, Chicago, Ill. This document is a message to Methodists in all lands which was adopted by the Commission on World Peace in its latest annual session in Chicago on November 16 and 17.

I believe that men and women of good will, no matter what their religious faith, will be profoundly interested in and stimulated by the message. Certainly we need more of the spiritual emphasis which is so abundant in this document, particularly now that we find ourselves so deep in a crisis at the edge of war. We may not agree with all of the contents of the message—I, for one, strongly question several parts and conclusions—but I commend the underlying effort of church leaders and laymen to find a solution of our problems through applied Christianity.

I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, the text of the Methodist Commission's controversial but significant statement, and that it be followed by a list of the membership of this distinguished commission which cooperates with the World Council of Churches and the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America.

There being no objection, the message and list were ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

A MESSAGE TO METHODISTS IN ALL LANDS, ADOPTED BY THE COMMISSION ON WORLD PEACE OF THE METHODIST CHURCH IN ANNUAL SESSION, CHICAGO, ILL., NOVEMBER 16–17, 1950

The millions of members of the Methodist Church live in many different lands, but we are parts of one universal Christian household of faith. Together we must seek to discover and interpret the will of one God for all men and help to make the kingdoms of this world become the united nations of our Lord.

As Christians we must keep before the public mind in all nations the fact that the application of Christ's Gospel will bring a new day, a new humanity more skilled to work together, and a new world in which men will have land and labor and liberty of speech and action. Christianity is the antidote to atheism.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

In highest loyalty to his own country, each Methodist holds responsibility for doing his best to save all nations from destructive war. To encourage international peace and understanding—

We must emphasize the Gospel of Christ as the hope of personal and international peace. The disorder of the world results from man's misdoing for which Christianity has the cure.

We must forsake the worship of jingoist national gods and worship the universal God of our Lord Jesus Christ.

We must show our good will by helping feed the world's hungry people. Surplus food in our nations can be shared with other more needy people to the good of all.

We must keep open the lines of communication between peoples. The hysteria of fear must not lead us to close our gates or our minds against the people from other lands.

We must help displaced persons to find homes and a new opportunity.

We must pray for one another in Christian love and by personal witness seek to build up a spirit of mutual trust and determined action for peace through world brotherhood.

WAR IS NOT INEVITABLE

We reaffirm the conviction, stated not only by church pronouncements but also by President Truman in his recent address before the United Nations, that war is not inevitable. The worst thing that could happen in the present crisis among the nations would be for a nation or nations to surrender to fear and launch a so-called preventive war. We rejoice that responsible statesmen recognize this fact, and we call on our people to support this stand by holding steady in good will and faith.

PEACE IS NOT INEVITABLE

Yet neither is peace inevitable, and its cost is patient, continuous effort at international cooperation. Our best political hope of peace lies in the United Nations. We rejoice in its increased prestige and influence. There is emerging from it a larger vision of the total interests of mankind. In spite of obstacles, freedom of presentation and discussion still abides in its Assembly and Councils. Long before it took action to resist aggression in Korea it had proved its usefulness for peacemaking in such troubled areas as Palestine, Kashmir, and Indonesia, and had taken large steps forward through its universal declaration of human rights, and the work of such agencies as UNESCO, the World Health Organization, and the Food and Agriculture Organization. It has created a center in which the official leaders of international affairs in 60 nations can meet for the presentation, analysis, and discussion of problematical issues, and it provides the political structure through which peace can come to the world. Furthermore, both the actual efficacy and the possibility of strengthening the United Nations have been demonstrated in several crucial areas.

KEEP THE UNITED NATIONS UNITED

In spite of tensions within the United Nations, we believe that it must be kept united. We reject the proposal frequently made that the world should be split politically, as it now is ideologically, into two blocs. Regardless of the difficulties which may be encountered in arriving at agreements or in securing unanimity, the United Nations should be maintained for all nations. We believe that nations which have made application for admission—Bulgaria, Hungary, Rumania, Albania, Mongolian People's Republic, Jordan, Portugal, Ireland, Italy, Austria, Finland, Ceylon, Korea, Nepal, and Spain—should be at once admitted.

KOREA

The United Nations, by an overwhelming vote, determined to support the use of armed forces in Korea against what it deemed to be aggression. We counsel our people in all nations to urge their respective governments to support policies which keep the use of armed action at a minimum, if it cannot be abolished altogether. Without condoning the unjustifiable nature of the attack by Communist forces which has precipitated the tragic situation in Korea, we believe it to be part of a long sequence of events in which self-interest rather than international concern has governed the policies of nations. Among these are commitments made at Yalta, the artificial division of Korea at the thirty-eighth parallel, equivocation in foreign policy, and an attitude among western nations which has had too little concern for the economic health and security of the hungry peoples of the Orient.

We believe that adequate and immediate measures should be taken for the relief of the Korean people, now tragically suffering as victims of the cold war between great powers, and that there should be large expenditures of both public and private funds for the reconstruction and rehabilitation of this shattered country. After the fighting ceases, a unified Korea should be assured of her independence, with such interim aid or protection from the United Nations as may be required for restoration to full national status.

THE PEOPLES REPUBLIC OF CHINA

No decisions are more crucial and imminent than whether the United States should recognize the Communist government of China (the Peoples Republic of China) and whether this Communist government should represent China in the United Nations. We believe that our governments in the question of recognition, and that the United Nations in the question of admission, should listen sincerely and cooperatively to the counsel of China's neighbor nations in Asia. We believe it to be possible without approving the Communist regime in China to recognize it as the de facto government of that country. The refusal to recognize this government is an evasion of existing fact and can only be conducive to further tension rather than peace.

DISARMAMENT THROUGH THE UNITED NATIONS IMPERATIVE

As an effective means of allaying fear and disarming suspicion, we urge leaders in all nations to explore the possibilities of large-scale disarmament through the United Nations. We heartily commend the proposal of the President of the United States that in planning disarmament, weapons of every character, atomic, hydrogen, conventional—will desirably be considered together. In this connection, the United Nations might profitably reexamine the details of procedures, including inspection, whereby effective supervision can be practicably administered. Details, while not of negligible importance, should not be permitted to prevent or too long defer the achievement of decisions on major steps.

Military victory under conditions that would obtain in world war III could have little meaning. The outcome of atomic war is unpredictable, except that all participants will suffer tragic losses. The possibility of a satisfactofy plan of disarmament exists and must constantly be explored. Reversion to barbarism is the alternative to effective effort to this end.

WORLD COOPERATION IS NEEDED

Discovery of and agreement upon some plan of large-scale disarmament would demonstrate the possibility of cooperation in many directions, would awaken hope in the hearts of men everywhere, would encourage the conclusion of peace treaties with the nations defeated in World War II, would release capital and industrial production to devote their resources to improving living conditions of humanity on a world scale.

COLD WAR ISSUES SHOULD BE RESOLVED

Paralleling the proposal that any plan of disarmament must cover weapons of every character, we plead for an inclusion of an approach to the issues involved in the so-called cold war. Piecemeal handling of these issues has tended to increase irritation. We feel that the time is ripe for the major nations through top-level representatives to confer on all issues that are now subjects of tension, including peace treaties. Only so can the smaller nations be emancipated from fears not of their making and enabled to make their fullest contribution to world recovery and a vitalized United Nations.

CHRISTIAN ATTITUDES AND LOYALTIES NEEDED

Christians of all nations should learn to speak in the attitudes and purposes of Christianity even when they are speaking to and of persons of other languages, of other economic systems, of other ideologies or conceptions of life. If all the Christians in the world would do this now, there would be released attitudes of determination to find the way to cooperate in peace. There would be, in fact and practice, a growing and developing world fellowship of Christians whose influence would be felt in every land on the earth. There are still many millions of Christians in Russia. They belong chiefly to the Russian Orthodox Church. They are not materialists for they believe that the eternal spirit, the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, is the ultimate reality. Churches and cathedrals are open and people worship in them and traditional scriptures of the Old and New Testaments are used, and the hymns of the Eastern Church are sung. We should make every effort to communicate with these people and send a message of Christian fellowship and good will.

In these critical days we should refuse to be suppressed by reactionary forces operating on the basis of ignorance, prejudice, or chauvinistic patriotism, which would restrict the outlook and attitudes of Christians who cannot be nationalistic but must be universal in their outlook and appeal. Certainly no church is in a better position than the Methodist Church operating as it does in many nations with cooperation through the Federal Council and the World Council of Churches to do effectively "the things which belong unto peace." Our hope is in God and in Him is our trust.

Pegler's Column Censored

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ANDREW JACOBS
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 1, 1950

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include the following article and editorial from the New York Post of November 14, 1950:

PEGLER'S COLUMN CENSORED—THE MAN HOPES ASSASSINS "TAUGHT TRUMAN LESSON"

A column by Westbrook Pegler in which he voiced "hope" that the attempt to assassinate the President would "be a lesson to Truman" and ridiculed expressions of shock over the episode has been suppressed by King Features Syndicate, the Post learned today.

The column had been distributed for publication last Tuesday, it was learned, but was ordered "killed" by the syndicate on the eve of its scheduled appearance.

As far as can be learned none of the newspapers which publish Pegler violated the "kill" order. The text of the column as it was transmitted to Pegler's outlets throughout the country has just been obtained, however, by this newspaper.

In the column Pegler angrily challenged editorial writers who said the Nation was shocked by the armed assault on Blair House. He wrote:

"I hope this (the attack) will be a lesson to Truman and the anonymous, eye-rolling disembodied hypocrites of the editorial page who have been croaking that the Nation will view this dastardly resort to anarchy with shock and horror.

"If it takes this to remind us that no President is a holy person, the cost is great but the result is worth it. * * *

"I wasn't shocked, I wasn't horrified, and I believe that most of those who said and wrote that they were, were liars."

Ward Green, chief editorial executive of the syndicate, queried about the column at his office at 235 East Forty-fifth Street, refused to comment.

"I have nothing to say about it," he said.

Efforts to reach Pegler were fruitless. Messages were left at the Park Lane Hotel, where he is staying temporarily, and at the feature syndicate office, but the columnist did not respond.

In the suppressed column, Pegler disparaged "all this emotion over an absurdly nondangerous and futile attempt on the life of a man who happens to be President."

He said he deplored what he called "the stupid attack on the policemen guarding the house where President Truman lives," but "nowhere near as much" as he condemned attacks by "union goons of Truman adherents" on the wives of nonstrikers in a Butte, Mont., labor dispute.

He said he believed the policies of the Truman administration had produced anarchy in the United States of America and added:

"Any man who throws in with traitors and gorillas against the loyal, law-abiding people of the United States is asking for the same kind of treatment and is getting off easy when his guards take the rap."

While urging the assassination of Joseph Stalin, Pegler denied that he favors assassination of President Truman at the present stage.

"As to Harry S. Truman, at the present stage of the game, I am willing to settle for the impudence, the scare, and the reminder of the scene at Blair House," Pegler wrote.

He took the view that the President is "no more important and sacred to me than any other citizen" and asserted that Americans were "able to keep our shirts on" in the face of other violences allegedly instigated by unions. He said Mr. Truman "isn't a good President" and "shirks his constitutional duty * * * to strike down lawlessness."

Much of the remainder of the column was devoted to the reaffirmation of the theme that the President brought the attack on himself by failing to curb union-made anarchy.

O SOLE MIO

Pegler concluded with a sharp critique of Margaret Truman's singing. He said most of her audiences were composed of unwilling listeners blackjacked into attendance by local Democratic organizations.

Although Pegler's column has been excluded from his New York outlet on previous occasions, this is believed to be the first time that a "kill" was ordered by the syndicate on a Nation-wide scale. The Journal-American last omitted his column on August 3 when he urged the United States to admit that we were beaten in Korea and to pull out as fast as we could.

W. PEGLER'S PURPLE PASSION

As unofficial guardians of the Pegler documents we naturally resent any break in the continuity of his works. Thus, when his essay failed to appear in its usual place in the Journal-American last Tuesday (November 7), an investigation was promptly begun. The findings are described on page 3 of today's edition.

The inquiry was not easy; on this occasion Peg was not merely dropped from the Journal-American but "killed" as they say in our trade, by order of his syndicate after the explosive words had been transmitted to all his outlets. To the best of our knowledge Pegler's indiscretion did not see the light of day anywhere. It would have been utterly lost to posterity if our diligent researchers had not produced a copy of the missing manuscript. To the gallant citizen (who prefers to remain anonymous) who finally furnished us with the text of the suppressed script go the thanks of all true Pegler scholars; future historians are similarly indebted to him.

The manuscript, described in our news columns, speaks for itself. The issue remains: Should the column have been killed? Peg's managers may justly claim that this was a kind of journalistic mercy killing; they probably felt they had to choose between the life of the column and the survival of the author. But as opponents of censorship we question the decision. Surely Pegler's readers have the right to glimpse the full fury of his mind; let them judge the whole man, not a carefully screened, sissified version of the real thing. Long recognized as one of the great character assassins of our time, Peg was becoming a bore in that role; his views on more direct methods of assassination break the monotony and reveal the life-and-death passion that lurks behind his rhetoric.

Admittedly, to quote his own words, Peg doesn't urge the assassination of Mr. Truman at the present stage of the game. At this moment he is willing to settle for the impudence, the scare, and the reminder of the scene at Blair House. The President must be grateful for this reprieve; but let there be no doubt that Peg believes the attempt was exactly what Mr. Truman deserved. In the columnist's immortal words: "I wasn't shocked, I wasn't horrified, and I believe that most of those who wrote that they were, were liars." Read it and weep for the man who said it.

Hysteria

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ANDREW J. BIEMILLER
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 30, 1950

Mr. BIEMILLER. Mr. Speaker, the Marquette Tribune, edited by students of the College of Journalism at Marquette University, carried an excellent editorial in its October 5 issue on the internal security bill. Under leave to extend my remarks, I insert it in the Appendix of the RECORD:

HYSTERIA

The Red-control law, discussed elsewhere in this week's Tribune, climaxes a wave of anti-Communist activity within the United States that has been aptly termed a period of hysteria.

By enacting the bill into law, Congress, opposed only by the valiant little band led by Senator LANGER, of North Dakota, has weakened our genuine anti-Communist defenses and opened the way for the infringement of some of our most precious personal liberties.

That the law will weaken our present protective machinery is attested by none other than the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the Central Intelligence Agency. That it endangers basic liberties is apparent from the wide provisions of the bill dealing with Red-front groups.

Under a reactionary administration, these provisions could be applied to any group that the interests in power care to call leftist. In the past few years that term has been applied by powerful forces in the forefront of political activity to every union and to every individual liberal daring to criticize the faults of our capitalistic system.

During the past 3 months especially the words "Communist" and "Socialist" have been hurled with abandon by all sorts of committees and groups who have chosen to set themselves up as judges of their countrymen's loyalty and political behavior. Guilt by accusation and guilt by association have come dangerously close to replacing the conviction that a man is innocent until proved guilty by a jury of his peers.

Thanks to the efforts of these anti-Communist groups, American citizens have been summarily deprived of their means of obtaining a livelihood without the slightest chance to defend themselves. In 30 years of agitation the Communists in this country have never been able to achieve a result like that.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

The Red-control law, as it stands now, and the witch-hunting committees have demonstrated more pointedly than ever before that the real internal danger to our way of life comes, not from Communist saboteurs but from forces which claim to be fighting communism. The hysteria which swings blindly at communism is in danger of destroying the very structure of democracy.

The Crisis in Korea

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HARRY FLOOD BYRD
OF VIRGINIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, December 1 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a very fine editorial entitled "A Matter of Life and Death," published in the Washington Evening Star of December 1, 1950.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

A MATTER OF LIFE AND DEATH

The stark and simple meaning of the crisis in which we find ourselves today is that our life hangs in the balance—our life as a free nation and the lives of millions of us as individuals.

Mr. Truman has spoken of the serious crisis and Mr. Acheson has talked of a situation of unparalleled danger. These words carry their ominous connotation, but they are not adequate to convey to the people of this country the enormity of their danger. There is a feeling, though perhaps not shared by Mr. Truman and Mr. Acheson, that we should be careful not to alarm the people. Of course, the people should not be unduly alarmed. But the people will never acquire that understanding of the danger, that sense of dedication to the task of preparing to meet it, for which our leaders keep calling unless they are given all of the facts that can be made public within the limitations imposed by security considerations.

The people have not been given all of these facts.

One fact not generally known is that there are responsible men in Washington, men whose official position is such that their opinions are entitled to consideration, who believe that this country, as of today, would have no better than an even chance to win an all-out war with Russia. They also believe that time is working against us—that Russian military production is geared up to a point at which they will grow relatively stronger while we grow relatively weaker. Given the opportunity, at some point, with a maximum effort, we would overtake them. But that will not happen soon, and meanwhile, in the opinion of these men our chances of winning a war will diminish.

It should be emphasized that this is merely an opinion. But if it is a correct opinion, it has a most profound bearing on the policies which this Government is pursuing and for which the unswerving support of the people is solicited.

These policies have been stated in various ways. Mr. Truman summed them up yesterday in these words: (1) We shall continue to work in the United Nations for concerted action to halt this aggression in Korea. (2) We shall intensify our efforts to help other free nations strengthen their defenses in order to meet the threat of aggression elsewhere. (3) We shall rapidly increase our own military strength.

The essence of this policy is that everything possible should be done to avoid war, while doing what we can to prepare for the worse if total war should come.

Along with this is the point of view of those who feel that time and opportunity are slipping away from us. They do not advance their point of view as an argument for a so-called preventive war. They merely set forth what they believe to be the facts, which may be summed up as follows: As of this time, we have a great superiority in atomic weapons and, again as of this time, we are capable of using those weapons against any enemy. The Russians do not now have a large store of atomic bombs, but they will acquire them. They do have planes capable of carrying atom bombs to our cities, and, at best, we would not be able to prevent more than one-fourth of their planes from getting through to their targets in a surprise attack.

One may regard these as facts or only as opinions which deserve consideration. The important point is that they add up to a body of information that should be put before the American people. The people are entitled to know just how great the danger is—not in generalities but in terms that are as specific as possible. The Star does not believe that anything is to be gained by withholding information of this kind. It is the lives of the people that are at stake in this business, and they should be shown the grim picture, not from one point of view, but from all responsible points of view. If the Government wants the support of the American people, a support imbued with a sense of urgency, it should see to it that the people are given a maximum, not a minimum, of information concerning the really great danger in which all of us find ourselves.

Texas Capitol of Missouri Doomed

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HENRY D. LARCADE, JR.
OF LOUISIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, November 30, 1950

Mr. LARCADE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I wish to submit the following Associated Press item:

MARSHALL, TEX., November 25.—The last landmark here of a strange page in Confederate and midwestern history soon may be wiped out in the name of progress.

The relic is the building which once housed the Missouri government-in-exile during the Civil War. The owner says he'll raze the structure unless he can sell it soon. An apartment house would be erected.

Only recently another landmark of the period—the Missouri Governor's mansion—was torn down.

WEATHERED BUILDING

The capitol building is an unpretentious one-story frame dwelling. It is badly weathered.

There are a number of conflicting stories about selection of Marshall as the Missouri government's seat. The most widely accepted is this:

Missouri Gov. Claiborne F. Jackson and Lt. Gov. Thomas C. Reynolds fled Missouri in 1861 just ahead of Federal troops. They carried the State seal with them.

They first set up their government-in-exile in Camden, Ark., and later in Arkadelphia. Still later they moved to Little Rock.

CLAIBORNE DIES

In late 1862 or early 1863, Governor Claiborne died, and Reynolds succeeded in the office. Reynolds moved to Marshall when Federal troops pushed into the Arkansas area. He remained in Marshall, conducting such business as he could, until Gen. Robert E. Lee surrendered, and the war ended.

Because Missouri had remained in the Union and had chosen a new Governor sympathetic to the Union cause, the official acts of Governors Claiborne and Reynolds later were declared void.

Just before the Governor's mansion was torn down, an attempt was made to preserve it as a historical monument, but the attempt failed.

So Long as the American Legion Annually Elects Men Like Erle Cocke, Jr., and Thus Rebuilds New Bone and Sinew Into Its Mighty Forces, Neither the American Legion, the American Dream of Justice and of Right, nor the American Way of Life Will Ever, Ever Die

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK W. BOYKIN
OF ALABAMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 1, 1950

Mr. BOYKIN. Mr. Speaker, always fortunate in the selection of its national chiefs, the American Legion, this year, picked Erle Cocke, Jr.—a colorful, vigorous young leader, whose dramatic war record, as General Marshall so aptly inferred, was second to none.

During Erle Cocke's spectacular battlefield experiences in World War II, he was stabbed by a Gestapo agent, shot by an old woman sniper, hit in the head by a stray bullet, and finally was "executed" by the Nazis in 1945—but lived to tell the story.

Cocke was later lined up by his enraged German captors before a firing squad and mowed down with machine guns. Made a prisoner of war three times, he not alone managed to make his escape but, during his third escape, was responsible for the capture by the French of 592 German soldiers.

When the Germans captured him for the fourth time, decision was made that they put an end to his escapades—and for all time.

A firing squad riddled Cocke in the stomach and lungs. A Nazi officer gave him the coup de grâce with a pistol shot in the back. But Cocke was a tough soldier, and he refused to die.

Villagers who returned hours after the shooting found Cocke still alive. They hid and nursed him for 48 hours until allied troops reached the area. Cocke spent the next 14 months in 27 different hospitals, underwent 17 operations—and made an amazing recovery.

For his extraordinary gallantry in action with Maj. Gen. A. C. (Nuts) McAuliffe's forces, Cocke, then a captain, was awarded the Silver Star, the Purple Heart with three clusters, the Bronze Star with clusters, and the French Croix de Guerre. He also holds other decorations and citations. He returned from active military service with the rank of major.

In 1946, after his discharge from the Army, he went to the Harvard Business School, where he received his master of business administration degree. At the University of Georgia, he was active in extracurricular activities—was president of the Phi Kappa Literary Society and student manager of athletics.

Following the completion of his college schooling, Cocke became associated with a food-processing company at Dawson which specialized in manufacturing peanut butter. Later, he became executive director of the Agricultural and Industrial Development Board of Georgia. Subsequently, he was retained as general industrial agent of the Central of Georgia Railway Co., and more recently, he becomes assistant to the president of the Delta Air Lines. He also operates a 1,200-acre farm at Dawson, where he raises peanuts and blooded cattle.

So long as the American Legion annually elects men like Erle Cocke, Jr., and thus rebuilds new bone and sinew into its mighty forces, neither the American Legion—the American dream of justice and of right—nor the American way of life will ever, ever die.

I make no overstatement when I say that that great organization has never elected, as national commander, a more self-effacing and patriotic or greater American, or as much of a direct actionist, than Erle Cocke, Jr., a 29-year-old Georgia farmer and stock raiser, businessman and transportation executive, from the little village of Dawson, boasting of a population of 319 persons—and Erle Cocks, Jr.

On Friday, a week ago, Dawson, Ga., held a great homecoming for its beloved first citizen, to commemorate his elevation to that high office. Among the tremendous group of distinguished visitors in attendance on that occasion was the Honorable George C. Marshall, Secretary of Defense.

In presenting Erle Cocke, Jr., to those assembled at Dawson, General Marshall stated, in part:

I have a very pleasant duty to perform this afternoon. Maybe it will seem to some of you rather peculiar for me to introduce to you your own most outstanding citizen. But there are matters concerning him that I may realize more clearly than you do.

You know, I need not tell you, that he is a young man of great promise, a clean, fine young man of exceptional character, the very best type for our countrymen to put forward in these very critical days. His war record is familiar to all of you. To a certain extent, it sets him apart from the vast majority of veterans—sets him apart today because of what and how he suffered in the war and what his attitude is at this critical moment regarding the defense of western Europe against the threat of Soviet Russia. He, more than any of us and more than all but a very few, has reason to hate and despise the Nazi regime of Germany. And yet he sinks his personal feelings in recognizing not only the gravity of the present crisis but the compelling necessity it imposes of allowing Germany, we hope a new Germany, we pray a genuinely democratic Germany, to contribute to the defense of western Europe.

That he stands in front of the Legion in demanding action on urgently needed defense measures is to be expected. But that he does it in sober and thoughtful terms is of even greater importance.

I must not take more of your time with serious observations. This is a day of celebration, a day when you can rejoice that in her most generous mood Georgia has presented to the country a great citizen. Your little community of his friends can take some of the credit, which largely belongs to his mother, for contributing to a character which is of the finest gold, the highest quality a man can possess.

Mr. Speaker, with that kind of mettle annually rebuilt into the very bone and sinew of the American Legion, neither the Legion nor the American way of life will ever, ever die.

Later in the evening, and subsequent to Commander Cocke's homecoming at Dawson, the State of Georgia tendered its beloved son, as well as the Honorable Secretary of Defense, a dinner at Fort Benning.

I shall always regard the few hundred words spoken by Gen. George Marshall on that occasion as one of the very great pronouncements of our time. He pointed out clearly, tersely, and lucidly, the history of the national defenses of this country in the last 30 years. He told of the fact that it appeared that cur defenses were most weak when we most felt their need, and of the practical emasculation of all defense activities during the twenties and the thirties, but of its marvelous resurrection in 1939.

No one single word that he uttered was a rebuke to anyone. Rather, it was the military evaluation of a great soldier—a great American—and a great man, submitting his own personal observations and a historic résumé of the actualities of life.

Mr. Speaker, in order that all of my colleagues might avail themselves of this splendid pronouncement—and which is so worthy of consideration by all—made by the Honorable George C. Marshall, Secretary of Defense, I am extending my remarks and including the same in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

General Marshall's talk was as follows:

It is both natural and a happy circumstance that we have come to Fort Benning today to express our affection for Erle Cocke and our faith in his leadership as National Commander of the American Legion.

It is very natural because Fort Benning is the home of the Infantry School and Erle Cocke one of its most distinguished graduates. It was the battle performance of company officers like him that gave this school its great reputation.

Not merely as Secretary of Defense, but as a doughboy of long standing and one-time director of this infantry school, I have a personal pride in Erle Cocke and in the quality of leadership he displayed in combat I predict for him an unusually successful administration as national commander of the American Legion.

This meeting is fortuitous because it gives me the opportunity to make some observations on our military history, which I hope the national commander of the Legion and his people will take to heart.

The history of national defense in this country has been a succession of feasts and famines, that have followed each other in demoralizing sequence. For a Nation that prides itself on its logic, business precocity, and its practical common sense, we have given the world quite an opposite impression of these qualities when it came to the matter of national defense. Speaking frankly, I fear that we have given a demonstration somewhat of emotional instability.

Consider the history of national defense in your own lifetime, particularly in the lifetime of those of you who are veterans of the First World War. There was the unpreparedness of 1916, the magnificent Army and Navy of 1917–18, the demobilization of 1919, the attempt to set up an enduring system of national defense in 1920, followed quickly by its emasculation in the twenties and thirties, the sudden resurrection in 1939, the rise to world preeminence in the Second World War, and an almost violent dip to a new low in the midst of a dangerous world. The drastic demobilization that followed the cessation of hostilities in 1945 is now succeeded by a long swing of the pendulum back to the demand for the immediate build-up of great strength.

It is always when our national defense is weakest that we most feel its need. I recall in 1947, as Secretary of State, when our country urgently needed military strength to support our international responsibilities, I found that my position was supported by but one and one-third infantry divisions in this country available for duty. Yet, as some of you may recall, I was being urged from many sides to pour it on the Soviets and give them hell.

Despite the failings I have just referred to in our swings toward stronger national defense, we have hung up amazing records in making up for lost time. Our great resources, our varied and abundant skills, and our dynamic spirit once geared into action accomplished miracles. But always the cost was great, much of which could have been avoided with a little prudent foresight. And always the aftermath of the battle was followed by recriminations, investigations, and demands for accounting—an accounting for precious lives that might have been saved, for money and resources that might have been used to better advantage, for waste that might have been avoided. And always there has been a drive to find scapegoats to shoulder the blame. The basic error, however, has always been with the American people themselves. The fault has been their refusal to sanction an enduring posture of defense that would discourage aggression, and if war came, would reduce the casualties, the sacrifices, the excessive costs, and the needless waste.

This alternate cycle of strength and weakness in national defense must stop. No longer can we count upon years or even months in which to prepare after the war is on. In Korea for the first time we were called upon to fight the first day. That will certainly be the case thereafter. At best we are to face a period of tension of long duration. We must grow stronger to defend ourselves against the risk of aggression wherever it may develop.

We must work, and hope, and not merely pray that we can avoid another world war. Our people are ready to give our Armed Forces what they need. They will sacrifice. They will produce. They will give us the men and munitions we need. They will probably break many new speed records.

But what then? What will happen after this immediate crisis passes and we are involved in a long and less spectacular tension? Will we again lapse into weakness, an invitation to trouble, or will we read the warning of history and set up a system of defense consistent with our democratic ideals, a system which will give us enduring security in peace and the immediately available potential strength we need for war if war becomes necessary?

I know which of these alternatives Erle Cocke will favor. I am confident that the American Legion will line up solidly behind him. Let us, therefore, take the time now and make the effort during his administration to set up an enduring system of national defense, a system that will not collapse at every change of wind and temperature, a system that will keep us prepared for any emergency, yet will not sap the economic strength which is of maximum importance to the democratic people of the entire world.

Peace Talks Imperative

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PHIL J. WELCH
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 1, 1950

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the St. Joseph (Mo.) News-Press of Tuesday, November 28, 1950:

PEACE TALKS IMPERATIVE

Gen. Douglas MacArthur has stated cryptically that the war is out of hand since Red China's intervention. The tangled skein of human events in Asia must be settled on the diplomatic level. The fight has gone beyond war. The Red Chinese delegates are in the United Nations building and a truce on the battlefield should be proclaimed at once while the United Nations authorities discuss and arrive at a workable amnesty for the errors of all concerned in that Far East theater.

Let's forget about saving face. Let's forget about the ethical theory of who is right and who is wrong. Let's get down to the basic factor of saving the lives of those Yanks and their United Nations buddies who are being fed mercilessly into a machine of carnage.

Do you, as a pedestrian, deliberately hurl yourself at an oncoming automobile? Not unless you plan suicide. Do you, as a driver, deliberately hurl yourself at a fast-rolling train? Not unless you plan suicide. And yet we are subjecting our troops to this very act when we issue the order for a handful of infantrymen to march up a road into certain death awaiting them by a massed and heavily armed enemy fresh from its home supply base.

Why shouldn't these stalwart young Americans cry out in bewilderment about our Nation's tardiness in matching the might of a determined foe of unlimited manpower? Why shouldn't these soldiers, many away from their mothers for the very first time, cry out in consternation and ask why we fail to hurl the atomic bomb? Possessing the one weapon that could halt a moving mass of indestructible enemy we continue to issue the order for these intrepid young men to step up and be murdered.

The showdown is here. Our general himself states that the situation is beyond the ability of our men to meet it. Pea-shooters can't knock out Stalin tanks. A dozen men can't vanquish hundreds of men. It is the atom bomb or diplomatic conversations. We have rejected the former. Let's get busy on the latter. In the meanwhile call back the men from the fighting area.

During the few moments you spent reading this, American boys were being slaughtered on the icy stretches of Asia. They never will breathe again. But others will breathe if we stop the debacle at once. There is no choice. Face be forgotten and the lives of young men remembered. Let the diplomats attend to their stern assignment without delay.

Foreign Policy of the United States

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS E. MARTIN
OF IOWA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, November 30, 1950

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, in the debate on legislation to extend the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949 in the RECORD of July 18, 1950, incident to the Korean crisis, I quoted from two great European students of world affairs: Alexis de Tocqueville and Lord Palmerston. These two, writing in 1835 and 1853, respectively, clearly foresaw the trends toward events which in recent years we have witnessed and in which we are now participating. Commodore M. C. Perry, writing in 1856, as recorded in my extension of remarks in the RECORD of July 19, 1950, likewise foresaw these events with even greater precision.

Though the basic ideas of their predictions remain, the technique of their execution has been considerably developed since those times. An important contribution on this subject by Rear Adm. Bern Anderson, United States Navy, retired, was published in the November 1950 issue of the United States Naval Institute Proceedings, entitled "Russia's New Kind of War."

The article carries the following biographical sketch of its author:

A graduate of the Naval Academy in the class of 1921, Admiral Anderson retired from active duty in June, having completed 30 years of commissioned service, and is now doing graduate work in history at Harvard University. During his long and varied naval career, he served with the Asiatic fleet at the time of the Chino-Japanese crisis, participated in various operations of World War II, and, prior to retirement, was head of the Department of Strategy and Tactics at the Naval War College, Newport, R. I.

As this paper contains much that has not been appreciated by the people of our Nation as it should be I am including its full text, with the recommendation that it be read by every Member of Congress:

RUSSIA'S NEW KIND OF WAR

(By Rear Adm. Bern Anderson, U. S. Navy (retired))

I

War, according to dictionary definition, is "the state or fact of exerting violence or force against another; now only against a state or other politically organized body; especially, a contest by force between two or more nations or states carried on for any purpose; armed conflict of sovereign powers; declared and open hostilities."

Should anyone prefer some other definition to this one, it will surely contain the thoughts that war is an openly recognized and formally declared state of relationships between nations and that it is characterized by the use of armed force.

The use of war for settling international differences has given rise during the past two centuries to a large but rather loose body of rules called international law. The purposes underlying the development of these rules have been to regulate the actual conduct of hostilities between armed forces, to afford protection to private citizens and property in belligerent areas, and to establish the duties and rights of neutrals.

It is obvious today that international law as it has been developed up to the present time has failed to keep the conduct of war within controllable bounds. Why should this be so? There can be no simple answer, but it is helpful in understanding the question to trace some of the trends in the conduct of war in recent history.

The invention of the steam engine and the beginning of the machine age about a century and a half ago opened a limitless field for the exercise of man's ingenuity. Before that event the horse was his strongest source of power, and his travel over the earth's surface was limited to the speed and capacity of the horse. At sea he was at the mercy of the winds. With the steam engine he was able to harness and convert to his service—power. By the beginning of the twentieth century the development of power sources included electricity and the internal-combustion engine, with all of which man was able to produce increasingly complex instruments and machines to serve his desires. The machine age transformed large areas of the world from an agrarian to an industrial economy and produced a spiraling complexity in human life that today shows no signs of abating. What we live in is an endless cycle of new products, new uses, and new requirements for services, constantly relieving man of the need for physical labor but making him more and more dependent upon the machine.

Could all of this remarkable development have taken place without being reflected in the weapons of war? Even if an affirmative answer could be supported, it is obvious that that spiraling trend has been paralleled. Along with more complex and more powerful weapons came requirements for more men to operate them; in turn larger armies and navies, and now air forces.

By 1914, as World War I was soon to demonstrate, this spiral had expanded so much that the waging of war on a major scale required what we have come to know as national mobilization. To use, operate, and supply the powerful armies and navies that had been built up, natural resources and industry had to be brought into the chain of the military effort. That war required a huge expenditure of resources and materials with two major results. First was the tremendous economic cost of conducting war, not only for the actual materials expended, but also in the disruption of the normal economies of the various nations by the diversion of industrial capacity to munitions production. Secondly was the devastation and destruction of real property in the path of military operations. These effects raised a serious question: Can the expenditure of material and manpower resources now required for the conduct of war be balanced by the possible gains to be expected?

World War I is an appropriate starting point for a closer examination of the trends with which we live today. There are four major developments of the First World War that had a deep impact and significance upon the conduct of future warfare.

The first and more obvious development was that of the employment of the airplane as a vehicle of war. Apart from its military value, the use of bombing aircraft in that war opened a new field in international law. After the war, commissions tried to evolve a code for aerial warfare, comparable in scope to the Hague conventions for land and naval warfare. While such a code was produced in the early '30s, it was never ratified by any of the major powers.

The second major development was the use of the submarine on a large scale against enemy commerce. Its use against merchant shipping, and its successes, had significant results. Whole sections of international law as it then existed, such as visit and search, and the safeguarding of passengers and crew before sinking a prize, became obsolescent, since the submarine was unable to observe them. Here also in the postwar period efforts were made to control and even outlaw the use of submarines, but again international agreement could not be reached.

The third major development of World War I was that of the self-propelled vehicle, symbolized by the tank. This brought to land warfare a combination of mobility, protection through armor, and fire power. With the tank, land operations assumed a new character of speed, flexibility, and power that could not have been attained without the tank or some similar vehicle.

The fourth development that had a significant influence on the conduct of warfare was that of radio and rapid communications. The ability to communicate widely and rapidly reduced the elements of time and space materially for the fighting forces. It also provided the medium for introducing the widespread use of a nonviolent weapon, psychological warfare. Radio communications were especially influential in changing the conduct of naval operations. At last there was the means for quickly disseminating intelligence to commanders at sea, for coordinating the movements of forces not in sight contact, and for initiating changes in plans without delay.

Possibly poison gas should also be listed as a major development of World War I. Certainly it was a spectacular one, and it further complicated the problems of securing international agreement regulating the conduct of war. Although not used in World War II, it was possessed by all belligerents, and from its potentialities we have seen suggested the possible development of comparable weapons such as radiological and bacteriological concentrations.

In the years immediately following World War I, spurred by the terrific economic cost and destruction caused by that war, a number of international efforts to limit and control the conduct of war were undertaken. The League of Nations, the naval limitation of armaments agreements, the Kellogg-Briand Pact, and the conventions seeking to codify rules regulating the use of aircraft and submarines are examples. None of these was even moderately successful, even though each aimed at the desirable goal of preventing or curtailing the huge costs of another war. Possibly they failed because, consciously or otherwise, they were deisgned largely to preserve ninteenth century standards without realizing fully the impact of twentieth century developments. Hampered not only by involved technical questions, they were attempted during the renaissance of the dictatorship type of government, first in Russia, then in Italy, and finally in Germany and Japan.

II

It is sometimes said that the next war is fought with the weapons developed in the last war. Or, in a more cynical vein, that we spend our time between wars trying to figure out how to fight the last one better. In September 1939 the world was startled by the speed and thoroughness with which Hitler's armies conquered and crushed the Poles. In doing this Hitler unveiled a technique which soon came to be known as the blitzkrieg. But the blitzkrieg was more than just a new technique; it was Hitler's solution to the problem of how to fight a war without prohibitive costs in manpower and resources.

The blitzkrieg was a coordinated aerial and mechanized ground attack which possessed the qualities of heavy fire power, great mobility, and concentration. By means of highly developed rapid communications the movements and operations of several mechanized columns and their supporting aircraft could be coordinated. Thus, by the ingenious combination of three of the major developments of World War I, the Germans created a fighting team of tremendous power and capabilities. The basic idea may not have been entirely new, for Ghengis Khan produced something with comparable capabilities for his time. But the blitzkrieg as such could not have been developed as it was without first having the mechanized vehicle and tank, and rapid communications.

With the overrunning of the Low Countries and France, this technique appeared to be all but invincible. It remained for the Russians, trading space for time, to resist the blitzkrieg successfully. In doing this the Russians also revealed the basic weakness in Hitler's strategy. Counting upon the blitzkrieg to achieve his objectives in a short war, he was unprepared with an alternative or for a long campaign when the blitzkrieg did not succeed.

In Norway Hitler produced another new technique in warfare, something in the order of a modern adaptation of the Trojan Horse, the fifth column. This same device was a material factor in the quick defeat of France.

World War II was also the testing ground for still another new form of warfare—strategic aerial bombardment. For the first time the enemy's production sources could be brought under direct attack, without first dealing with the defending surface forces. In part it sought to gain to a greater degree a result comparable to the older naval blockade: to check or choke off the enemy's supplies. That its contribution to the over-all effort was significant is well recognized, but of greater significance was that the uniformed man was no longer the only active participant in war and battle. To some degree the entire population, and especially the munitions worker, had become an active member of the fighting team. Large scale aerial bombardment adds greatly to the total destruction of physical property, and to the general economic cost of war.

The airplane also took a leading part in naval warfare, with the carrier providing the mobile base. One result of this general employment of aircraft in warfare has been to erase the importance of the former natural barrier and boundary between land and sea warfare, the shore line.

The one great development of World War II, that dwarfs all others in significance, was the atomic bomb. Introduced too late for its full capabilities and limitations to be demonstrated, there has been a wide range of speculation and discussion since the war of what might be its effect in the future. Certainly its destructive power so greatly exceeds that of any earlier man-made weapon that it is necessary to consider most fully and carefully the implications of its possible future use. Its widespread use in war could conceivably produce so much devastation and destruction that the economic structure of the world could not recover from its paralyzing effects for generations, if at all.

We have become so accustomed to extensive destruction of property as a byproduct of war that there is a growing tendency to use destruction as a measure of accomplishment in war. This is the reverse of the ideas which the formulators of international law in the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries tried to codify. While all of the developments of the Machine Age have contributed to the breaking down of the objectives of international law, the airplane must accept a large share of the credit.

This apparently inevitable trend presents us with a problem whose solution will require the coolest and most penetrating thought. Does this growing tendency to measure results in warfare in terms of destruction point to a conclusion that the nations of the world can no longer afford to use warfare, as it has been developed, as a means of enforcing national or state policy?

What this trend means is that the total war of today involves the whole nation, for any place that can be reached by aircraft might well be in the active theater of military operations. Increased mechanization in all fields of warfare also contributes to this general expansion of the theaters of active operations. If continued, war of the future will place even greater demands on the sources and processing of materials, and tend to erase more and more the distinction that once existed between the civilian and the man in uniform.

This trend is the root of our problem. For, returning to our question, it suggests that the destructiveness of future war will increase, much as it has in the past. Is the world faced with an insolvable dilemma then, or is there some alternative? Assuming that our future efforts to eliminate or control war as the means for settling international disputes will be no more successful than they have in the past, is there a way in which wars can be fought without paying the tremendous price that we have had to pay in recent wars?

As has already been pointed out, Hitler produced one answer in the blitzkrieg. In the long run, however, it was the use or overuse of this very technique that brought on the devastation of World War II. But even before Hitler had conceived of his answer to this question, there had appeared in the world a new philosophy and a new form of warfare. While we have seen it at work for 30 years, it has only been since it has made great gains in the postwar period that the rest of the world has begun to realize how sinister, dangerous, and new it really is. There are many reasons for this, but one of the chief ones is that it has approached the subject of warfare in its own way, quite different from our conventional ideas on the subject.

The present alinement of the world into two hostile coalitions becomes something totally new when we examine the guiding force that is the root of this alinement. To get at the meaning of this force we must examine carefully the origin and nature of communism.

III

Though superficially resembling the Axis coalition of World War II, the present Communist world is quite different in structure. Each of the Axis members was an independent state within the framework of nations that make up the world, with each retaining full sovereignty within the system. Rome and Tokyo, for example, did not look to Berlin for leadership. The Axis was a loosely knit coalition of convenience, and its members distrusted each other to a high degree. Even during the conduct of the war Axis military collaboration was scanty.

The Communist bloc, on the other hand, while now composed of nations, looks to a central body for guidance. Moscow is the heart of this system and daily events indicate all too clearly that the so-called satellites are subject to its will. The leaders of this system are devoted to a doctrine which rejects the idea of independent nations and transcends national boundaries. Its openly stated objective is to bring the entire world into its system and under its control.

If so, how is this to be accomplished? For the answer to this we must attempt to fathom a philosophy and system of thinking that is quite different from any that has guided the development of what we call the Western World.

Communism and its basic philosophy was founded by Karl Marx in the middle of the nineteenth century. The philosophy itself is called "dialectic materialism"; the "dialectic" in this case being a system of logic developed by Hegel, and the "materialism" being derived from Marx's contention that history is determined and life regulated by economic conditions and developments rather than social or political ones. It produces a system of thought processes peculiarly characteristic of the philosophy, and one very convenient to its disciples, for with it one can rationalize almost any point of view that he chooses.

Communist literature stresses the so-called "contradictions" of capitalism. Marx argued that wars were inevitable under the capitalist system, since that system required periodic wars in order to preserve itself. This is claimed to be a key "contradiction" of capitalism. But dialectic materialism cannot recognize, aparently, the actual contradiction in Marx's assertion that the increased use of machinery in industry could only lead to increased enslavement and lowered standard of living of the working class. While it can show that real democracy cannot exist under the capitalist system, it can prove, to its own satisfaction, that 99.9 percent of the eligible voters, casting an affirmative vote for a single slate of candidates in an election, is an example of the purest form of "democracy."

Strange and illogical as this system may appear to most of us, Marx's doctrines attracted a number of disciples, among the early ones being a group of Russian Bolsheviks. Communism and the Communist Party were illegal in Czarist Russia, and the Bolsheviks were of necessity a clandestine group, with some of them in Russia, some in exile. Forced to work underground, they became highly skilled and trained conspirators. By engineering disturbances within Russia, such as the revolution of 1905, they created dissension, attracted recruits, and became a well-organized and close-knit group.

Their real opportunity came with the collapse of the Czarist regime in 1917. For several months after the Czar's abdication various groups in Russia tried to form a Socialist government, but they were improvised groups and weak in organization and experience. The leader of the Bolsheviks, Lenin, was in exile in Switzerland when the collapse occurred, and it was not until his return to Russia that the Bolsheviks began openly to take part in the effort to form a government. The strongest weapon they had at the time was a fully developed program. By October 1917, Russian calendar, they had gained sufficient support to seize and thereafter hold the government. Many of the present-day leaders of Soviet Russia, including Stalin, were members of this original group.

The current philosophy of the Communist Party is the interpretation of Marx by Lenin and Stalin, the familiar "Leninist-Stalinist" line of Marxism. Lenin had an extremely agile mind and he was a copious writer. Much of his writing was devoted to rationalizing his interpretation of Marx, and of showing how earlier interpreters had failed to perceive Marx's true meaning.

Differences of opinion over Marx's works, even among the faithful, were easy to develop, for he tried to cover the whole range of human experience. Much of his text, as a result, is vague and capable of almost any desired interpretation. The fact that Communist writers could differ so widely is a good illustration of the flexibility of dialectic materialism as a philosophy. Even in the realistic battle for power that followed Lenin's death, and which led eventually to the assassination of Trotzky, the basis for the differences was the proper interpretation of Lenin's ideas. The same has been true in the periodic purges that have taken place since, including the dispute with Tito. It is essential to realize, in trying to understand the actions and statements of Communists, the firm grip which this philosophy has upon them. It is this fanaticism which sometimes causes communism to be likened to a religion, although it is completely antireligious in character.

The basic line of communism is found in Stalin's book, Problems of Leninism, containing many of his essays, speeches, and reports to the central committee, from 1924 to 1939. There is no indication that the events of World War II have caused any material change in this doctrine. Several editions of this work have been published in English in Moscow, and the book is readily available in the United States. Studied closely, Problems of Leninism gives us a clear picture of the nature, objectives, and methods of communism. The quotations which follow are taken mainly from the first part of the 1947 reprint of the eleventh edition—some 1924 lectures entitled "Foundations of Leninism."

Stalin defines Leninism as "Marxism of the era of imperialism, and of the proletarian revolution. * * * Leninism is the theory and tactics of the proletarian revolution in general, the theory and tactics of the proletariat in particular." The proletariat in this ideology refers to the masses of the underprivileged and the working class. Everyone else, with certain exceptions in the intellectual field, falls into the bourgeois, capitalist, or imperialist class, mortal enemies of the proletariat.

"Imperialism is the omnipotence of the monopolist trusts and syndicates, of the banks and financial oligarchy, in the industrial countries. In the fight against this omnipotence, the customary methods of the working class—trade unions and cooperative organizations, parliamentary parties, and the parliamentary struggle—have proved to be totally inadequate."

This, he asserts, is the first contradiction between labor and capital. Seeking to improve the conditions of the working class through such means as labor unions, and laws enacted through normal legislative processes, have failed. Another means of achieving this goal must be found.

Other contradictions cited by Stalin are that wars among imperialist powers have become inevitable, and that the exploitation of vast colonial areas and peoples by the imperialist powers has created a proletariat in these areas.

In the modern world: "In other words, imperialism has brought it about, not only that revolution has become a practical inevitability, but also that favorable conditions have been created for a direct onslaught upon the citadels of capitalism." Further, "The proletarian revolution, its movement, its scope, and its achievements acquire flesh and blood only through the dictatorship of the proletariat."

Quoting Lenin, Stalin says that "The dictatorship of the proletariat is a most determined and most ruthless war waged by the new class against a more powerful enemy, the bourgeoisie, whose resistance is increased tenfold by its overthrow; that the dictatorship of the proletariat is a persistent struggle—bloody and bloodless, violent and peaceful, military and economic, educational and administrative—against the forces and traditions of the old society."

A more forthright statement of the nature of this revolution would be hard to imagine. It should be carefully noted that it is directed against all of the old society, and that its weapons are not only military, but also economic, educational, and administrative forces.

"It need hardly be proved," points out Stalin, "that there is not the slightest possibility of carrying out these tasks in a short period, of doing all of this in a few years. Therefore * * * the transition from capitalism to communism must not be regarded as a fleeting period of superrevolutionary acts and decrees, but as an entire historical era, replete with civil wars and external conflicts, with persistent organizational work and economic construction, with advances and retreats, victories and defeats."

He develops that this revolution is not merely a change in personalities in the government, or a change of cabinet, but rather it is an entirely new system, which will arise on the ruins of the old bourgeois state. This means: "Briefly, the dictatorship of the proletariat is the rule—unrestricted by law and based on force—of the proletariat over the bourgeoisie, a rule enjoying the sympathy and support of the laboring and exploited masses."

From this Stalin draws two conclusions:

"First, * * * the dictatorship of the proletariat cannot be 'complete' democracy, democracy for all, for the rich as well as for the poor; the dictatorship of the proletariat 'must be a state that is democratic in a new way—for the proletarians and propertyless in general—and dictatorial in a new way—against the bourgeoisie.' "

"Under the dictatorship of the proletariat, democracy is proletarian democracy, the democracy of the exploited majority, based upon the restriction of the rights of the exploiting minority and directed against this minority."

Does not this definition of democracy go far to explain the difficulties that have arisen in the world since the close of the war when the establishment of a "democratic" government in Germany, for example, has been under discussion?

Stalin's second conclusion, from the nature of the proletarian revolution, was that: "The dictatorship of the proletariat cannot arise as the result of the peaceful development of bourgeois society and of bourgeois democracy; it can arise only as the result of the smashing of the bourgeois state machine, the bourgeois army, the bourgeois bureaucratic machine, the bourgeois police."

"In other words, the law of violent proletarian revolution, the law of the smashing of the bourgeois state machine as a preliminary condition for such a revolution, is an inevitable law of the revolutionary movement in the imperialist countries of the world."

Although not brought out directly in the above quotations, there is a sharp distinction between imperialist wars and the proletarian revolution. That is why Communist leaders can say, in what to them may be good faith, that the Communist world and the Western World can collaborate without resort to war—imperialist war, that is, something quiet different and distinct from the proletarian revolution.

The organization required to accomplish the substitution of proletarian for bourgeois democracy is the Soviets. This is "* * * the most internationalist of all State organizations in class society, for, since it destroys every kind of national oppression and rests on the collaboration of the laboring masses of the various nationalities, it facilitates * * * the amalgamation of these masses into a single state union."

In using the term "Soviet" here Stalin is speaking of the revolution as a whole, not alone of Russia. The single state union refers to eventually bringing the entire world into this system.

"The Soviet power, by combining the legislative and executive functions in a single state organization and replacing territorial electoral constituencies by industrial units, factories, and mills, thereby directly links the workers * * * with the apparatus of state administration."

Here we see the industrial unit replacing the geographical unit as the basis for political organization. This emphasizes the eventual goal of eliminating nations as the components of the world system.

This revolution is to be carried out by the application of the strategy and tactics of Leninism. For these terms also we must look for different definitions and meanings.

"Strategy is the determination of the direction of the main blow of the proletariat at a given stage of the revolution, the elaboration of a corresponding plan for the disposition of the revolutionary forces (the main and secondary reserves), the fight to carry out this plan throughout the given stage of the revolution."

Reserves, as used here, do not refer to reserves of military forces, as we might normally think of the term. These "reserves" are defined as proletarians in neighboring countries, dissident colonial elements, wars between imperialist countries, and such similar conditions as might be turned to the advantage of the revolution.

"Tactics," on the other hand, "are the determination of the line of conduct of the proletariat in the comparatively short period of the flow or ebb of the movement, of the rise or decline of the revolution, the fight to carry out this line by means of replacing old forms of struggle and organization by new ones, old slogans by new ones, by combining these forms, etc."

"Tactics deal with the forms of struggle and the forms of organization of the proletariat, with their changes and combinations. During a given stage of the revolution tactics may change several times, depending upon the flow or ebb, the rise or decline, of the revolution."

From this we can see that tactics is concerned with the employment of all types of forces, covert as well as overt. All of these forces are to be used to the end of supporting the strategic plan, whether at any instant the revolution be advancing or retreating.

This leads us to the role of the Communist Party in this revolution. Stalin points out that an army at war needs a general staff unless it courts certain defeat. Equally the proletariat needs a general staff if it is to survive. "The working class without a revolutionary party is an army without a general staff. The party is the general staff of the proletariat."

In developing this thought further Stalin shows that the party is not only the vanguard of the proletariat, it is also a part of that class, the organized part of that class, the leader of the class.

"But the party is not merely the sum of party organizations. The party at the same time represents a single system of these organizations, their formal amalgamation into a single whole, with higher and lower leading bodies, with the subordination of the minority to the majority, with practical decisions binding on all members of the party. Without these conditions the party cannot be a single organized whole capable of exercising systematic and organized leadership in the struggle of the working class."

Here the idea of the general staff of the revolution is expanded a step further. The party is organized into echelons, leading to a directing head at the top. Also, there is no geographical limit to the scope of the party and its activities. "Communist Party, United States of America," for example, does not mean a separate political group in the United States. The United States of America here is simply a geographical designation for a subdivision of the larger body of the whole party.

"But the party is not the only organization of the working class. The proletariat has also a number of other organizations without which it cannot properly wage the struggle against capital: trade unions, cooperative societies, factory and works organizations, parliamentary groups, nonparty women's associations, the press, cultural and educational organizations, youth leagues, revolutionary fighting organizations (in time of open revolutionary action), Soviets of deputies as the form of state organization (if the proletariat is in power), etc. The overwhelming majority of these organizations are nonparty, and only a certain part of them adhere directly to the party, or represent its offshoots."

With such a diversity of supporting nonparty organizations to be directed, the need for central leadership is recognized. Obviously the party, the general staff, is the only organization capable of exercising this leadership.

"That is why Lenin says that the party is 'the highest form of proletarian class organization,' whose political leadership must extend to every other form of organization of the proletariat."

"That is why the opportunist theory of the 'independence' and 'neutrality' of the nonparty organizations, which breeds independent members of parliament and journalists isolated from the party, narrow-minded trade unionists and cooperative society officials grown smug and philistine, is wholly incompatible with the theory and practice of Leninism."

A further characteristic of this party is that of the iron discipline which exists within the party. This does not exclude differences of opinion or discussion within party circles, for those are considered necessary and to be expected. "But after a contest has been closed, after criticism has been exhausted and a decision has been arrived at, unity of will and unity of action of all party members are the necessary conditions without which neither party unity nor iron discipline in the party is conceivable."

Still another characteristic of the Communist Party concerns the tolerance of factions within the party. According to Stalin: "the parties of the Communist International, which base their activities on the task of achieving the dictatorshp of the proletariat, cannot afford to be 'liberal' or to permit freedoms of factions.

"Hence Lenin's demand for the 'complete elimination of all factionalism,' and the 'immediate dissolution of all groups, without exception, that had been formed on the basis of various platforms,' on pain of 'unconditional and immediate expulsion from the party'."

If we substitute "Cominform" for "Communist International" in the above quotation, we get an idea of the significance of the current differences between Tito and the Cominform.

Finally, Stalin stresses: "The party becomes strong by purging itself of opportunist elements."

In his Report on the Work of the Central Committee to the Eighteenth Congress of the CPSU, in March 1939, Stalin reported that there were 1,874,488 party members represented at the Seventeenth Congress (1934). After reviewing the incidents and purges of the intervening years, he stated: "The number of party members represented at this, the Eighteenth Congress, is about 1,600,000, which is 270,000 less than were represented at the Seventeenth Congress. But there is nothing bad in that. On the contrary, it is all to the good, for the party strengthens itself by clearing its ranks of dross." Boasting in this way of purging at least 270,000 of the faithful is an indication of the strength of the iron discipline that exists in the party and of its ruthless use of the purge.

The above quotations from Problems of Leninism make it clear that the Communist Party is far from being a political party in the sense that we know political parties in the United States. It is international, or rather nationless in character, it is organized along military lines with echelons comparable to military command within the party, it is ruled by a ruthless internal discipline, and the party determines who its members shall be. It is a self-perpetuating group, which, in the final analysis, is responsible to no one but itself. Of course, Stalin points out that as the revolution is completed, and there are no longer social classes in the world, then states will wither and disappear, and so also will the party wither and disappear. Is it reasonable to assume, however, that there will no longer be the need for management or direction for socialized agriculture, manufactures, or transportation? For the Soviets?

From the above it seems obvious that the Communist Party is more military than political in nature and organization, but with some fundamental differences from that which we usually think of as military organizations. The scope of its operations goes far beyond the organized armed forces, which are only one element of the forces which it directs. All of these forces, including the governmental machinery of the Soviet, are not a part of the party but, by and large, merely instruments of the party. In addition to the overt employment of the armed forces, it uses economic, educational, and administrative forces to achieve its aims. These are largely the covert forces of the revolution, using the weapons of propaganda, the fifth column, creating civil disturbances, engineering riots, seizing power in labor unions, sabotage, and other forms of subversion. If we think of this as another solution to the problem of how to fight and win a war without prohibitive costs, its potentialities certainly cannot be minimized.

IV

Should communism continue to spread and gradually engulf the world, what might be the effect on that world as we now know it?

The threat is made by a small but highly organized group whose avowed intention is to obliterate completely the institutions of our civilization as we know them and to replace them with a system of its own design. In this new system there would be no personal liberties, no individual enterprise, no choice of political franchise, and no harboring of divergent political opinion. Most of all, since all forms of administration would be under the control of this self-perpetuating group, there would be little possibility of changing the system.

The ultimate stateless world envisaged by the Communists would eliminate national sovereignties and the independent states that now make up the family of nations. Our present institutions for the conduct of international relations, trade and commerce, the exchange of cultural ideas and objects, and the developments of science, would all be replaced by a centrally regulated system reaching into every facet of human life. It would be directed by a self-selected group who are and would be accountable to none but itself. "From each according to his ability, to each according to his needs," said Marx. Who determines what each man's ability is? Who determines what his needs are? The answer seems obvious—only the party.

Stalin's view of the role of the Communist Party as the general staff of the proletarian revolution means that the party has borrowed a military institution and adapted its methods to include the direction of all of the affairs of mankind. It is proclaimed to be the all-knowing, all-powerful, agent or trustee of the proletariat, untouchable, and not subject to external criticism or challenge. But, so long as any systems exist in the world which are alien to this one, they are enemies of communism and are targets for ultimate destruction. As Stalin has pointed out, this revolution is an entire historical era, involving victories and defeats, advances and retreats, consolidations, and compromises.

Communist literature stresses the strategical and tactical use of the retreat, the compromise, and reform programs. In each case, while a retreat or compromise might appear on the surface to be a concession to capitalism, actually such a retreat or compromise will be so engineered that ultimately it will be converted to a weapon of the revolution against capitalism. That is why there is little chance of serious efforts on the part of the Communist world to get along with the other democratic world. That is why advocates of some form of superstate in which the Communist states would form a cooperating part cannot hope to be successful. What is really being asked for here is that Communists should abandon their whole basic philosophy. With the power and territory that the Communist Party has achieved in the world since 1917, could anyone believe that it would now voluntarily abandon such a program?

Since the forces and weapons of communism include all possible kinds, overt and covert, under the direction of its party or general staff, our fundamental beliefs concerning international law and relations are not only challenged but must be critically reviewed. Our belief that a treaty of peace is binding, or that a declaration of war is a prerequisite to hostilities, for example, needs reexamination. We should keep in mind that it is a fundamental strategy of communism that any agreement or compromise with its enemy is made with the reservation that eventually it will be used as a weapon against that enemy.

The very basis of the proletarian revolution is that it is a continuing struggle, waged unceasingly until the complete destruction of capitalism is accomplished. Under such conditions, and with communism having such strength in the world as it does, there can no longer be a condition of peace in the sense that we normally think of the term. Even though open hostilities do not exist this revolution is being prosecuted actively all of the time. The nature of the movement is such that it denies that peace, as we know it, can exist in the world. Peace, to the Communist, can only mean complete acceptance of and subservience to his system.

How, then, does the institution that we call war fit into this new situation? As Stalin emphasizes, violence is but one form of this revolutionary struggle. In terms of economic effort, of manpower, or of treasure, it is certainly the most expensive way of settling international disputes. Does it not seem reasonable that this method will be avoided when other weapons in the Communist arsenal produce progressively favorable results? By creating an organization which requires its membership to place itself above all geographical or national considerations, with sole loyalty to that organization, and by developing and using such weapons as creating riots and internal strife, propaganda, and subversion, the Communists have produced a system which is really new in this world. It is, it should be repeated, a system which adapts the principles of military command, discipline, organization, and strategy and tactics, to the direction of all human affairs.

Under this system the use of armed forces to gain its ends will be governed by carefully calculated studies seeking to determine if the use of armed force is, in fact, the best way to achieve the desired objective. Alternatively these same studies will determine if the same result can be obtained by other means, perhaps requiring more time, but at less cost. If armed force is selected, its use, and the rules for its use, will be determined upon the basis of how it will best serve the purposes of the revolution.

Leaders of the Soviet Union often refer to their armed forces as defensive forces, maintained to protect their domain from imperialist attack. This could be so, and if so, the covert weapons at their disposal might well be their chief offensive weapons. In this connection it is well to recall that Chinese, Czech, and Polish nationals, but Communists first, engineered the coups that resulted in the present regimes in their countries.

When we consider all of the implications of this system, we might well ask ourselves if we had better not reexamine our understanding of the term "war." With the conventional forms of warfare, the use of armed forces fighting with the recognized weapons of warfare, we are probably as well informed as any. With the use of economic, educational, administrative, and psychological forces, mobilized and directed to achieve the same results as war, we have much to learn. Collectively, such weapons, skillfully directed, could be more destructive, over a period of time, than any of the weapons of conventional warfare.

Since these weapons are being used against us at all times they are actually a new form of warfare for which no conventions or rules of international conduct exist. Viewed in this light, the cold war, of which we read and hear so much, has new meaning. If we accept what appear to be clearly stated lines of strategy and tactics, the cold war is but one form of a greater war which is constantly being waged, regardless of whether or not the Armed Forces take an active part.

If we recognize clearly the nature of the situation which faces us, our own program for combatting it can be built on firm foundations. Today our civilization and its institutions are facing a challenge not of their own choosing, and initially it gives the initiative to the opposition. To the Communist, by his own rules, this attack can only result eventually in the complete destruction of our form of civilization, and its replacement by the Communist system. With wisdom this challenge can be met.

As a main step in meeting the challenge then, let us realize that the definition of war, as quoted earlier, is no longer adequate. Rather, for a large part of the world, war is the proletarian revolution which, in Lenin's words, "is a most determined and most ruthless war waged by the new class against a more powerful enemy, the bourgeoisie"; and that that war "is a persistent struggle—bloody and bloodless, violent and peaceful, military and economic, educational and administrative—against the forces and traditions of the old society."

Whether we like it or not, that is the kind of war that we must face, and be prepared for.

Abetting Doctor Shortage

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ANDREW J. BIEMILLER
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 30, 1950

Mr. BIEMILLER. Mr. Speaker, I wish to again call the attention of the House to the selfish and short-sighted attitude of the American Medical Association in its opposition to aid for medical colleges. Under leave to extend my remarks, I am inserting an editorial from the Toledo Blade:

ABETTING DOCTOR SHORTAGE

By a 9 to 8 margin, the House Commerce Committee has voted to shelve a 5-year program to provide $250,000,000 in Federal funds for the expansion of training facilities for doctors, dentists, and nurses, and to assist students. It is an indefensible decision in the light of the possibility that another major war may create a heavy military demand for men and women trained in these professions.

Behind the measure's defeat lurks the familiar shadow of the American Medical Association, which opposed it on the grounds that the supply of doctors already is adequate to the Nation's needs.

That was a questionable conclusion when the bill was first introduced some months ago. It's sheer nonsense when the potential need for medical personnel is considered.

There has long been a suspicion that the AMA is engaged in a conspiracy to limit the number of practicing physicians. One bit of evidence to confirm that suspicion was the arbitrary attitude taken by most affiliated medical societies toward granting licenses to European refugees. Another was the strict quota system imposed on existing medical schools, limiting the number of students they might enroll. If these weren't enough to establish the case against the AMA, its attitude toward Federal aid to enlarge training facilities should be the clincher.

Congress Must Direct Course Unless Truman Drops Acheson

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. J. HARRY McGREGOR
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 1, 1950

Mr. McGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Mansfield (Ohio) News-Journal of November 29, 1950:

CONGRESS MUST DIRECT COURSE UNLESS TRUMAN DROPS ACHESON

Whatever may have been the plans of the present Eighty-first Congress to side-step any important action during its final days, the abruptly changed situation in Korea demands undivided attention right now.

General MacArthur's sudden turn from an expression of confidence in victory of the United Nations forces before Christmas, to a warning that this is an entirely new war, gives emphasis to the long-held impression that the Korean fighting is merely incidental to the Moscow-inspired grand plan for eventual Communist domination of all Asia, then Europe, and finally the Western Hemisphere, with the United States as the richest prize of all.

Hope for defeat of this grandiose objective lies in development of strength within the United Nations (free from Russian obstruction) to either bring about a negotiated peace or to build sufficient military power to win a third world war.

As in Korea, however, chief burden of defense against Communist aggression rests upon the United States, and it is the extent to which other friendly nations have been encouraged to depend upon this country for leadership and for armament, manpower, and supplies of all sorts, that poses problems with which the present national administration seems totally unable to cope.

Judged by the record of the past few years, no confidence can be placed in the decisions of either President Truman or Secretary of State Dean Acheson in meeting such a situation as now exists, and, regrettable as it is, Mr. Truman has stubbornly refused to call to his aid some of the competent advisers who would have been helpful in formulating a definite foreign policy which might have prevented much of the present turmoil in the Far East and been beneficial in easing the tension in Europe, where the threat of further Communist aggression hangs heavily over the still independent nations.

It is pointless to stress, at this time, the fumbling that has been done by President Truman and his "crony" advisers since the end of World War II, but what is to be done from now on is vitally important to all Americans and to the people of many other countries.

Let us hope—and pray—that voices raised in Congress, even during this brief session, will be of such vigor and earnestness as to steer the ship of state out of the dangerous waters which now threaten its engulfment, and that President Truman can be made to see his need for advice by men who are above political motivation and who have broad knowledge of national and world affairs.

The slaughter of thousands of young Americans in Korea, with other thousands of wounded GI's doomed to lives of suffering, and the ghastly potentialities of another world conflict, present a situation which demands use of the best brains that have been developed in this country—and men who possess such brains would undoubtely respond willingly to the President's appeal for advice in this hour of national peril.

The Internal Security Act—6

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ANDREW J. BIEMILLER
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 1, 1950

Mr. BIEMILLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am pleased to present the sixth of a series of editorials from the Milwaukee Journal on the Internal Security Act. The following editorial appeared on October 30:

THE NTERNAL SECURITY ACT—6

One of the faulty provisions of the Internal Security Act of 1950 must have saboteurs waiting in happy anticipation.

It directs the Secretary of Defense to list and publish all defense facilities. This, in the words of President Truman's veto message, will hand to saboteurs on a silver platter information for which they "would be willing to spend years of effort seeking to find out."

Under the bill the list to be prepared and published by the Secretary of Defense—and posted in the facilities listed—will include everything from shipyards to now secret atomic energy laboratories, from defense plants to supersecret uranium mines. The purpose of the list will be to indicate where Communists and others dangerous to our Government cannot work.

Supporters of the bill claim that the Secretary of Defense has discretion under the law and need not list facilities he considers too secret for public knowledge. That argument makes the law all the more ridiculous. The supersecret plants, then, will not be barred from hiring Communists under the new law. This gives us the weird situation in which top secret facilities are not given protection from job seeking Communists, while less vital plants are given such protection.

The fact is that we already have ample means of keeping security risks from working in vital defense plants—particularly our laboratories and on supersecret production. The new law adds nothing to security and provides a readily accessible directory to our important defense facilities.

The law, as one Congressman put it, will be "providing a handbook for every enemy in the country * * * telling him where to go to commit sabotage."

Hubert E. Howard, former chairman of the Munitions Board, attacked this section of the law some time ago. It will, he said, be a threat to national security. There's no doubt about it.

The Secretary of Defense, in addition to being directed to provide a list of our defense facilities for any use anyone wants to put it, is put between the devil and the sea by the law. Section 18 provides a fine of $10,000 and a 10-year prison sentence for anyone who gathers, transmits, or loses defense information. Listing of defense plants is certainly defense information of the most vital kind.

The conflicting provisions of the law look as if Congress is directing the Secretary of Defense to get himself jailed.

Opportunity and Responsibility of the Eighty-second Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRED L. CRAWFORD
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, November 30, 1950

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, the Eighty-second Congress is maneuvering into position. This so-called "lame duck" session gives an opportunity to form lines for what is to occur after next January 3. If you believe in the two-party system; if you believe in representative government; if you believe that the leaders in the two parties should work closely together when the Nation faces great emergencies, then you should be able to have hope and take courage at this present moment.

Neither major party has a comfortable working majority. Neither party can just go off in a room alone and draft plans for the country, take them to the floor of House and Senate and enact those plans into law. Whatever is done, must be done through the cooperation of the two leaderships heading the two parties—what is done must be done cooperatively.

Going back to our belief in a two-party system and the proposition that both parties should work closely together when the Nation faces great peril, we come now to the proposition that the leadership of the two parties in the Eighty-second Congress substantially qualifies as the conservative wing of the two parties. Many of the so-called and recognized radicals were eliminated in the last election—primary and general. A weeding-out process occurred and I personally am thankful for what happened in this respect, but do regret the perfectly horrible international mess we now have in our lap.

Radical legislation, in my humble opinion, will not be approved during the coming 2 years. Even if Mr. Truman does recommend such and aggressively promotes such, my guess is it will fail of passage. Mr. Truman could be successful in having a bill introduced; but to get it through the two Houses would be something entirely different. Neither party can on its own, proceed to get radical legislation approved.

The big job ahead is to digest and deal with, as best we can, the radical legislation already on the statute books; to get financed the commitments—internal and external—already approved: To find out the perimeter of the direct international commitments which we must finance, first, with money; second, with materials; third, with manpower; to put such checks on those who are making these commitments as will enable us to take stock of what has already been committed, and all before other far-reaching promises have been made by us.

Secretary of State Acheson has sarcastically complained about the "reexaminists" and has shown just a wee bit too much of his arrogance toward congressional leaders and the people.

Unfortunately, too many of the Secretary's proposals have never been closely and critically examined in the first instance. It is not so much a case of the reexaminists as it is of having some one take a genuine look at the proposition before it is completely swallowed by the Congress through being authorized and appropriated.

The State Department of this Government has been substantially "in the saddle" now for many years—probably too many. It has grown accustomed to "saying the word" and the Congress authorized and appropriated the billions. This has gone on and on until now the billionitis has taken hold—a very firm hold—on our living. And what has all this brought us? The radical wing of English socialism is now ready to fight us.

The Federal Government and States should ration themselves. Do not rely on the efficacy of fiscal and credit controls only. Government's demand for goods and services is just as effective as that of individual citizens. Federal and State Governments can do without many things now being bought and used and these demands plus those of the citizen, exceeds supply and naturally inflation is inevitable. We cannot long consume more than we produce and for us to try to do such a thing only adds to the swollen river of inflation: Dams erected by the Treasury and Federal Reserve, and the efforts of the price and wage fixers will be washed out. Plants and men are not working full capacity. Hours should be extended to at least 45 hours per week, without extended pay—giving the worker more dollars and the people more goods, and both effects would protect the worker from inflation, and provide a higher standard of living.

Literally millions of our people are now caught in the net of destructive inflation: The buying power of your savings and current earnings grows less each day. Government-dictated low interest rates prevail; Federal debt expands; deficits become permanent policy of Government; buying power of all the savings of all the people diminishes. This is inflation. How much more of it do we want? Count your dollars—then measure their buying power.

The United Nations Organization now faces a supreme test. Acheson's State Department has committed us across the face of the earth. Socialist England continues to appease Red China. If our State Department is to further "go along" with Red Russia and China and their British supporters, then we, who believe in a two-party system must consolidate our strength and leadership and protect the United States from further disintegration. This is the opportunity and responsibility of the present leadership of the new Congress.

The Internal Security Act—3

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ANDREW J. BIEMILLER
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, November 30, 1950

Mr. BIEMILLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am pleased to present the third of a series of editorials from the Milwaukee Journal on the Internal Security Act. The following editorial appeared on October 26:

THE INTERNAL SECURITY ACT—3

(This is the third of several editorials discussing the Internal Security Act of 1950, the so-called McCarran anti-Communist bill.)

Law enforcement and intelligence experts contend that the requirement of the internal security act of 1950 that all Communists be required to register is undesirable. Even if we assume that they are mistaken, there is grave doubt that the law can be made to work.

The purpose of the law is to tag all Communists as "unclean" as a warning to all Americans. It's the old plan of "belling the cat." What method does the law provide for doing the "belling"? It provides a rather futile and endless game of tag in which the quarry, when he's about to be caught, suddenly disappears into thin air.

Despite the law, not one Communist or Communist organization had registered up to the deadline last Monday. The Attorney General now becomes "it." He is charged with going before the subversive activities control board—an agency appointed a few days ago by the President—with evidence, witnesses, and proof that persons he knows to be Communist are Communists in fact.

Assume the Attorney General proves his case to the Board. The persons named can carry the decision to the United States Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia. If the court upholds the Board ruling, the case can be appealed to the Supreme Court.

There are an estimated 55,000 Communists in the United States. Under the law the Attorney General will have to start action against all who are known if they do not register. The administrative job of handling those thousands of cases will bury the Board in an impossible job.

The National Labor Relations Board has only one or two thousand cases before it in a year. In 1949 the Board reported it was taking 464 days, or more than 15 months, to make a decision in an average case. With 25 to 50 times as many cases—and more difficult legal evidence to assess—the Subversives Control Board would undoubtedly have a much longer average.

Appeals to the court of appeals take from 6½ to 40 months, with an average of 17½ months. The Supreme Court takes longer. Swamped as they will be by the Communist cases, the courts can hardly maintain their present records.

Altogether this adds up to more than 4 years for an average labor case carried through the Board and the courts. With their known ability to use legal instruments of delay the Communists can certainly run each case well beyond the 4-year average.

Certainly if the Communists constitute a clear and present danger to the Nation's security we cannot afford to wait that long to put them behind bars.

And what of the day that the organization is found to be Communist and ordered by the highest court to register? If it operates like Communist groups in the past, it will be found to have dissolved into thin air long since. Its membership will be found in an innocuous looking new organization long before the final determination by the courts. Then the legal machinery will have to be put into gear again—with the same result.

The law in this respect—and many expert lawyers have testified to it—is unworkable, cumbersome, and ridiculous. It can no more curb the Communist menace than a Communist can openly thumb his nose at Stalin.

How Close Is Socialism in America?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES T. PATTERSON
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 1, 1950

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, one of my constituents has called to my attention a newspaper clipping which purportedly quoted from a public-assistance report issued by the Federal Security Agency. The clipping inferred that language in that report indicated the desirability of the "socialized state."

To satisfy myself, I obtained a copy of the report in question and found that the language contained in one sentence could have no other construction placed upon it. I quote as follows:

Social-security and public-assistance programs are a basic essential for attainment of the socialized state envisaged in democratic ideology, a way of life which so far has been realized only in slight measure.

The Administrator of the Federal Security Agency, Oscar Ewing, is a controversial figure in Government who has often denied allegations that he has propagandized for socialistic measures. Mr. Oscar Ewing is the person who would administer any national health plan adopted by the Congress. Perhaps the language included in this report points up the reluctance of Congress to authorize a sweeping and bureaucratic health plan which would be under the guidance of the Federal Security Administrator.

I append a copy of the letter I have addressed to Mr. Ewing requesting an explanation of the language used in the report.

NOVEMBER 30, 1950.

Hon. OSCAR EWING,
Administrator, Federal Security Agency, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. EWING: There has recently come to my attention Public Assistance Report No. 8, entitled "Common Human Needs." The report is intended as "an interpretation for staff in public assistance agencies" and, as such, has undoubtedly been given wide distribution throughout local and state social agencies.

Both the foreword and the introduction of this booklet give credence to the fact that the report is an authorized project of the Federal Security Agency, which had been closely scrutinized by responsible persons in the Administration.

Upon reading the report in its entirety I was astounded to note on page 57 under the chapter entitled "Adulthood and Old Age," the following sentence: "Social security and public assistance programs are a basic essential for attainment of the socialized state envisaged in democratic ideology, a way of life which so far has been realized only in slight measure."

To the best of my knowledge the citizens of America do not envisage the establishment of a "socialized state" nor do they desire it. In any event, I deem it improper for an administrative agency of the Government to disseminate material which would indicate that the socialization of America is a natural sequence to the establishment of a social-security program. It is clearly understood that the Congress which authorized a social-security program, and following Congresses which adopted liberalizing amendments, had no such intention.

I am deeply disturbed by the implications of the quoted language from an official document issued through your agency, and would appreciate receiving a report as to the origin and intention of the excerpt.

Very truly yours,

JAMES T. PATTERSON,
Member of Congress.

The Internal Security Act—7

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ANDREW J. BIEMILLER
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 1, 1950

Mr. BIEMILLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am pleased to present the seventh of a series of editorials from the Milwaukee Journal on the internal security act. The following editorial appeared on October 31:

THE INTERNAL SECURITY ACT—7

(This is the seventh of a series of editorials discussing the Internal Security Act of 1950, the so-called McCarran anti-Communist bill.)

Experience is bearing out the prediction of the Attorney General, of immigration authorities and of the State Department that the Internal Security Act of 1950 would throw an iron curtain around the United States.

The vague and broad provisions of the bill automatically bar from the United States anyone who was ever affiliated with the Communist or other totalitarian party of any foreign government. The ban is subject only to the right of the Attorney General to give special permission for temporary entry. Each case must be taken up with the Attorney General individually. Each exempted case and his action must be reported by him in detail to Congress.

What has happened? Ellis Island is filled with foreign visitors awaiting the Attorney General's decision on whether they are to be admitted. The State Department has been forced to order all of its officials all over the world to suspend passport visas and recheck them to make sure people who plan to visit here never were affiliated with a totalitarian party.

What does affiliation mean? It meant, for Friedrich Guida, 20-year-old Austrian pianist, membership in the Hitler youth movement when he was 10 years of age.

Guida, like every other German youngster, had to belong to the movement to go to school. That was his only participation in nazism. Yet he was barred from entry and was able to keep a Carnegie Hall concert engagement only because the Attorney General rushed approval for a 6-day stay.

It meant for Mrs. Fedora Barbieri, 25, an Italian opera singer, attendance at a Fascist school in Italy—and all schools were Fascist in Italy under Mussolini.

It means that anyone who ever sang for the Communists, the Nazis, the Fascists, cannot come here and sing because to perform under those regimes it was necessary to belong to government-controlled organizations or unions.

It means that scientists, educators, writers and others who lived under totalitarian governments cannot bring their genius to us. President Truman, in his foreign policy speech in San Francisco, called upon Russia to lift the iron curtain and permit the free exchange of information and ideas. That has always been the American way. But it is no longer the American way under the internal security act.

Now we have our own iron curtain—and it will plague us until Congress amends the law that created it.

Differences on Far Eastern Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FREDERICK C. SMITH
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 1, 1950

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, here is news which should interest every citizen of the United States. In Newsweek's November 27 issue appears the following:

The Korean war began paying its fattest dividends to Russia last week. Unity on Korea between the United States and its chief western allies threatened to founder on the issue of policy toward Red China. The arrival this week at the UN of a Chinese Communist delegation may provoke the showdown.

Worse still, differences on far eastern policy showed some signs of threatening western unity in the Atlantic world. This was demonstrated by an illuminating incident in London last week.

This incident was tied in with the old effort by the British Labor Party's left wing to impose its policies on the government. Its international significance was thereby discounted but it did show disturbing underlying currents. It occurred when four American correspondents were told categorically by sources within the British Cabinet that because of alarm over the far eastern situation and the rearmament race in Europe, the Socialist government would renounce any further American military aid and henceforth arm only within its own means.

This information was cabled to Newsweek by its London bureau. Newsweek instructed its Washington bureau to check with the State Department. The news caused consternation in the Department and a cable was immediately dispatched to the United States Embassy in London. The Embassy was greatly concerned since it was aware of a growing British stress on partnership in financing Atlantic rearmament.

Embassy officials got in touch with the British Government and obtained an official denial that any decision had been taken to renounce American military assistance. The Embassy informed the State Department this week end that the denial could be taken in good faith. But it underlined the seriousness of the left wing effort to impose its policy. Monday London officially announced the denial.

This extreme attitude on rearmament mainly reflected policies of the left wing of the Labor Party, headed by Health Minister Aneurin Bevan. But concern over far eastern policy reached from extreme right to extreme left. The weekly Tribune, the organ of Bevan and his followers, charged General MacArthur had defied instructions from the UN and the United States in ordering advances to the Manchurian border. The staunchly conservative London Daily Mail editorialized on the terrible danger of another world war developing in Korea, and it regretted MacArthur's branding Chinese intervention as international lawlessness. The Daily Mail yearned for the blessing of a buffer state covering the Manchurian frontier. In the House of Commons, Winston Churchill asked that the Government constantly bear in mind the great importance of not becoming too much pinned down in China.

From Lord Salisbury, once chief assistant to Anthony Eden in the Foreign Office and now Conservative leader in the House of Lords, came a warning the British considered deeply significant. Salisbury feared the UN forces in Korea had, if anything, advanced too far. He thought we should in no circumstances attack beyond the Manchurian border. He advocated leaving a small area in North Korea unoccupied by United Nations forces. Then Salisbury recommended that "another effort * * * be made * * * to reach a settlement, or at least some sort of modus vivendi, with Russia."

How could the United States avoid a headlong collision with its chief allies? The State Department, under increasing fire from the victorious Republicans, would probably find it politically impossible to go as far as the British wanted in making a deal with the Chinese Reds. For the moment, therefore, United States diplomacy walked softly. A United Nations debate on Formosa was postponed at American request. President Truman officially assured the Chinese "that we have never at any time entertained any intention to carry hostilities into China." Secretary of State Acheson stressed that everything possible must be done to disabuse the Chinese of the idea that the United States had any ulterior designs on Manchuria.

The Chinese replied to the President and the Secretary with the usual vituperation that America had lied and smashed her way across the world to Chinese territory and into it. But at Lake Success Communist sources carefully circulated a story that the Chinese Communists' delegation was bringing with it terms to settle the Far Eastern crisis. These terms involved creation of a buffer zone in North Korea and the end of American recognition of and aid to Chiang Kai-shek. At the same time the Chinese were supposed to be planning to pour more and more thousands of volunteers into Korea to convince the United States that it either had to make a settlement or face endless war.

But the stakes at Lake Success had become higher than even settlement of the Korean War. The West faced the greatest test of its solidarity against Communist force and Communist wiles since the end of the Second World War.

Mr. Speaker, indications are that Truman and Acheson are now striving hard to resolve the catastrophic blunder of Korea to suit the Socialist Government of Great Britain. If they do not succeed in this, will England come in on our side or will she turn her back on us?

What more than this is needed to cause the United States to pull up in Europe?

The Internal Security Act--5

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ANDREW J. BIEMILLER
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 30, 1950

Mr. BIEMILLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am pleased to present the fifth of a series of editorials from the Milwaukee Journal on the Internal Security Act. The following editorial appeared on October 28:

THE INTERNAL SECURITY ACT—5

(This is the fifth of a series of editorials discussing the Internal Security Act of 1950, the so-called McCarran anti-Communist bill.)

Under a witch-hunting subversives control board and Attorney General, or a board and Attorney General without a high sense of civil liberties, the Internal Security Act of 1950 could become the vehicle for calling almost any group in America a Communist front.

Communist fronts, under the law, are required to register with the Attorney General and, when registered, to inform the public in all of their radio, publication, or other propaganda that they are Communist organizations.

What are the tests for a Communist front under the law? The tests are these: The extent to which Communists control an organization, the extent to which Communists contribute to its financial support, the extent to which it furthers activities of Communist action groups, and—now this is the source of danger—the extent to which its policy stands coincide with Communist policy.

In the opinion of such men as Senator PAUL DOUGLAS (Democrat, Illinois), Senator ESTES KEFAUVER (Democrat, Tennessee), and Senator HERBERT LEHMAN (Democrat, New York), an unscrupulous attorney general could brand as a Communist front any organization that opposed the Marshall plan, ECA, the North Atlantic Pact, arms aid to Europe, and prewar aid to Korea. The Communists oppose all these things. Some of these things are opposed by various American groups—including some conservative segments of the Republican Party. Would that make these groups in the Republican Party Communist fronts?

Many labor and other groups continually fight for civil liberties, FEPC, public housing, minimum wages—all of which the Communists seize upon in their pretended interest in the workingman. These civil-rights ideas are communistic to a good many Southern Senators. Many of the proposed welfare programs argued in Washington—the Brannan plan, health insurance, and others—are branded as communistic and steps toward totalitarian government by conservative opponents. Would that make segments of the Democratic Party Communist fronts?

It's possible. Certainly stranger and just as ridiculous interpretations of law were used by the Federalists when the alien and sedition act was law. They convicted Republicans who had done nothing more than oppose Federalist legislation. Certainly some of the Red-hunt activities of the Attorney General after World War I were just as great perversions of the law.

It is not enough to state, as supporters of the new law contend, that such interpretations are not the intent of the law. They are possible under the law. To have them happen—no matter whether later court decisions right false interpretations or not—would bring irreparable injury to innocent people.

This whole business of proving an organization a Communist front by legal processes poses an impossible task. It involves proving what men think. How can such an illusive thing be proved when it is difficult in criminal courts of law to prove such relatively concrete things as what men did?

The possibility of being branded as a Communist front would be a further deterrent to liberty. It would tend to make individuals and groups fearful of expressing any ideas—in any instance—that could be interpreted to parallel Communist propaganda. It would bring timidity of expression and thought to a nation which was founded on imaginative and courageous expression and thought.

Flathead Lake Will Not Be Raised

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. MIKE MANSFIELD

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 1, 1950

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Speaker, during the first week in November, while I was in Montana, I heard rumors to the effect that a plan was on foot to raise the level of Flathead Lake. On Monday, November 6, in a radio address, I made the following statement:

In the last few days I have been receiving word from Kalispell that the rumors going around in the Flathead are that if the Democrats are elected—I suppose that means me—that Flathead Lake will be raised 50 feet. This is an outrageous falsehood because the people in the Flathead know the fight we had to save the lake in 1943; know that the Hungry Horse is assurance and insurance that the lake will not be tampered with again; know that I have stated repeatedly that I would never allow such a thing to happen under any circumstances. I have never lied to the people of Montana and when I give you an assurance you can depend on the fact that I am telling you the truth. Flathead Lake will not be tampered with. I repeat, Flathead Lake will not be tampered with.

On Wednesday, November 8, I came across some more information to the effect that statements had been published as follows:

But don't think that operation Raise-Flathead-Lake is forgotten.

And again:

But Saturday afternoon, a group of public-spirited citizens came to us with concrete evidence. Evidence, which in our opinion proves, there is a movement afoot to raise Flathead Lake. Some of these citizens are Democrats, some Republicans. But the evidence they presented is strong and powerful. Here is the evidence:

1. About 2 years ago the Bonneville Power Administration surveyed, purchased the land for and built the power transmission line through the lower valley (this line shown on map above by solid line). Look at this line and it will show you it follows the shortest, straightest path from Somers to Hungry Horse Dam.

2. But a Bonneville Power Administration engineering crew has for the past several days been surveying a relocation of the power line along the high ground skirting the foothills west of Kalispell. (Shown on the map above by the broken lines.)

3. The local head of the Bonneville office said late yesterday afternoon the new path for the relocated power line would be 5 miles longer than the lower valley route.

Bonneville engineers estimate the cost of the new line at $80,000 per mile, which increases the cost over the lower valley line some $400,000. But this is only the beginning of the extra cost.

The Bonneville office said it has not included the cost of any of the land necessary for the new foothills route. This means a strip of land at least 18 miles long and 250 feet wide must be purchased. And what else? Bonneville must buy all the houses, farm buildings and businesses, etc., lying in the path of the new high-ground route.

And again:

Why is Bonneville abandoning its existing water-level route through the Lower Valley?

Why if this was a good route 2 years ago after a careful survey is it no longer satisfactory?

Why is Bonneville willing to spend a fortune in order to get its new line on higher ground along the foothills?

Why? Because the Government planners know something that we don't know. They may know that the raising of Flathead Lake is in the picture for the immediate future.

And again:

And facts they are. Ask Victor Guest. Ask H. G. Ferguson. Ask Harold Hebert. Ask Ray Lincoln. Ask Eddie Nordtome. Ask Dan Highland. Ask Harry Ross. Ask S. Redmond. Ask them if Bonneville's engineers have not been busy as bees surveying the new high-ground route.

Don't take our word for it. Drive out and see where this line is going, talk to these men and learn for yourselves why some of them came into the Inter Lake worried about their property and businesses and asked for help.

Immediately on my return to Washington, I contacted the Bonneville Power Administration—brought these remarks to their attention and told them I wanted a definite answer to the questions raised. On November 14 I received a copy of a message which was sent by Dr. Paul J. Raver, Administrator of Bonneville Power Administration, to Mr. J. J. Mangan, area manager at Kalispell, Mont., which reads as follows:

Please inform any persons interested in or doubtful about the matter that the Bonneville Power Administration has no plans for raising the storage level of Flathead Lake.

The Bonneville Power Administration knows of no such plans by any Government agency, either within the Department of the Interior or without it. Since 1943, when such a proposal first came to the Bonneville Power Administration's attention, we have been opposed to raising the level of Flathead Lake.

On November 27 I received a letter from Dr. Paul J. Raver, which states in no uncertain terms that the proposed new route of the Bonneville Power Administration is not a part of a plan to revive the long-defunct proposals to raise the level of Flathead Lake and that such an assertion is without any foundation whatever. I am indeed sorry that false statements concerning the raising of Flathead Lake have been circulated in Flathead County and elsewhere throughout the State of Montana. I am stating for the record on the basis of the information sent to me, that Bonneville Power Administration has no plans to raise the storage level of Flathead Lake; that the Bonneville Power Administration knows of no such plans by any Government agency either within the Department of Interior or without it; and that since 1943 when such a proposal first came to the Bonneville Power Administration's attention, it—the Bonneville Power Administration—has been opposed to raising the level of Flathead Lake.

I wish to state also for the RECORD on the basis of information sent to me by Dr. Paul J. Raver, Administrator of the Bonneville Power Administration, that "the recent statements in the Kalispell press that the proposed new route is part of a plan to revive the long-defunct proposals to raise the level of Flathead Lake are without any foundation." I wish to state also in my own behalf that one of the reasons for the Mansfield Act, Public Law 329, Seventy-eighth Congress, H. R. 3570, to authorize the construction of Hungry Horse Dam, was to give assurances that Flathead Lake would not be tampered with again and to furnish insurance that such a catastrophe would never face the people of Montana in the future.

I want to state that under no circumstances, as far as I am concerned, will Flathead Lake ever be tampered with again. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent granted me by the House, I am inserting at this point in my remarks, a letter dated November 24, 1950, from Dr. Paul J. Raver, Administrator of the Bonneville Power Administration, to me and also a memorandum from the Bonneville Power Administration designers to its chief engineer, Mr. Schultz, describing the line-location problem near Kalispell and detailing the factors behind its decision and the savings which will accrue to the Government and its customers through the change in routing:

UNITED STATES
DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
BONNEVILLE POWER ADMINISTRATION,
Portland, Oreg., November 24, 1950.

Hon. MIKE MANSFIELD,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. MANSFIELD: This letter replies to your recent request for detailed information regarding the Administration's activities is surviving a new right-of-way for the authorized Hot Springs-Hungry Horse 230-kilovolt transmission line in the vicinity of Kalispell.

As you know, we already operate a 115-kilovolt transmission line from Kerr Dam to Hungry Horse which was placed in service about 3 years ago. The right-of-way for this line roughly parallels the southwest shore of Flathead Lake, crosses the Flathead River below Kalispell, and continues up the east side of the river into the Hungry Horse dam site.

At the time this 115-kilovolt line was constructed, we were aware that additional transmission capacity between Hungry Horse and the remainder of the system would be needed by the time Hungry Horse generation was ready to be placed on the line. Accordingly, easements for the initial 115-kilovolt line include provison for an additional line on the same right-of-way, and they were negotiated and purchased on that basis.

At the time the above right-of-way was acquired, the potential hazards of heavy spring runoffs and the meandering course of the Flathead River were carefully considered by our engineers. Based on discussions with local people and examination of aerial maps and existing topography, they concluded that erosion and scouring conditions had probably stabilized. Subsequent encroachments of the river during high-water periods, notably in the spring of 1948, again raised questions as to construction of a high-capacity circuit paralleling the 115-kilovolt line. This additional line, of course, will have to be of heavy 230-kilovolt construction, since it will become the principal means of integrating the Hungry Horse plant with the rest of the region.

During the process of acquiring detailed field data for designing and constructing the Hot Springs-Hungry Horse 230-kilovolt line, the Flathead River route was again investigated. A thorough examination of the field conditions by our top design engineers led to their recommendation that the additional circuit be relocated on land free from the hazards of high water. They advised also that an additional $174,000 would be required, if the original right-of-way were used, for more massive and permanent foundations and structures in the portions which are subject to further encroachment by the river. Obviously, there could be no guarantee that even this additional expenditure would obviate prolonged interruption of Hungry Horse output under adverse high-water conditions. It was therefore decided to investigate alternative locations.

The route finally selected and approved runs to the west of Kalispell. In spite of an additional length of approximately 6 miles the cost of the 230-kilovolt line in the new location will be $66,000 less than locating it parallel to the 115-kilovolt line on the present right-of-way. About the time this decision was reached, we were advised that the Harvey Machine Co. was planning to locate its new plant near Kalispell. As events have turned out, the new location reduces the cost of facilities necessary to serve this new plant by $250,000 or more.

While the Federal Government does not route its lines solely and specifically for the purpose of saving money for its industrial customers, we are interested in providing for the best over-all method of service. Considering the nature of the times we live in, it is obviously important to save materials and expense to both the customer and the Government wherever this dual purpose can be achieved.

Attached you will find a map which compares the location of the present circuit with the alternative right-of-way for the new circuit. You will also find a memorandum from our designers to our Chief Engineer, Mr. Schultz, describing the line-location problem near Kalispell and detailing the factors behind our decision and the savings which will accrue to the Government and its customers through the change in routing.

You will also find a copy of the policy statement which I recently forwarded to Mr. Mangan, our manager at Kalispell, for public use in that area. Needless to say, the recent statements in the Kalispell press that the proposed new route is part of a plan to revive the long-defunct proposals to raise the level of Flathead Lake are without any foundation whatever. The problem of river encroachments is not a new one with us, and this particular situation was handled as a straightforward engineering problem.

I also understand there have been intimations that the proposed new route may damage agricultural lands and improvements thereon. You will understand, of course, that these manifestations are normal in any growing area where land values may be on the rise, either actually or potentially. As a matter of fact, we have rarely found it necessary to acquire and remove buildings from our rights-of-way, and then only in congested locations. It is our practice to acquire easements only for transmission-line locations, and to encourage the use of the land under the lines for crops. As you can see, this long-standing policy benefits not only the farmer but results in considerable savings to the Government by reducing initial land costs and subsequent expenditures for reclearing and maintenance of rights-of-way.

Sincerely yours,

PAUL J. RAVER,
Administrator.

OCTOBER 10, 1950.

CHIEF ENGINEER,
Branch of Design and Construction, Hungry Horse-Hot Springs Line, Work Order 374-01, Proposed Kalispell Relocation:

In line with decisions reached in your office on Friday, September 22, we are proceeding to survey the new 230-kilovolt Hungry Horse line so that it leaves the route of the 115-kilovolt line at a point east of Columbia Falls, crosses the Flathead River immediately southwest of Columbia Falls, thence westerly and southerly to the immediate vicinity of the Harvey aluminum plant site, thence southwesterly to a point a short distance west of the Kalispell west city limits, thence southerly to a junction with the route of the 115-kilovolt line where it leaves the west side of the valley south of Kalispell and goes over the hills. From this point, the line will parallel the 115-kilovolt line on the existing right-of-way to a point near Elmo, where it will diverge on the new right-of-way and proceed to Hot Springs.

The length of the new location, from the point where it leaves the 115-kilovolt line till it returns again is about 26½ miles. This compares with a length of 20 miles for the corresponding section, had it been decided to parallel the 115-kilovolt line.

The purpose of this memorandum is to record the factors which resulted in the decision to select the slightly longer route.

About 11 miles of 115-kilovolt-line location east and southeast of Kalispell lie in a low valley area where the river has many times changed its course in the past years, as shown by marshes, sloughs, and abandoned water courses.

At the time the 115-kilovolt line was surveyed, it was located east of the city primarily to obtain the shortest route. The river problem was not overlooked, however. A crossing was found where the banks were relatively high and where evidence seemed to indicate that the channel course had been fairly stable. It does not appear that we could better this location by any other route on the east side of Kalispell. Nevertheless, several factors cause us concern. The river crossing lies at the downstream end of a bend in the river, and a field check shows that the river bank on the south side has cut back toward the wood pole crossing structure about 60 feet, as compared to its position at the time the original survey was made. Scouring is even worse slightly upstream where the bank has cut back very close to the county road. On the north side of the river, the banks are much lower and covered during floodwaters. Some concern is also felt about a bend in the river a short distance upstream, which comes within a few hundred feet of our right-of-way, and where we fear that the river might cut a new channel across the low ground adjacent to and on our right-of-way during a flood.

Mr. Farr has estimated that special construction, including a number of concrete footings, will be necessary in the 4-mile section including the river crossing, and that high steel crossing towers will be necessary so that they can be placed at a greater distance from the present river bank. Even with these precautions, he feels that there would remain a definite hazard in the event of floods or river-channel changes.

In the area immediately north of our 115-kilovolt Kalispell substation, there is another section of several miles crossing low ground which includes an old river channel and flood area. An estimate was also made of the cost of providing special footings through this area, but it was found cheaper to cross the 115-kilovolt line twice and locate the 230-kilovolt in this section on the east or opposite side of the north-south county road.

COST COMPARISON

A transmission design section estimate has been made for the 20-mile section starting at the angle point east of Columbia Falls and continuing to the edge of the valley south of Kalispell, including the relocation just mentioned north of the substation. This cost is $942,000 or an average cost of $47,100 per mile, as compared to an over-all average of $38,370 per mile in the last previous estimate for the total future Hungry Horse-Hot Springs line.

It is hard to evaluate with certainty the hazard caused by the river to a location east of town. Consideration has been given to the regulating effect of Hungry Horse Dam which could have decreased the 1948 flood flow from 102,000 to 64,000 second-feet at the peak, and would have decreased the river stage at Columbia Falls by 4.3 feet. Other figures of interest are the average of the annual peaks of record of 60,000 second-feet and the over-all average stream flow of 8,500 second-feet. Some savings under the estimated figure could doubtless be made by taking a greater calculated risk. On the other hand, expenditure of the entire amount will not eliminate all the risk.

In addition to this location, the location described in the first paragraph was investigated in the field. This 26½-mile section is estimated to cost $875,700 or $33,400 per mile, as compared with an over-all average figure of $38,370 per mile for the entire Hungry Horse-Hot Springs line.

RELATION TO LIBBY DAM

In addition to cost and safety, the location west of Kalispell has incidental advantages (which it is hard to evaluate exactly at this time). Lying farther to the west, it is in a convenient location for possible future intertie with lines from Libby.

SURVEY AND DESIGN

There will be some increase in design and survey workload, the latter being increased by an estimated four party-months. The energization date should not be affected.

ALUMINUM PLANT

Location west of the river will also save the Harvey Co. a considerable investment in the permanent 230-kilovolt loop line from our old right-of-way to their plant. Had the line been located east of the river, it had been proposed that the Harvey Co. would build a loop to their plant with sectionalizing and bypass disconnecting switches at the point of take-off. A preliminary estimate of their cost for this was $250,000. This figure, however, was based on the assumption that steel crossing towers would not be necessary at the Flathead River crossing. A subsequent field check raised doubts as to whether wood pole crossings would be safe under flood conditions, and we would have recommended that the company use steel towers on the east bank of the Flathead River at the center of the island between the Flathead River and Gooderich Bayou, and on the high ground west of Gooderich Bayou, making two spans of approximately 2,200 feet in length on each circuit supported by steel structures. This would have increased their cost considerably above the $250,000 estimate.

With the selection of the new locations, some means will be necessary to provide initial service from our 115-kilovolt line. The most satisfactory from our standpoint would be a single temporary tap line of 115-kilovolt construction from a point on our 115-kilovolt line directly east of the aluminum plant. For the short time this would be in service, the company might be willing to risk an all-wood pole 115-kilovolt line of relatively light construction. Another alternate would be to attempt to speed up the Columbia Falls-Harvey section of the 230-kilovolt line using wood poles and spar arms, so it could be used for initial 115-kilovolt service. However, this would be a change from the original line design which contemplated light steel for higher dependability and better ultimate economy. Unless we hear otherwise from your office, we will assume that the Harvey Co. will provide a temporary 115-kilovolt line.

Assistant Chief, Branch of Design and Construction.

American Policy in Korea

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT S. KERR
OF OKLAHOMA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, December 1 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. KERR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "Wisdom Can Win," written by Erwin D. Canham, and published in the Christian Science Monitor of November 29, 1950.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

WISDOM CAN WIN

(By Erwin D. Canham)

Mankind faces the gravest crisis since the end of the Second World War. United Nations forces led by the United States are involved in war with some 200,000 troops of Communist China. Unless some kind of agreement can be reached with the Chinese Communist Government, it is apparent that the UN forces in Korea will have to be heavily reinforced, and will face a long and terribly difficult campaign. While this is happening in Asia, it is feared that the Soviet Union would have a free hand in Europe, which is ill-prepared to defend itself against aggression.

Meantime, at Lake Success the American Government has solemnly accused Communist China of open and notorious aggression and has called for a Security Council vote condemning this aggression and demanding that it cease. Red China's delegate at the UN, former Gen. Wu Hsiu-chuan refused in his first speech to reply to these charges and instead merely lashed out in Soviet-like invective against the United States.

The violent nature of Mr. Wu's speech may have driven some UN members back to support of the United States. Some of them had been wavering. Some of them felt it was rash for General MacArthur to launch an offensive just as the Chinese Reds were arriving for talks at the UN. Others have believed the UN forces should not have gone all the way to the Yalu River. They think the Chinese never would have entered the war if their own frontier had not been touched and—in their view—threatened. And still other UN members were against pressing the fight north of the thirty-eighth parallel. They believe we could have restored the independence of South Korea without running the risk of large-scale war with China.

These criticisms of American policy have been rumbling in the Western European capitals, and in India and the Middle East. And so, while the UN may ultimately condemn Chinese intervention in Korea, it is still very dubious whether the UN will authorize military action against Manchuria, as General MacArthur implies should be done. There still remain many who hope the Chinese would accept a neutralized border.

A whole series of portentous questions face the United States and the UN.

The immediate problem is to stabilize the situation on the front. We could not hope to negotiate with the Chinese or anybody else while we are on the run. More extensive forces from other UN members may well be demanded. But if the European members face the danger of aggression, it is hard to see how they could spare many troops. And the fighting in Indochina as well as the unrest in Malaya is making severe demands on French and British troops in Asia.

In any event, stabilization of the front in Korea will depend on the forces on the spot. One expert likens the situation to the second day of the Battle of the Bulge in Europe. Then General Eisenhower had enough reserves to turn the tide. Has General MacArthur enough reserves or other advantages to hold the line? That is the immediate question.

The next question, closely related, is whether General MacArthur should be authorized to carry the war to Manchuria. This is a problem of immense difficulty. The Chinese have carried the war to General MacArthur—they are using Manchuria as privileged sanctuary. But to attack them there would certainly bring on full-scale war with Communist China, which is a vast quicksand of military involvement. As long as there is hope of negotiation, it is certain many UN members would oppose carrying the war to Manchuria.

It is well for the wise citizen not to be swept into panic. It is well to remember that the Chinese carefully refrained from intervening in the conflict until their own frontier had been reached. Perhaps if we stabilize a line back from the frontier the possibility of negotiations would be much brighter. Thus, in a few days or weeks, the outlook might change again as sharply as it has changed in recent days.

The great need is to do everything necessary but nothing rash or foolish. Above all, the door should never be closed to diplomatic discussions of the problem. Such discussions can be fruitful, it is true, only when they proceed from positions of strength. But it is important not to underestimate our own basic strength.

It is still most reasonable to assume that the Soviet Union is quite satisfied with its present progress without precipitating a world war. And the Chinese, once they are satisfied about their frontier, have really no motive of their own for attacking UN forces. They have plenty of problems in the internal development of their country.

Formosa remains a problem. Some American Senators are urging utmost aid to Chiang Kai-shek, which is the same as advocating an all-out declaration of war on the countless millions of Communist China. But wisdom can solve this problem, too.

We should not fall victims to our own violent language, and assume that a world war is inevitable. A world war, as we all know, would be a catastrophe, and there are many ways of preventing it. One way—the best way—is for all of us to do our thinking and acting as citizens to prevent our Nation and the UN from taking a wrong or reckless step in this crisis.

We are teetering on the edge of wide-scale war with China. But—despite the attacks in Korea—such a war can still be limited and reduced and prevented. That can happen if fuel is not poured on the flames by heedless and ill-informed action.

We in the free world know that our intentions toward the totalitarian states are not aggressive. All we want is the right for people to determine their own destiny and ultimately to improve their own conditions. We have learned from experience that this can best be done under a system which puts man first and the state second. We have learned that freedom can grow in a society where God is worshipped and His law is respected. We want to give all mankind a chance to learn by experience that these things are true.

This is our true peace program, but we have failed to convey it adequately to other nations—above all to the Chinese, with whom we have so long been linked by friendship. The ill consequences of our breach with the Chinese—as well as of our many mistakes in the Far East during the last decade—are now coming home to roost. But since our motives are genuinely in the interest of the people of Asia, we can still persist in the task of awakening them—and ourselves—to the folly of a general war.

Library of Congress Interprets Gettysburg Address for Congressman Doyle

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLYDE DOYLE
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, November 27, 1950

Mr. DOYLE. Mr. Speaker, Abraham Lincoln was a Member of the thirtieth session of the United States Congress and served as a Member of this House of Representatives, of which you and I are privileged to be Members, from March 4, 1847, to March 3, 1849. The first session of the Thirtieth Congress extended from December 6, 1847, to August 14, 1848, and the second session extended from December 4, 1848, to March 3, 1849.

On November 19, 1863, this same Abraham Lincoln on the Gettysburg battlefield delivered those words commonly designated as the Gettysburg Speech or the Gettysburg Address.

For many years, in connection with the birthday of Abraham Lincoln, I have had printed and distributed freely many copies of these immortal words by this "citizen of the ages."

I know you, my colleagues, will appreciate this interpretation of the Gettysburg Address as prepared for me at my request by the Library of Congress as much as I do:

CONTEMPORARY INTERPRETATION OF THE GETTYSBURG ADDRESS

It is now fourscore and 7 years ago that Abraham Lincoln stood by the gravesides of the Gettysburg battlefields, and spoke those few lines beginning "Fourscore and seven years ago our fathers brought forth on this continent a new nation, conceived in liberty, and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal." On that autumn day the great President spoke for but 2 or 3 minutes; the main address of the occasion was given by someone else, who took 2 hours. The President's voice was low, and it is said that only the first 15 rows of the audience could hear him—although they were not actually in rows, because everyone was standing. He himself referred very modestly to his own utterance as compared to the deeds of "the brave men, living and dead, who fought here." "The world will little note, nor long remember, what we say here, but it can never forget what they did here."

And yet, in the long reaches of time, it may turn out just the other way. The battle of Gettysburg, pivotal as it is in our history, tends more and more to become just one of the "battles of long ago," the memory of which grows dim as each generation comes further away from the event itself. This has not been the fate of the words which Lincoln said there. They have been caught up in the mind and heart of the Nation. They have been reprinted tens of thousands of times. Every school boy cons them by heart. Their echoes are reflected in 10,000 utterances. It is one of the major single utterances of our history and it is hard to believe that the world will ever forget them. They express the soul of the Nation.

In this year 1950, fourscore and seven years later, they have a new appositeness. The cycle has turned again, and we are once more in a crisis not unlike that of 1863, but on a global plane, and not on just a domestic one. These words spoken so long ago are opportune now.

To Lincoln, this Nation was a nation dedicated to freedom. This, in his prophetic mind, was its grandest characteristic. He quoted Jefferson's phrase that "all men are created equal." Here, on this continent, was conceived a government that should be "of the people, by the people, for the people."

The great question of that day was, can such a nation, built on such principles, "conceived in liberty," long endure?

Never from that time until now has the answer seemed more dubious. Freedom is under attack, not only in our own but in every country in the world which has any measure of such freedom. Can freedom endure against the massed forces of communism, or will governments of the people, by the people, for the people, perish from the earth after all?

A still earlier utterance of Lincoln's might apply with still more literal exactness to our crisis today. In a message to a special session of Congress on July 4, 1861, Lincoln used these words:

"And this issue embraces more than the fate of these United States. It presents to the whole family of man the question whether a constitutional republic or democracy—a government of the people by the same people—can or cannot maintain its * * * integrity against its domestic foes. It presents the question whether discontented individuals * * * can * * * break up their government, and thus practically put an end to free government upon the earth. It forces us to ask: 'Is there, in all republics, this inherent and fatal weakness?' * * * This is essentially a people's contest. On the side of the Union it is a struggle for maintaining in the world that form and substance of government whose leading objective is to elevate the condition of men—to lift artificial weights from all shoulders; to clear the paths of laudable pursuit for all; to afford all an unfettered start, and a fair chance in the race for life."

Are these words anything else than a living description of the struggle which is going on in Korea, and which has already been lost for freedom in Czechoslovakia and Poland and Hungary and many another country, including for that matter Russia itself? Are they not a living description of the disaster we face if, in the world struggle which is now going on, all the still-free world shall be lost, including the United States?

To Abraham Lincoln, freedom is worth the cost of struggle, whatever the cost may be. In the language of his greatest biographer, Carl Sandburg, "He had stood that day, the world's foremost spokesman of popular government, saying that democracy was yet worth fighting for. * * * His cadences sang the ancient song that where there is freedom men have fought and sacrificed for it, and that freedom is worth men's dying for."

Today we have "brave men, living and dead" fighting that struggle in Korea. By tomorrow it may be elsewhere as well. The whole world may be engulfed, and the United States in the heart of it, in a vast civil war of humanity. It is for us to take from the honored dead of Korea increased devotion to the cause for which they gave the last full measure of devotion; that we here highly resolve that these dead shall not have died in vain; that this Nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom; and that government of the people, by the people, for the people shall not perish from the earth.

Mr. Speaker, as it is always appropriate to print and reprint, read and reread, and quote and requote the immortal words of this great American who once worked in the Halls of Congress as we are doing, I give you the Gettysburg Address:

Fourscore and seven years ago our fathers brought forth on this continent a new nation, conceived in liberty and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal.

Now we are engaged in a great Civil War, testing whether that nation, or any nation so conceived and so dedicated, can long endure. We are met on a great battlefield of that war. We have come to dedicate a portion of that field as a final resting place for those who here gave their lives that that nation might live. It is altogether fitting and proper that we should do this.

But, in a larger sense, we cannot dedicate—we cannot consecrate—we cannot hallow—this ground. The brave men, living and dead, who struggled here have consecrated it, far above our poor power to add or detract. The world will little note, nor long remember what we say here, but it can never forget what they did here. It is for us the living, rather, to be dedicated here to the unfinished work which they who fought here have thus far so nobly advanced. It is rather for us to be here dedicated to the great task remaining before us—that from these honored dead we take increased devotion to that cause for which they gave the last full measure of devotion—that we here highly resolve that these dead shall not have died in vain—that this Nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom—and that government of the people, by the people, for the people, shall not perish from the earth. (November 19, 1863.)

I have frequently advocated that this majestic oration should well be a special memory assignment for the school children of our Nation, for certainly its enduring words are universally rated as the masterpiece of the English language. This is substantiated by the fact that at the University of Oxford many years ago Lord Curzon included both the Gettysburg Address and Lincoln's second inaugural address as first and second places in the English language.

It is my great pleasure and inspiration to have been president of the Abraham Lincoln Club at my home city of Long Beach, Calif., for several years. I am also a member of the Board of Governors of the Lincoln Club of the District of Columbia.

There are similar Lincoln groups all over the various sections of our great Nation which are dedicated to the preservation and dissemination of knowledge respecting the history and biography of Abraham Lincoln. In this connection, Mr. Speaker, I feel, therefore, that it is my privilege to respectively, but vigorously, urge that every Member of this Congress and those who read this do everything in their power to see to it that a larger number of Lincoln groups be organized in the United States.

For the information of any who may be interested in undertaking this appropriate act, I am very sure that the Lincoln Club of the District of Columbia, the president of which is Bert Sheldon, 4824 Forty-third Place NW., Washington, D. C., would be very pleased to freely furnish information and advice and outlines of the bylaws which, no doubt, would be very helpful to groups desiring them.

The Internal Security Act—8

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ANDREW J. BIEMILLER

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 1, 1950

Mr. BIEMILLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am pleased to present the eighth of a series of editorials from the Milwaukee Journal on the Internal Security Act. The following editorial appeared on November 1:

THE INTERNAL SECURITY ACT—8

(This is the eighth of a series of editorials discussing the Internal Security Act of 1950, the so-called McCarran anti-Communist bill.)

While the headlines have been captured in the last several weeks by the singers and other prominent people barred from entry to the United States by the new Internal Security Act of 1950, the real heartaches are being created for many ordinary, everyday people.

Andrew E. Eskelinen, of Houghton, Mich., is a typical case. He told his story to Senator VANDENBERG (Republican, Michigan) in a letter reprinted in the Journal the other day.

Eskelinen fought in Europe in the American Army in World War II. After the war he met a German girl. He stayed on as a civilian employee in the occupation. Five years later, July 1, 1950, he married the girl—Amalie Einzer. He wants to take her to Michigan, where he runs a business he inherited from his father. But Amalie, it turns out, is a security risk under the new security law. She was never a member of the Nazi Party but she was a member of two groups affiliated with the Nazi Party—a girls' club and a labor union. As a German under Hitler's government she had to belong to both. Under the new law she cannot join her husband in his Michigan home.

Ridiculous? Of course. But the same kind of case is being repeated hundreds of times over under the new security law. People are finding their plans to bring relatives from Germany, Poland, Italy—any country affiliated with a totalitarian government—canceled by a law which was rushed into passage without adequate study.

Aliens already here—as wives, relatives, or friends of Americans—similarly face hardship under the bill. If they ever were affiliated with a totalitarian government—even by mere existence under it—they are subject to deportation.

Members of Congress are already feeling the wrath of anguished and astonished victims of the law and their relatives. They will hear more as the law continues to take effect.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

On Bedloe's Island in New York Harbor the plaque on the Statue of Liberty proclaims words that every school child has been taught to reverence:

"Give me your tired, your poor,
Your huddled masses yearning to breathe free,
The wretched refuse of your teeming shore,
Send these, the homeless, tempest tost to me,
I lift my lamp beside the golden door."

These are beautiful words, and they have meant greatness for America. But they must be getting some cynical glances from across the short stretch of water that separates Bedloe's from Ellis Island, the immigration station.

A man barred as a dangerous alien because Hitler made him join a youth group before he was 10 years of age must think that the "lamp beside the golden door" has gone out.

Aid to Yugoslavia

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KENNETH B. KEATING
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, November 30, 1950

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, the President has asked Congress to authorize funds for relief for Yugoslavia, which is presently suffering from extreme drought which has destroyed the crops and seriously endangered the lives of thousands of persons.

The argument is advanced that we as a Nation should help Tito by sending food since, if the famine becomes too severe, the peasants and city dwellers may revolt and overthrow his government. On the theory that half a loaf is better than none, we are asked to send aid to Tito, since, if his regime falls, a pro-Russian hierarchy will, in all probability, take its place.

There may be much merit to this contention. The immediate extension of relief may be disclosed by the hearings to be definitely in the long-range interest of our country. The suggestion should be thoroughly explored as a matter of urgency. No doubt Tito is potentially more useful and friendly to us than a Moscow-controlled puppet.

However, Mr. Speaker, I think we should recognize additional political facts of life when we approach this problem of sending aid.

Tito is an absolute dictator, and as such, controls his government with a firm hand.

Therefore, I am of the strong opinion that we should couple any grant of aid to his government and people, designed to assure his continuation in office, with the strongest possible representations regarding our concern over and disapproval of many of the steps heretofore taken by his totalitarian regime.

He can go far toward dispelling unfavorable reaction in this country to the necessarily repugnant proposition of helping to build up one dictator in order to weaken another. The Yugoslav Government should at once demonstrate its willingness to make amends for past mistakes by immediately releasing from prison Cardinal Aloysius Stepinac, formerly primate of that country, and by returning the rest of the children whom the Yugoslav Communists under Tito kidnaped from Greece.

Cardinal Stepinac was tried in September 1946 and on October 11 of that year he was sentenced to 16 years imprisonment at hard labor. Certainly religious people all over the world abhor the brutal treatment and unfair trial granted to the primate.

Early in 1949, outraged by the Stepinac incident and the closely ensuing life imprisonment sentence meted out to Cardinal Mindszenty by the Hungarian Communist regime in pursuance of its studied and distorted campaign of religious persecution, several Members introduced concurrent resolutions declaring it the sense of Congress that these violations of human rights and fundamental freedoms should be submitted by the United States to the United Nations. We have never been able to secure a hearing on these resolutions.

Now that we have some method of influencing Tito's decision in this matter, we should urge in the strongest possible terms that the primate should be released or, at the very least, that the Yugoslav Government should be required to justify its action in this matter before the United Nations.

Furthermore, at the time hearings are held by the Committee on Foreign Affairs on the proposed bill to extend economic aid to Yugoslavia an opportunity should be given the proponents of these resolutions of protest to present their case on behalf of these men of God whose only sin appears to have been to adhere to and proclaim their faith under an atheistic regime.

Furthermore, principles of simple international justice dictate that one quid pro quo for the extension of aid to Yugoslavia should be the release of the remainder of the 11,000 children abducted from Greek parents. It will be a long and heartbreaking task for the Red Cross to accomplish, and only if its workers receive prompt and real assistance from Yugoslavia can the present pitiable situation of these children be remedied.

Finally, we are holding in storage vast quantities of edible and nourishing foods at an ever-increasing cost to the taxpayers which might very well be sent to Yugoslavia's starving population.

To the maximum extent possible, we should utilize this practical and sensible solution for meeting this problem, since now more than ever our staggering commitments all over the world demand financial prudence.

This is not intended to be a plea for adverse action on the suggestion that economic aid be extended to Yugoslavia, but rather for a realistic appraisal of all the factors which should enter into our determination and a thorough and sincere canvass of all proposals which may be advanced for terms and conditions to be attached to such aid either by way of legislation or diplomatic negotiation.

International Law and Fisheries

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WARREN G. MAGNUSON
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, December 4 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a very interesting and intelligent article entitled "International Law and Fisheries," written by Mr. Edward W. Allen, one of the eminent authorities in my State. The article relates to the import of the proposed Japanese treaty on international law and international fisheries.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

INTERNATIONAL LAW AND FISHERIES
(By Edward W. Allen)

Many people, including, I regret to say, some lawyers who should know better, joke about there being no such thing as international law. To be sure, some of its attributes differ from those of municipal law, and defects certainly are apparent. Nevertheless, it does exist and, despite shortcomings, it does respond to a definite need in world relationships, both moral and practical. It was one of the regrettable features of the San Francisco meeting at which the United Nations Charter was formulated that the emphasis was placed on international politics instead of international law.

Perhaps our present troubles are partly due to disregard of principles of justice as fundamental to world peace and happiness. Donations and the squandering of billions of dollars to buy allies and friendships have proved to be futile substitutes.

Instead, therefore, of deriding international law, it behooves those who desire a peaceful world to acquaint themselves with its progress and possibilities as well as with its defects and to use their abilities to eliminate the deficiencies. Some of these deficiencies are due to the way in which international law developed. It is the combined result of customs, conflicts, force, reason, diplomacy, and the aspirations as well as the selfishness of human beings. Withal, it is an ever changing mixture of the practical with the altruistic and should never be permitted to become static.

So we find that in the days following the discovery of America, Spain, Portugal, and England were asserting nationalistic title to huge ocean areas, attempting to shut off each other and all other European nations from most of the world. However, it was not so much these world-circling contentions as it was contests over the herring fisheries of the North Sea which were particularly responsible for stimulating Hugo Grotius and other great legal writers of the seventeenth century to expound their theories as to ocean waters. And it is nothing to their discredit that they espoused views favorable to their own nationals.

Eventually, politicians and diplomats came to favor the idea that a nation should own so much, but only so much, of the ocean adjacent to its coast as it could defend from the shore. This was sometimes expressed as the range of cannon or 3 miles. Thus was born the so-called "3-mile rule." During the last century and a half, it became strongly advocated by the big-navy nations because it held to a minimum the waters from which their fishery and other vessels might be subjected to regulation or exclusion.

It should also be noted that ocean fishery conservation is really a very modern concept, for until recently it was pretty generally believed that such fisheries were inexhaustible.

Nevertheless, there has always been strong opposition to the 3-mile limitation. In spite of certain dogmatic assertions to the contrary, it is open to argument whether there has been such general world acceptance of this particular distance as would justify its being termed an established principle of international law.

Complementary to the idea of a nationality owned marginal sea, whether 3, 4, or 10 miles in width, has been the concept that in the open waters beyond, there can be no national ownership but that the nationals of any country may fish there without limitation.

Here again, however, it is unwise to be dogmatic, for two reasons: First, because there is substantial precedent for the view that, although a nation may have no ownership in the ocean waters beyond its marginal belt, it may, nevertheless, have special interests which it is entitled to protect beyond that belt; and second, because, as previously indicated, international law is always in a state of flux, it is based upon practicalities as well as theories, and when it becomes apparent that an absolutely enormous natural food reservoir can either be maintained in continuous production or can be ruinously curtailed, sensible people will be found to devise ways and means for protecting the supply.

Let us, therefore, not be too discouraged by the pessimistic pronouncements of Government officials or college professors who have no comprehension of the factual situation or of the food and industrial potentialities of the sea. Instead, let us view briefly what has been accomplished and what appear to be some of the possibilities.

We find it has been conclusively demonstrated in the case of salmon, halibut, whales, and fur seals that it is possible to rehabilitate the depleted stocks of such ocean fish and marine mammals.

We also find that this has been accomplished in some cases by the action of a single coastal nation; in some cases by bilateral or multilateral treaties whereby each nation separately agrees to restrict its own nationals; and in some cases, notably that of the Pacific coast halibut and the Sockeye salmon, by joint international management.

But, the theorists say, there are antique principles of international law which will legally permit of the complete frustration of these noble examples of conservation. The best answer is that these are examples of success and that the few attempts to violate these efforts have themselves been failures. I refer particularly to the British-Norwegian threat to disregard the International Fisheries Commission regulation of our north Pacific halibut and the actual invasion by the Japanese of the Bristol Bay red salmon fishery.

Each failure in attempting to apply an obsolete principle to such a current situation tends to invalidate the principle itself and to establish the validity of the new system of accomplishment.

And so we find a Presidential fishery proclamation of September 28, 1945, which deserves some attention, even if the Government departments which were charged with its implementation have failed to respond. The basic concept is that some coastal fisheries should only be fished to a limited extent, which I believe biologists refer to as the optimum, otherwise the future supply will be depleted. If, therefore, a fishery is being so fished, no additional food supply will result but, on the contrary, a valuable food supply will be decreased, if additional fishing is permitted. Hence, where nationals of one or more nations have developed such a fishery to its optimum or beyond, it is an unjustifiable economic waste to permit nationals of other countries to invade such a fishery.

On the other hand, where a coastal fishery has not been fully developed, so that it is not being fished to its optimum, then there is no justification for the coastal nation to object to nationals of other countries entering the fishery, providing always that they remain outside of territorial waters.

The proclamation asserted that this country was willing to apply these principles upon a reciprocal basis.

It has been stated that international law is a mixture of the practical and the altruistic. Perhaps it is simpler and better to say that, generally speaking, international law is an attempt to apply common sense to international relations—to be just and reasonable but not to be silly or gullible.

In this light we may approach the most imminent international situation which confronts the fishing industry of the Pacific coast—the matter of a Japanese fishery treaty. What is the situation and how can it be handled in conformity with international law?

It is well known that there are two types of philosophy in this country, both inside and outside of Government circles. There are those who believe that it is neither isolationistic, unreasonable, or immoral to maintain the integrity of American industry so that this country will really be able to give the world at large sound and effective leadership. Then there is the Henry Wallace type of philosophy which apparently conceives that the way to create a happy world is to sacrifice American industry to foreigners.

This latter type of thinking was well illustrated by the immaculate young man who said that it would be "ungentlemanly" to negotiate a fishery treaty with Japan until the Japanese were in position to refuse to do so.

The practical situation is that the Canadian and United States fisheries of this coast, sardines, herring, coastal tuna, halibut, salmon and others, are being fished to their optimum or more by the fishermen of these two countries; that the intrusion of Japanese fishermen into these fisheries would not increase production on a continuous year-to-year basis; that for their fishermen to come clear across the Pacific Ocean would only be possible because of their low standards of living and would, therefore, necessarily tend to reduce the standards of living of our own fishermen; that they already have a greater fish poundage production out of their own coastal fisheries than we have from ours; that our prewar experience was that Japanese fishery operations were destructive and inconsistent with sound fishery conservation; that the Japanese could substantially increase their own coastal fishery production if they would apply proper conservation measures; and that, if they should come over and deplete our coastal fisheries, it would probably result in our own fishermen going across the ocean to raid the Japanese coasts, a reciprocity of the type that no one wants.

The legal situation is that peace treaties historically have dealt with many subjects other than a mere paper peace; that Japan itself in its two peace treaties with Russia of 1905 and 1925 specifically incorporated fishery provisions; that there is nothing in international law to prevent any two (or more) nations from making treaties restricting fishing by their own nationals and vessels; that there is nothing in international law to prevent Japan from entering into a perfectly simple yet effective and reciprocal treaty that, until otherwise agreed, its fishing vessels will stay out of the coastal fisheries of Canada and the United States and, in turn, these two countries will keep their fishing vessels out of Japanese coastal fisheries; that this can readily be done and should be done as a part of the peace treaty or at the same time.

If the leading fishery nations bordering the Pacific Ocean take timely steps to avoid disputes in that most fertile field for conflict, coastal fisheries, other fields can be investigated with more deliberation and some treaty procedure can be evolved for dealing with the noncoastal fisheries as research may, from time to time, indicate necessity.

It is announced in the press that a Japanese peace treaty is imminent. If, as indicated, international law permits inclusion of provisions such as have been discussed, there is perhaps nothing better that could be done to create that international good will across the Pacific that is desired by the citizens of Japan as well as by those of Canada and the United States. International law can and should facilitate such sound diplomacy.

To neglect this opportunity is to court trouble and to threaten the future peace of the Pacific. International law can be misused to obstruct progress, but it can also be developed to keep abreast of world conditions and to promote world peace.

Let Us Remember Who the Culprit Is

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GUY M. GILLETTE

OF IOWA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, December 4 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, I feel certain that I speak for every Senator and every Member of the House of Representatives at this moment when I say that all of us seek only to be helpful, to be calm, to set an example for the rest of our citizens in this dark hour. None among us wishes to do anything or say anything to complicate the task of our Nation's leaders. None among us wishes to jump to hasty conclusions based on limited information. Each of us would desire only to contribute something of value to the strengthening of our Nation in both the physical and the moral sense.

It is evident to me, as it must be to all my colleagues, that many among our people are deeply fearful, greatly disturbed, and, above all, desperately confused.

Of supreme importance at this time, it seems to me, is the need to keep our minds on the source and origin of our present troubles. We must aim at the real target, not at the decoys that have been set afloat by our enemies. The enemy of America is not its own Government. The enemy of America is not its own President or any member of his Cabinet. The enemy of America is not any of its military chiefs at home or overseas. The enemy of America is not one or another or any of its allies. No; Mr. President, the enemy of America is to be found in the Kremlin, the capital of the Soviet Empire, the source of our agony in Korea, and the origin of the aggressions that menace the world. Let us, by all means and at all times, aim our attention and our anger at the real target: the Communist rulers of Soviet Russia.

I ask unanimous consent that the leading editorial of the Des Moines Register of the issue of November 30 on the Korean situation be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

LET US REMEMBER WHO THE CULPRIT IS

It is only human nature for us to let our bitterest prejudices flare up for a moment, when trouble breaks upon us unexpectedly and we are desperate with apprehension and fear. So no doubt there will now be another swell of recrimination against some of our military leaders, Government officials, diplomatic agents, and Congress itself, because of the reverses in Korea.

But when we pull our consciences and our patriotism together again, as shortly we will, the sober and honest citizen will recognize that the events which harass America throughout the world are not of our making. Unquestionably our statesmen have made mistakes. They are human. They have not had any divine foreknowledge about what was in the Russian or Chinese or any other mind.

Neither, incidentally, has anybody else had such divine foreknowledge—including the critics of everything that the Nation has done. Their most violent accusations are almost invariably based upon hindsight. Whether they would have been wiser than someone else if they themselves had been responsible for making the necessary decisions—that is a proper question.

Of course, in the case of each decision there were alternatives. Another leader or group of leaders might have chosen other alternatives. But whether, even though they had chosen other ones, their decisions would have turned out to be utopian, or even better—that, also, is a proper question. It is always easy to argue, after it is too late, that some particular alternative would have been the right one, since history by now will not permit either proof or disproof.

If we have learned any lesson at all from the last year or two, it should be that no one can predict the course of Communist schemery and that honor and good faith are indispensable weapons of democracy despite their short-term risks.

Let us illustrate with the situation that confronts us at this very moment:

What, actually, are the intentions of Red China? Who is wise enough to foresee? Shall we hurl ourselves into a desperate, all-our war at this moment—or shall we play for time and pray for a less horrible prospect than that?

Why do not those who, 6 months or a year from now, will be pointing out all of the tragic blunders of today's decisions—why do not they tell us now how to solve the situation with a quick snap of the fingers?

The answer is that there is no such solution available to mortal minds. We are compelled to make best guesses.

And even the best guesses as to Communist strategy are only good relatively, because Communist strategy will continue to shift in order to make our decisions as erroneous and impotent as possible. It will seek to circumvent and nullify our course of behavior as rapidly as we adopt it.

It is fairly simple now to go back to 1948 and see what we should have done, if the Communist world were going to follow the course that it has followed. The trouble is that if we had taken some other tack, the Communist course, too, would have swerved to a new, unforeseeable, but equally threatening channel.

This is not said with any thought of domestic political considerations at all. The Register happens to have felt for a long time that the National Government would be strengthened by new political forces bringing new vitality to it. But that new force, if it had come into power, would have been faced with substantially the same problems. The long-term goals of Communist strategy are not importantly affected by the eddies of political currents in the United States.

The conflict that confronts the free world today far transcends national partisan lines. It confronts us as a Nation of homogenous people with common ideals and a common stake. And neither of our major parties has more of inner courage, of loyalty to these ideals, or of patriotism than the other.

It is a stupid waste of our energies to carp and snipe at our own nationally elected and legally appointed leaders, when our very world is drenched with the gasoline of violence and anarchy and about to be set aflame. Whatever its human limitations, our Government was democratically chosen and it is filled with men passionately devoted to their responsibilities to the people of the Nation and of the world. It is not they who ordered the Russian delegates to sabotage the United Nations. It is not they who armed the North Koreans. It is not they who hurled half a million Chinese against our boys in Korea.

So let us all open our eyes and see the crisis in its true form. It may take all the sobriety and courage and clarity of mind that we can muster, before it is ended.

The National Science Foundation Board

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WARREN G. MAGNUSON

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, December 4 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a list of the suggested appointees to the National Science Foundation Board and a résumé of the biographies of the members chosen to handle this important work, and what they have done in the field of science education in this country.

I merely wish to point out that the suggested names are the names of great and eminent Americans. I think they are responding to this job almost as to a call to duty, in order that America may keep ahead of the rest of the world, not only in scientific achievement for our own welfare, but in scientific military achievement.

There being no objection, the résumé and list of appointees were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PRESIDENTIAL APPOINTEES TO THE NATIONAL SCIENCE FOUNDATION BOARD

Many of my colleagues will recall the National Science Foundation Act of 1950.

The Senate will soon be called upon to act on the confirmation of the Presidential appointees to the 24-member Board, who will mold the policy of the Foundation.

Too often we criticize, and so infrequently we praise, that it is important that the Members of the Senate study with care the noteworthy appointees that the President has selected for the National Science Foundation Board. It is most interesting to see that 16 States are represented.

I quote from the National Science Foundation Act of 1950 in reference to the appointees:

"NATIONAL SCIENCE BOARD

"SEC. 4. (a) The Board shall consist of 24 members to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and of the Director ex officio, and shall exercise the authority granted to the Foundation by this act. The persons nominated for appointment as members (1) shall be eminent in the fields of the basic sciences, medical science, engineering, agriculture, education, or public affairs; (2) shall be selected solely on the basis of established records of distinguished service; and (3) shall be so selected as to provide representation of the views of scientific leaders in all areas of the Nation. The President is requested, in the making of nominations of persons for appointment as members, to give due consideration to any recommendations for nomination which may be submitted to him by the National Academy of Sciences, the Association of Land Grant Colleges and Universities, the National Association of State Universities, the Association of American Colleges, or by other scientific or educational organizations.

"(b) The term of office of each voting member of the Board shall be 6 years, except that (1) any member appointed to fill a vacancy occurring prior to the expiration of the term for which his predecessor was appointed shall be appointed for the remainder of such term; and (2) the terms of office of the members first taking office after the date of enactment of this act shall expire, as designated by the President at the time of appointment, 8 at the end of 2 years, 8 at the end of 4 years, and 8 at the end of 6 years, after the date of enactment of this act. Any person who has been a member of the Board for twelve consecutive years shall thereafter be ineligible for appointment during the 2-year period following the expiration of such twelfth year.

"(c) The President shall call the first meeting of the Board, at which the first order of business shall be the election of a chairman and a vice chairman.

"(d) The Board shall meet annually on the first Monday in December and at such other times as the Chairman may determine, but he shall also call a meeting whenever one-third of the members so request in writing. A majority of the voting members of the Board shall constitute a quorum. Each member shall be given notice, by registered mail mailed to his last-known address of record not less than 15 days prior to any meeting, of the call of such meeting.

"(e) The first Chairman and Vice Chairman of the Board shall be elected by the Board to serve until the first Monday in December next succeeding the date of election at which time a Chairman and Vice Chairman shall be elected for a term of 2 years. Thereafter such election shall take place at the annual meeting occurring at the end of each such term. The Vice Chairman shall perform the duties of the Chairman in his absence. In case a vacancy occurs in the chairmanship or vice-chairmanship, the Board shall elect a member to fill such vacancy.

"DIRECTOR OF THE FOUNDATION

"SEC. 5. (a) There shall be a Director of the Foundation who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The Board may make recommendations to the President with respect to the appointment of the Director, and the Director shall not be appointed until the Board has had an opportunity to make such recommendations. He shall serve as a nonvoting ex officio member of the Board. In addition thereto he shall be the chief executive officer of the Foundation. The Director shall receive compensation at the rate of $15,000 per annum and shall serve for a term of 6 years unless sooner removed by the President.

"(b) In addition to the powers and duties specifically vested in him by this act, the Director shall, in accordance with the policies established by the Board, exercise the powers granted by sections 10 and 11 of this act, together with such other powers and duties as may be delegated to him by the Board; but no final action shall be taken by the Director in the exercise of any power granted by section 10 or 11 (c) unless in each instance the Board has reviewed and approved the action proposed to be taken."

The 24 Board members of the National Science Foundation, appointed by President Truman to make national policy for scientific research and education and administer Government grants, are representative of all sections of the Nation and the broad fields of science, engineering, and industry.

Among the membership are seven university presidents, heads of two big foundations, 11 deans, department heads, or professors of colleges, and two industrial presidents. Sixteen States and the District of Columbia are represented on the board of 24.

Professionally, the board includes four biologists, four chemists, four educators, two engineers, one geologist, two industrialists, one mathematician, three medical scientists, and three physicists.

Two women are on the board and one of them, Dr. Cori, is the only Nobel prize winner in the group. The board includes two Negroes, one a chemist and the other a college president.

The outstanding record of the appointees is of interest to every Member of the Senate. A résumé of their biographies follows:

National Education Program for Study of Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ESTES KEFAUVER

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, December 4 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, upon our return to Congress from the recent recess, Members of the Senate were gratified to find upon their desks copies of Your Congress magazine, outlining the formation of the committee for Congress by a group of outstanding correspondents, to sponsor Congress Study Councils in schools, colleges, and other groups and assemblages.

It seems to me that the thought motivating this program is a very fine one, and should result in much benefit in acquainting the country with the work of the Congress and the responsibilities resting upon its membership.

Any program which tends to create a better understanding of the national Congress, its membership, and its work is very much to be desired.

I therefore ask that there be inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD correspondence I have had with the editor of

Your Congress magazine which emphasizes the woeful lack in our school and college curricula of studies on even the basic functions of our Congress, a shortcoming which the Committee for Congress proposes to correct.

There being no objection, the correspondence was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

DECEMBER 1, 1950.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Further to our letter to you of November 27 outlining plans of the Committee for Congress, composed of a group of practical, working newspapermen, to sponsor a national-education program for Congress and its Members.

We are receiving offers of cooperation in this program from many people. Of course, the committee is hopeful that every Member of the Senate and House of Representatives will consent to serve as ex officio members of the committee. We will be highly gratified if they will take active roles in the program.

The educational project will endeavor to set up special-study groups in schools, colleges, women's clubs, service clubs, unions, factory groups, and in other assemblages. A special study kit will be supplied by the committee, along with current information about Congress and its members in Your Congress Magazine.

We would welcome additional inquiries on the program at the Committee for Congress, 1060 National Press Building, Washington 4, D. C., ME-2214.

The attached letters shed additional light on the educational program, particularly emphasizing the woeful lack of study material on Congress in our schools and colleges. We would appreciate their insertion in the RECORD.

HAL. J. MILLER,
Editor, Your Congress Magazine, Executive Director, Committee for Congress, Sponsor of Congress Study Councils.

NOVEMBER 29, 1950.

Mr. HAL J. MILLER,
Executive Director,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. MILLER: In this morning's CONGRESSIONAL RECORD I read with great interest your letter to Senator WILEY concerning the formation of the Committee for Congress and the publication of Your Congress magazine.

The sentiments expressed coincide so closely with my own views and philosophy that I am prompted to write to you for additional information. This problem of "educating democracy's citizens" in the operation of their Congress and Government has been one of my chief concerns as an undergraduate and now as a graduate student in political science here at the American University in Washington.

As you so ably point out, our civics and political science courses fall far short of their real objectives. I, too, am appalled by the apathy and lack of understanding of even the basic functions of our Congress.

Recognition of the need for materials for better education along these lines has led me to produce two works dealing with the legislative process. Both were published by the American University Press.

For your information and examination I am enclosing a copy of the most recent of these, entitled "Operation: Congress." Since its publication last month it has already been accepted for use as a supplemental text in several high schools, for use in civics courses, and by a number of colleges and universities.

Contributing to the final draft were such outstanding authorities in the field as Dr. W. Brooke Graves, of the legislative reference service of the Library of Congress; Dr. Paul F. Douglass, president of American University; Prof. M. Lloyd M. Short, of the University of Minnesota; and Prof. Stephen K. Bailey, of Wesleyan University.

It has occurred to me that your committee might be interested in the use of these booklets in your study programs or that you might wish to discuss printing rights of a modified version of Operation: Congress in Your Congress magazine. I note that you plan an article along these lines.

Past use of your fine publication, Pictorial Directory of Congress, assures me of the high quality of performance in your new publication, and I am certain that the important undertaking of the Committee for Congress, under your guidances, will be a success. Perhaps my interest and experience would qualify me to take a more active part in the work of your committee. I would welcome an opportunity to help advance, in any way, the worth-while objectives of your organization.

Very truly yours,

WILLIAM G. PHILLIPS.

THE COMMITTEE FOR CONGRESS,
December 1, 1950.

Mr. WILLIAM G. PHILLIPS,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. PHILLIPS: The members of the Committee for Congress were highly gratified to receive your letter of November 29 with its generous offer of the use of your excellent published material on Congress in our National Congress Study Council program. As the program progresses, we will certainly avail ourselves of this offer, as well as of your generous offer to be of personal assistance to the committee.

We were especially interested in your observation that our civics and political science courses fall far short of their real objectives and your comment that you are appalled by the apathy and lack of understanding of even the basic functions of our Congress.

This is corroboration of our own findings that there is widespread lack of understanding of our most cherished institution in the political sphere, our Congress. It is precisely that appalling situation that the Committee for Congress will endeavor to correct.

We were pleased to receive a copy of your publication Operation: Congress, and we will ascertain how it and your services can be worked into the program.

Yours sincerely,

HAL. J. MILLER,
Editor, Your Congress Magazine; Executive Director, Committee for Congress; Sponsor of National Congress Study Councils.

How To Manage Tito

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EUGENE D. O'SULLIVAN
OF NEBRASKA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, December 4, 1950

Mr. O'SULLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, there appeared in the Catholic Review, published at Baltimore, Md., on Friday, December 1, 1950, the following editorial by the Reverend James M. Gillis, C. S. P., under the unusual heading of "Sursum corda":

Someone has asked whether the famine in Yugoslavia is a biblical one, an act of God, or whether it has been wholly or partially caused by an economic system that simply will not work. In either case our sense of humanity and our religion compel us to come to the aid of the starving Yugoslavs. It will not do to say "charity begins at home," and let it go at that. Still worse would it be to say "they made their own bed; let them lie on it." If "they" means the people, they didn't make their own bed, any more than those who were placed on the bed of the tyrant Procrustes and stretched or shortened to fit it.

We may, some of us, be called isolationists * * * but we never were isolationists from humanity. Furthermore, a nation that can afford to send $70,000,000,000 to Russia can afford $105,000,000 worth of goods to Yugoslavia.

However, though we must be charitable, we need not be reckless or stupid or careless of consequences. It would be crazy for us to send food to Tito and let him distribute it as a reward to those who accept his regime with docility while withholding it from those who venture to show their dislike for communism. He will do just that if we let him, for he is an unprincipled tyrant and a pitiless murderer. It would be suicidal of us to promote his tyranny while saving his people from starvation.

In New York City * * * it is claimed that there was a public servant who used to bestow bounty upon the poor—many of them as ignorant as they were poor—but in the giving he conveyed the idea that what he gave came from him and not from the city or from Uncle Sam. We must not let Tito pull a stunt like that. So let us keep well in mind that the Yugoslav dictator is now and will always be what he was when he came to power: a bandit, a killer, a trickster, and that he is first, last, and always a Communist. It was Communist collectivization that made the present catastrophe or aggravated it.

The drought may have been an act of God but starvation was there before the drought. Constantin Fotitch, former Yugoslav Ambassador to the United States, writes in Human Events for November 8: "In order to buy capital equipment and raw materials from the west, Tito (after the split with the cominform) recklessly exported food with the result that all the reserves of the country were depleted. Long before the drought people had been reduced to near-starvation rations. The standard of living of the Yugoslav citizens was sacrificed to the Marxian goddess, industrialization, and of all the countries in the Balkans, Yugoslavia now pictures the most miserable picture."

And—

"In order to break the resistance of the peasants—who constitute 75 percent of the population and are one of the greatest obstacles to the consolidation of communism—the regime is imposing the policy of collectivization of the land. By all kinds of pressure it forces the farmers into the kolkhozes, and the secret police carries out the orders for the compulsory surrender of the crops with utmost brutality. The result is the passive resistance of the stubbornly independent farmers who refuse to become the slaves of the regime. Tito himself has admitted that in 1949 there was 11 percent more of uncultivated arable land than in 1939."

It reminds us of the condition in the Russian Ukraine in 1932–33 when some six to ten million peasants were deliberately starved by Stalin because of what Fotitch calls a megalomanic 5-year plan. The Yugoslav people are now in the same danger and largely for the same reason. We may, for the moment, relieve their hunger but it would be short-sighted of us to make no stipulation about the system that caused the hunger.

Tito claims to have 32 divisions; that is some 450,000 men under arms. He explains that this huge army is a necessity because of the threat of his one-time partner in crime, Stalin. If so, Tito should be reminded that we are now fighting Stalin in Korea, and that we could use 10 or 12 or more of those divisions. With 200,000 of his soldiers absent in Korea, the problem of feeding them would be solved—as usual—by us. Tito has thrown out some hints that he would fight the Chinese Reds. He is probably lying—Communists always lie—but we could at least call his bluff.

Fotitch continues: "In a speech in Zagreb on October 29, Tito boastfully claimed: 'I can openly state that the United States Government has set no conditions,' and then turned his wrath against the reactionaries at home and abroad who have 'started a campaign urging Americans to impose on him harsh conditions because the Belgrade regime was now trapped in a corner.'"

We need not impose harsh conditions but the least we can do when we hand out food to the Yugoslavs is to let them know that, thank God, we Americans are able to help them because we are not at the mercy of a dictator and of a murderous and suicidal economic system. * * * We had better not let Tito think that we are an easy mark. As a mere starter and as one token of good will he might release Archbishop Stepinac outright. Suppose we suggest it to him, and see what happens. But in any event we must not let the people starve.

The following newspaper item from the Catholic Review, published at Baltimore, Md., on Friday, December 1, 1950, throws light upon what is going on in Yugoslavia as far as the persecution of Catholic religious are concerned:

CZECH PRELATE, EIGHT PRIESTS FACING PRISON—NEW TRIALS RIGGED ON SPY CLAIM—BISHOP ZELA'S OWN CLERGY FORCED TO HELP PROSECUTION

Fresh evidence that communism, whether Moscow-dominated or not, is the implacable foe of religion is had in the latest news on the relentless persecution of religion in Czechoslovakia and Yugoslavia.

In the former, according to word allowed to come across borders closed to free, factual reporting, dispatches tell of a Communist-rigged trial of Catholic prelates and priests which recalls the hearings accorded Joseph Cardinal Mindszenty, imprisoned Primate of Hungary, and Archbishop Aloysius Stepinac of Zagreb, Yugoslavia. The Prague regime is a Kremlin puppet.

From Yugoslavia, which is Communist but at odds with Moscow, comes a report of stepped-up arrests of seminarians and seminary professors, obviously designed to strike at the priesthood at its source.

The Tito regime reportedly arrested three of six top officials of the Catholic seminary at Zagreb, the largest in that country. It had arrested 14 students there 3 months ago.

In Czechoslovakia, nine churchmen, including one bishop, were placed on trial by the Prague regime. It became the second major proceeding against officials of the Catholic Church in Czechoslovakia within a few months. In April of this year 10 prominent Czechoslovak leaders of religious communities were sentenced to terms of from 2 years to life for alleged antistate activities.

The Czechoslovak churchmen were charged with treason, espionage, spreading subversive propaganda, and helping persons flee the country.

On trial were: Bishop Stanislav Zela, auxiliary and vicar general of the Olomouc archdiocese; Abbot Jan Opasek, of the Benedictine monastery at Brevnov; and Abbot Stanislav Jarolimek, of the Premonstratensian monastery at Strahov.

MANY HELD IN DURESS

Also Msgr. Otekar Svec, former consultant at the papal nunciature in Prague; Josef Cihak, archdeacon of the metropolitan chapter at Prague's St. Vitus Cathedral; and Jan Boukal, first secretary to Archbishop Josef Beran, of Prague; and the Reverends Jaroslav Kulac, head of the missionary federation of priests; Antonin Mandl, director of the church's suppressed Catholic action; and Vaclav Mrtvy, Salesian priest who had been employed at the papal nunciature in Prague.

The three clergymen arrested by the Tito regime were described as the Reverends Josip Salac, spiritual director of the upper classes at the Zagreb seminary; Angelko Juric, S. J., spiritual director for the lower classes; and a Father Talan, vice rector at the seminary.

There was no exact information given on how long the Czech prelates and priests had been held under arrest before the trial began. However, it was definitely known that one of the accused, Monsignor Svec, had been under arrest since October 1949. At the time of his arrest he had not fully recovered from sufferings under the Nazis as a prisoner for 3 years at Dachau. Bishop Zela had been reported arrested last August.

PRESS GIVEN COPIES

Representatives of the western press were reportedly given copies of the indictment against the churchmen and passes to the courtroom a half hour before the trial was due to begin. They were forbidden to take along interpreters and informed that official interpretation would be provided over earphones in English, French, and Russian.

Following the well-known pattern of iron-curtain trials, the defendants confessed guilt or partial guilt as the trial progressed at Prague's Pancrac Prison.

The prisoners were reportedly questioned by a seven-man court and three prosecutors. There was no indication that the accused were given the privilege of a defense attorney.

The line of questioning pursued by the prosecutors sought to involve the country's two archbishops, Archbishops Beran and Josef Matocha, of Olomouc, in criminal activities.

Archbishop Beran was pictured as having drawn up espionage reports and forwarded them to the Vatican. Archbishop Matocha was described in the testimony as having defied the church laws on instructions from the Vatican. Neither of the prelates are defendants in the trial.

One Czech exile listening to Prague broadcasts of the trial stated he got the impression that what the indictment meant by an espionage report was any pastoral letter or report to the Holy See on the spiritual affairs of the church.

Comments from church papers in Rome stated that an analysis of the proceedings and charges showed the defendants were essentially tried for the crime of being Catholics, and that the trial was not of the defendants but of the Catholic Church.

Reports from the prison trial chamber pictured Bishop Zela pleading guilty in part to charges of treason and espionage. He was said to have apologized and stated he was deeply sorry.

Monsignor Boukal, Archbishop Beran's secretary, reportedly pleaded guilty to the charges and testified that he had drawn up political reports for both Archbishop Beran and the papal nunciature in Prague.

CITES SECRET LETTERS

Monsignor Cihak, head of the St. Vitus Cathedral chapter, was also reported to have pleaded guilty. He is said to have testified that he delivered secret letters for Archbishop Beran containing espionage reports. Monsignor Cihak was reported to have appeared thin and stoop-shouldered, making a meek confession of guilt and apologizing for his mistake.

It was noted that these confessions strikingly parallel those at other Red trials, from Stalin's Moscow purge trials of the 1930's to the many farcical trials of churchmen—Catholic and non-Catholic—in Soviet-satellite countries since the war.

The indictment released by the Czech Ministry of Information states that the espionage was directed by the papal nunciature in Prague; the church's Catholic Action was transformed into a widely ramified conspiratorial network for subversive and espionage activities; the defendants conducted the activities of terrorist groups, and many millions of funds were embezzled from the priests' health service for subversive ends.

No official reason was reported for the arrest of the three Yugoslav priests. But it was believed to have grown out of the previous arrest of 14 students at the seminary. Charges against these student were reportedly based on discovery of a rifle and anti-Tito leaflets in possession of two students. The leaflets were said to have borne the stamp "U," an identification mark that was used by the Ustachi, pro-Nazi Croatian organization that functioned during World War II.

One secular news dispatch indicated that the arrest of the priests stripped the Tito regime of its usual propaganda excuse that it was merely acting to crush a conspiracy. The dispatch stated:

"Persons acquainted with these developments said that the arrests have lost the character of a move by the Yugoslav Communist Government to crush an alleged conspiracy. They said the three officials held are innocent and that their arrest represents a new and important step in Marshal Tito's conflict with the Catholic Church."

From the foregoing, I believe we can say truthfully that the least we should do before giving any aid whatsoever to Tito is to endeavor to have him practice freedom of religion in his land and give to all peoples who have dedicated their lives to God that fair and proper treatment which their high and unselfish calling merits.

What better time is there than now to drive home this request as a must?

Any distribution of food supplies should be made in Yugoslavia by one of our international welfare agencies in well-marked packages stating that the United States of America is the donor.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 4, 1950

Mr. ROOSEVELT. Mr. Speaker, there is no need to dwell at length on the gravity of the present world crisis. It seems to me at this time that our greatest need is for rationality, deliberation, and courage. The courage we need is often harder to muster than what it takes to face guns in wartime. We need the courage to hold to those fundamental world policies which have made our country a force for peace for so many generations.

I would like to call to the attention of the House an excellent statement on the major problem before us; it is an article by Prof. Nathaniel Peffer, of Columbia University, entitled "In the Long Run Europe Is Our First Front":

IN THE LONG RUN EUROPE IS OUR FIRST FRONT—TO LOSE ASIA TO THE SOVIET WOULD BE SERIOUS, BUT TO LOSE ALL EUROPE COULD PROVE FATAL

(By Nathaniel Peffer)

If Washington, Jefferson, Hamilton, Franklin, and others of the Founding Fathers of the Republic were to revisit the earth to survey the progress of what they had wrought, they would no doubt be startled by skyscrapers, airplanes, telephones, and radio. But what would puzzle them most would be what on earth had brought it about that the Republic they had founded along a narrow fringe of the Atlantic seaboard should, in seven generations, have come to pledge its life, its fortunes, and its honor on the concerns of the continent on the other side of the Pacific.

If it were on the concerns of Europe, they might regret it, believing, as they did, that the Union's safety lay in detachment from external politics, but they would understand, since they regarded themselves as Englishmen and therefore Europeans. But why Asia? That they could not understand.

It is a question that must sometimes puzzle contemporary Americans, too. For one of the main preoccupations of this country in this generation has been the politics of the Far East, and it was actually because of the Japanese invasion of China and not because of the Nazis' conquest of nearly all Europe that America was brought into the last war. Still more, America has been torn within for a decade, part of it looking westward to Asia, part of it looking eastward to Europe—very much like Russia since the eighteenth century.

This was most dramatically in evidence after Pearl Harbor, when there was a sharp controversy, not always in the open, over the strategy of the war, the issue being whether to concentrate first on Germany or first on Japan. Owing to the firmness of President Roosevelt and General Marshall, the decision was in favor of defeating Germany first, but there was bitterness both within the fighting services and without.

Now there is a "cold war," and the controversy has been revived. Again the issue is: Shall this country concentrate its efforts on Asia or on Europe? Russia threatens in both. Where shall we try to check it first? There is an immediate contingency, and as long as the Chinese and North Koreans, or both, are threatening, America has no choice and cannot withdraw. But, in the long run, broader considerations enter and, for the long-run, decisions should be made on those considerations.

Now, however, the issue is political as well as military, and therefore more productive of rancor. It is political both externally and internally; externally, in that, by diplomatic pressure, economic measures and the establishment of strong points we are engaged in almost every part of the world; internally, in that the most acrid controversy in domestic politics now turns on what the present administration in Washington has or has not done in the Far East.

One thing has to be said. The controversy now raging is not always waged on the merits of the issue. It is clear that a great deal of the partisanship of all-out efforts for Asia is a disguised or oblique isolationism. Many of those who would let France go to save Formosa do not care so much about either as they do about letting the rest of the world "stew in its own juice." The solicitude for Chiang Kai-shek and Bao Dai can be a symbolic expression of resentment of the aberration of Woodrow Wilson, Franklin Roosevelt and influential leaders in the Atlantic seaboard. It is, in many cases, sometimes unconsciously, sometimes sincerely, a rationale for regression.

How has it come about? Why the preoccupation with Asia and how far is it justified? The question is not new, even if never before so urgent as now. It has been mounting toward fixity since the beginning of this century and principally it concerns China. It arises out of what has become an increasingly firm resolve to permit no great power to have control over that country.

In the first years of the century, the opposition was directed against Russia, which, then as now, had outposts in Manchuria and was manifesting aspirations to expand from there down into China proper. There were sharp diplomatic brushes between Washington and St. Petersburg, though with more decorum in vocabulary than can be found at Lake Success now.

This ended when Japan disposed of Russia in the war of 1904–1905 and was succeeded by the same situation between the United States and Japan over the same places and for the same reasons. Japan had supplanted Russia in Manchuria and was manifesting the same unmistakable desire to take all of China. This ended only with the ceremonies on the U. S. S. Missouri on September 2, 1945.

Among students of American foreign policy, there has never been agreement on why America has staked so much on the preservation of China's independence; outwardly, so much more than it has on the fate of any single European country. The reasons are mixed, as in all politics, but, originally, the main reason appears to have been more economic than anything else.

It is true that trade with China constituted a negligible fraction of American foreign trade, but the lure of what would come when China would be fully opened to foreign commerce and fully developed has exercised a fascination for almost a hundred years. This has changed now. The chief consideration is no longer economic but strategic. It has to do with American security. The hope of gain has given way to fear—fear of the danger that would be created by a Russia extending from Berlin to the Pacific. To that must be added ideological fear—fear of an all-powerful Russia that is also Communist.

Russia in Asia is even more difficult to explain. All the conventional motivations of foreign policy do not seem to fit except as an explanation after the fact. Clearly, the motive cannot be economic, since Russia is still relatively unindustrialized, underpopulated and rich in resources. It cannot be the need for security, since Russia proper never has been menaced by the weak nations and tribes of Asia. There is, rather, something elemental in Russia's eastward expansion, something geological, something glacial, moving slowly but relentlessly. At any rate, Russia was moving eastward across Asia as early as 300 years ago. By the middle of the nineteenth century it was in full course, and before the end of the century had arrived at the shores of the Pacific. Now, it appears to be solidly entrenched and still advancing. But even now it is impossible to say with assurance whether it moves as an empire in the classical sense, in a way Peter the Great would have approved, or as the vehicle of social revolution carrying Marxism to the Eastern World. Whatever the motives may be on both sides, the position is clear. Russia expands in Asia and America seeks to stop it. At the same time, Russia expands in Europe and America (as well as western Europe) seeks to stop it there too. But where shall America direct its major effort—to Europe or Asia? As in 1942, it has not enough power to attempt both simultaneously without being ineffective in both. Which shall it subordinate?

There is only one logical approach to the question. If the ultimate choice were forced in the immediate future by acts or events beyond our control, which of the two could be lost without jeodardizing America's continued existence as a Nation? Could we survive more easily, or, at least, be in less danger, if all Europe fell to Russia, or if all Asia fell to Russia?

Suppose, for example, Asia were lost. Just what would be the consequence to America? Economically, it would be unfortunate, but in future potentiality rather than present reality. It would restrict future opportunity, but not inflict at once a penalty that would be reflected in the American economy. At the worst, not all trade would cease. There was trade with Soviet Russia even before American recognition in 1933. The economic loss, in other words, would be relative rather than absolute.

Strategically, the consequences would be much more serious. Europe would become politically, as well as geographically, a peninsula. The whole Eurasian land mass, with the exception of India and Pakistan at least for a time, would be at Russia's disposal, for political, economic and military purposes. There would be created the largest political unit the world has known. But would it be for a long time the most formidable in terms of actual threat to highly organized and technically efficient societies such as those of western Europe and North America?

Let it be assumed that the whole of China's power is Russia's to use—an assumption not yet warranted in the long run. China has numbers, no doubt. It could provide an army of tens of millions. But as yet Chinese troops have been trained for old-fashioned, small-arms warfare and guerilla resistance only. They were effective against the demoralized, incompetently led armies of Chiang Kai-shek and for slow attrition of small Japanese units, but they would be of doubtful use against a modern army unless superiority of numbers were so overwhelming as to smother it by sheer mass. The North Koreans, it must be remembered, were dispersed in 3 weeks, despite their Russian tanks, when the American forces arrived in comparable numbers.

Aside from manpower, the accession of China, even if it were without reservation, would add little to Russian strength in the near future. China is yet without any real industry. It cannot make a tank or a heavy gun or even a jeep, let alone jet planes. It has only the most rudimentary beginning of industrialization and cannot accelerate the process very much, since it lacks both capital and technical personnel. It will be all the Communist regime can do to keep the country's head above water without a forced pace in industralization. Even if Russia has the capacity to industrialize China and thus provide it with powerful arament, which is doubtful in any period short of decades, there is no assurance that it would do so. Why should it want a really powerful country on its outermost boundaries, next to some of its most important new industrial centers? What guaranty has it that a strong China would always be at its disposal or even friendly? Despite the presumed ideological affinity, there is no reason to assume that Russia has an excessive trust in China or vice versa, most of all vice versa.

Suppose, too, that Russia were entrenched on the Pacific shore of Asia by virtue of controlling China. How much difference would that make? It is on the Pacific shore of Asia now at Vladivostok, which is closer to San Francisco or Detroit than Shanghai. It is still closer at Kamchatka, opposite the Aleutian Islands, from which it could attack American cities much more easily than from China bases.

All this is to say that Russian possession of all Asia would be serious but not fatal, at least for a long time, long enough, for Europe to be strengthened and its military and economic potential to be integrated with America's.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

But if Europe were lost to Russia? Then there would be economic consequences indeed. A large and important segment of America's export trade would be cut off—automobiles, farm machinery, business machines, machine tools, grains, meat, tobacco, and cotton. All would remain to glut the home market. Further, the billions lent to European countries during the war and afterward through ECA would have to be written off. America, no doubt, could make the required adjustments, but the blow would be a crippling one.

More grave would be the strategic consequences. For then Russia would have the whole world, except America, which would stand as an island in a vast militarist-Communist sea, Asia could go Communist and Europe remain unaffected, but if Europe became Communist, Asia would fall into line almost automatically. It would see the handwriting on the wall. Certainly, no part of it would have enough confidence in America to risk aliining itself with the United States.

Physically, America would be under direct threat. Russia would have at its disposal not only European manpower but Europe's industrial establishment and its advanced technological development, both in plant and personnel. This last might be the greatest lift to Russia from European conquest. Moreover, it would have convenient and easy jumping-off places for attack on America.

Ireland, the United Kingdom, the Iberian Peninsula, Greenland, Iceland, the Azores, North Africa, and Dakar—all are springboards. Then America would really be surrounded. It would have to become an armed camp, standing unremittingly on guard, all other considerations in American society—education, health, welfare—subordinated to the military. That alone would constitute defeat, would negate the promise of American destiny.

There is something else, more intangible, but no less compelling. The prospect of all western Europe coming under the brutish, atavistic regimen of Russian monolithic totalitarianism is not easily tolerable. Everything slowly grown and formed since the Renaissance, since the Dark Ages even, would be nullified. Western culture would be truncated. The west, after all, has developed slowly, in traditions and institutions of representative, responsible government and guarantees of equality under the law administered in channels of justice openly conducted.

It is not pleasant to think of Scandinavians, Hollanders, Frenchmen, and Englishmen going to bed at night wondering whether the 2 a. m. knock on the door will come and, if it comes, being dragged off and dropped somewhere into oblivion, their wives and children never knowing where they were or whether they were dead or alive, their kindest fate that of being hauled off to some Arctic slave camp. It is not pleasant to think of a Churchill confessing before the microphone at a trial after being held incommunicado for months; or an Attlee or a Herriot or a Bertrand Russell or an André Gide—confessing to anything and everything and then being dragged off to be shot as even common criminals are no longer shot.

It is not pleasant to think of a British physicist or a French philosopher standing up at a public hearing, renouncing all his previous beliefs in the light of the pronouncements of great Stalin, father and protector of England and France, light of the world, inventor of fire and the wheel, architect of the Parthenon, author of Hamlet, painter of the Sistine Chapel, composer of the Ninth Symphony, discoverer of electricity. It is not pleasant to think of all Europeans cowering in terror all their living moments, forever turning their heads to see who was listening, fearful always of the informer, not knowing whether their own children would report on them.

Then, surely, night would settle on Europe and there would be an end of all that has given western civilization its dignity.

Consciously to elect this in order to save Formosa and Indochina and Burma—that requires a resoluteness not easily come by, except as the last, the uttermost price of survival. And that it is not. On any fair examination of the issue on its merits we are not yet at that point. We can save ourselves and the world if we hold Europe, though we lose Asia. We can lose the world and ourselves if we lose Europe, though we hold Asia.

It is much as it was in 1942. We cannot come fully to the defense of both continents. A choice as to priority must be made in order to be successful in both in the end. Now as then, the claim of Europe is greater. We shall stand or fall in Europe.

Blundering Diplomacy—Keeping the Record Straight

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, December 4, 1950

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, the American people will pay an awful price in life and property because of blundering and inexcusable foreign policy and Democratic administrations since 1933. Now we find them precipitating this action into a global war from which there appears no present escape. Mr. George Sokolsky, writing in the Times-Herald today, points out eight grievous errors in foreign policy. Under leave to extend my remarks, I am including his article:

THESE DAYS
(By George Sokolsky)

The wise man, when he faces a crisis in his life, steps back and asks himself, "What have I done?" He reexamines his life; he seeks out his faults; but most of all, he probes for a way to cut his losses, to reverse his processes and to straighten himself out.

Only fools blame the environment, the times, the breaks, luck. No one gets very far in life by sulking and scheming. Only an imbecile devotes himself to covering up mistakes by new lies, until his structure collapses on his head. A lie has a curious way of fighting to the surface.

What is true of individuals is true of nations. The crisis appears. At that moment, a nation either blindly and stiffneckedly pursues the course which produced the crisis, or its best minds devote themselves to a reexamination of conduct with a view to rechanneling its attitudes.

Since 1939, it is apparent, beyond doubt, that great errors have been made by the leaders of our Nation. These errors need to be reexamined, not to blame the living or the dead, but to safeguard the future. I shall here list only a few demonstrable errors:

1. Our association with Soviet Russia in the war without prior stipulations as to peace terms. It is suggested that there was no time to work out a full peace program. That is a cover-up. There was ample time to outline the general terms of our participation.

2. The lend-lease agreements gave not ample protections to the United States. Lend-lease to a large degree won the war for Soviet Russia. We contributed $11,000,000,000 to the upbuilding of Soviet Russia's industrial and military strength. Peacetime industrial equipment should not have been provided.

3. Tehran (November 1943) represents the abnegation of American control of American decisions in foreign affairs. At Tehran the United States gave Soviet Russia, then weak, a blank check in Europe and Asia.

4. Tehran belied the Cairo declaration made about 5 days earlier. Both the Cairo declaration and the report on the Tehran conference were issued simultaneously on December 1, 1943. But on that date the Cairo declaration had already been nullified by Tehran. Roosevelt, Churchill, and Stalin on that date established a historic lie. For that our blood is being shed in Korea.

5. Roosevelt should not have gone to Yalta, because he was a dying man. He lacked the physical or moral strength to meet the challenge of empire.

6. During the war years we were in association with Soviet Russia as an ally, but it was never necessary to accept Communists. It was the Charley-good-fellow attitude that made it possible for Americans and aliens who were serving as Russian agents to infiltrate our Government in high positions.

The existence of the Harold Ware cell was known to President Roosevelt in 1939. He never acted. In fact, such agencies as the FBI were forbidden to arrest known and effective Russian spies.

7. It was a grievous error to make it impossible for the atomic energy authorities to dismiss suspects without proof. A man had no rights to work there. It was a privilege, to be withdrawn at will.

Furthermore, Acheson was one of a body that agreed to write a report. He was only a writer in this respect. The report on the future of the use of atomic energy should have been a closely guarded secret, otherwise we lost bargaining power.

The so-called Acheson-Lilienthal report was issued and publicized under shameful circumstances. When Baruch assumed the job of negotiation at the United Nations, he was plagued by this report.

8. The abandonment and betrayal of Chiang Kai-shek by the State Department from 1944, when he was still fighting, to this moment, when he is still offering to fight, is one of the most grievous errors in all history.

It was designed originally by Soviet Russia and carried out by Russian agents in the State Department, among whom the most publicized is Alger Hiss. A vast and untruthful campaign to justify this treason to America was conducted by the State Department.

After Soviet Russia had won a complete victory in China, Great Britain accepted the role of appeaser which the American State Department imitated. That policy produced the Korean War.

Freedom of Religion

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BROOKS HAYS
OF ARKANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, December 4, 1950

Mr. HAYS of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, the National Association of Broadcasters recently inaugurated a contest for students entitled "The Voice of Democracy" and requested me to prepare a statement on freedom of religion for use by the contestants. Under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix, I include the statement which I submitted in response to this request. The statement follows:

FREEDOM OF RELIGION

(By BROOKS HAYS)

No study of the meaning of democracy would be adequate without an emphasis upon freedom of worship. The constitutional guarantee that this privilege shall not be invaded is so much a part of our lives that we seldom stop to think of the conditions which produced it. Too often we think in negative terms. Perhaps we gained an impression from textbooks that the framers of the Constitution merely concluded that, since the idea of a state-controlled church had not worked well in the old world or in the Colonies, we would have none of that concept in the new Federal Government. To be sure, the policy of our Nation is definite on the point that we will not have an official religion. Separation of church and state is one of our distinctive contributions to the science of government.

But the first amendment to the Constitution says something else about the place of religious faith in American life. Here are its words: "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof." In stressing the free exercise of faith, Thomas Jefferson, the author of this amendment, so richly endowed with spiritual insight, was thinking not in governmental terms but rather of the individual citizen, his right to spiritual growth and his privilege of religious expression which should not be impaired.

In prohibiting a tax-supported church, the Constitution represents a break with the past; but it represents, also, the hopes and the dreams of the past for complete freedom for the human spirit.

It was a daring thing that our forefathers did, this assertion that the new Government should not control the patterns of worship and religious belief. The wise men who designed the Constitution were determined that the tremendous power of organized religion should never be used to inhibit the individual in relation to his Creator.

The first amendment to the Constitution is, therefore, one of the most significant instruments in history. There are two facets, and both must be viewed with understanding. First, the framers had a distrust of man; they recognized his frailty, and this applied not only to politicians and military men who had misused power, it applied even to the ministers. No man, according to this philosophy, could be trusted with power over the minds of his fellow man. But, again, the first amendment represents something besides distrust of man. Its positive aspect explains the reverence we have for it. It reveals a high opinion of man as God's creation. It encourages individual faith.

In granting full freedom of worship the authors revealed a faith that men would not abuse the privilege, that social stability would not be lost in the renunciation of control over religious forms. The Constitution reflects a faith that individual judgments in the supremely important issues of human life and destiny would not have a destructive impact. The authors dared to trust the individual in this vital realm of life.

Thus, it should be clear that our democratic ideal of religious freedom is not in disparagement of religion. Our governmental foundations are essentially spiritual. George Washington spoke for the young nation when he said in his Farewell Address that decency and morality in public life are not possible without the inspiration of religion. It is the American policy, however, to let the citizen seek an outlet for this divinely given right in ways that appeal to him so that each man worships God according to the dictates of his own conscience. And, again, as proof of our daring spirit in granting full freedom, we allow each to reserve to himself the privilege of not worshiping at all if he chooses not to do so. The resources of a positive faith recognized by the Constitution will save the Nation from any theoretical damage by those of infirm faith; they, too, must be protected.

It is an experiment, this American plan, but 161 years have proved its wisdom. We, the succeeding generations of Americans who have benefited by the cherished tradition, are sure that upon such a foundation of freedom and reverence for the individual the Republic will endure.

Still Reluctant To Draw From Oriental Manpower Pool

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BEN F. JENSEN

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 4, 1950

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Constantine Brown from the Washington Evening Star of December 3, 1950:

UNITED STATES STILL RELUCTANT TO DRAW FROM ORIENTAL MANPOWER POOL—CHIANG'S NATIONALIST ARMY AND JAPAN'S MILITARY POTENTIAL ARE KEPT SIDE-LINED

(By Constantine Brown)

As in the days between September 1939 and Pearl Harbor, there is a strong tendency on the part of Government officials to focus the minds of the American people on Europe. The sad truth is that we are at war in the Far East and that is the theater of decision, not Europe. Early victory in Asia is possible only through the intelligent use of all available manpower we have in that area—including the Chinese Nationalists and Japanese.

For the present there is not the slightest indication that such moves are contemplated by the White House, the State Department, and the Pentagon. Delicate international implications, they say, prevent such steps.

In World War II political exigencies made it necessary that we defeat Hitler first. That strategy, right or wrong, is now history. But lest we be deluded by pleading Oxford accents, let's study the problem in the light of the situation today.

SOVIET INTENTIONS CLEAR

At present, Russia is our deadly foe. Although in 1941 we had two enemies, separated by the vast Eurasian land mass, today that land mass is our enemy. Russia fronts on both oceans, just as the Axis did. In contrast with the German-Japanese link, Russia has but a single objective. She operates on interior lines while the Axis operated on far more difficult extended exterior lines.

The Kremlin has made a careful study of the Japanese mistakes and while she has adopted many of the old Tokyo ideas to inflame the oriental mind—Asia for the Asiatics, Down With the Colonial Power, and hatred of the foreigner—she has been far more astute in making these policies stick.

Russia now also is reaping the harvest of the defeats of the American, British, and French Armies at the hands of an oriental power—Japan—in 1942. The American victories in 1944 and 1945, when Japan was forced to accept unconditional surrender, are obscured, insofar as Asiatic peoples are concerned, by the lack of proper propaganda exploitation.

The abandonment of the Chinese Nationalists by the American Government in 1946 and the victory of the Soviet-supported Chinese Communists has created the impression throughout Asia that the western powers are doomed and a semi-Asiatic power has risen. This feeling was cleverly exploited by the Russians in the struggle they were preparing against the United States. Russia now has clearly indicated that she means to conquer, hold, govern, and exploit the areas which the Japanese merely occupied.

There is no guesswork in this connection. All we have to do is look at the developments of the last 5 months. It has been definitely and officially established that the North Korean attack was prepared and ordered in Moscow. So long as we were suffering defeat at the hands of the North Korean armies the Russians and their Chinese satellites did not intervene, except by sending war materials to the Korean Communists from Manchuria and Siberia.

DIPLOMATS SEEK EXCUSES

After the North Koreans were pulverized the Kremlin ordered the Chinese Communists to enter the battle. At least 150,000 Red Chinese troops are fighting us today in the subzero weather of the Korean mountains. Another force estimated at between 300,000 and 400,000 regular troops are near the Yalu River or at Mukden, ready to bolster the Communists.

Our diplomats are trying to find excuses for the action of the Peiping rulers. Some say they want to prevent the hydroelectric plants near the Manchurian border from falling into our hands. Others seem to believe that the military operations of the Chinese in Korea are intended as a diplomatic blackjack to force the entrance of the Peiping puppets into the United Nations.

Neither version seems to check with the actual facts. The Indian Ambassador at Peiping assured the Chinese rulers as far back as last August that Manchuria would not suffer in the least if the Korean Peninsula were unified as the United Nations intends that it be. These assurances were repeated officially and unofficially to the Russians at Lake Success and New York. The most far-reaching guarantees were to be given the Chinese to that effect.

The story that the Peiping Government had to make a demonstration of power in order to force open the United Nations doors is preposterous. Moscow and Peiping had assurances from New Delhi, London, and Paris that these powers would press the issue. Our own State Department, while opposed nominally to the replacement of the Nationalists by the Communists, had decided not to use the veto on this matter.

This was stated and repeated frequently by the highest officials, from Secretary Acheson down. There could be no doubt in the minds of the Chinese and their Soviet masters that the needed majority to place them in the United Nations was available, if they were really as anxious as they made out to put the Peiping regime in the organization. Hence, neither of the theories advanced by our diplomats to explain the entry of the Chinese Communists Fourth and Seventh Field Armies into the Korean War holds water.

The real reason is disclosed in the Tokyo military evaluation that the Russians are taking the final steps in their over-all plan to secure completely the Eurasian land mass as a base of operations against the western American defense line.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

JAPAN "TRUE OBJECTIVE"

Without engaging their own military resources in any way, the Russians are doing their utmost now to expel the Americans, the British, the French, and all other vestiges of western influence from the mainland of eastern Asia.

The war of the Viet Minh Communists against the French in Indochina is proceeding according to plan and it is highly doubtful that the French will be able to resist Ho Chi Minh's drives unless the west accepts the Red challenge in Asia and fights back with everything it has available.

The fate of Thailand and Burma, and eventually India, will be sealed the day the Sino-Soviet combination succeeds in gaining all its objectives in Indochina.

General MacArthur and his staff are said to be convinced that Japan and not Korea is the true objective of the Chinese-Russian forces. But before undertaking such a major operation, without risk, they must first inflict the heaviest possible losses on the American forces, which are supposed to defend that vital bastion of western defense. If this requires a demonstration of force in Europe in the near future, we can be sure that Russia will make it.

The most important handicap the western nations are experiencing now is the lack of manpower. Our mobilization is partial and slow. That of our western allies is nonexistent.

But there is a solid block of manpower available in the Far East. The Nationalists in Formosa have at least 500,000 well-trained men who, if modestly supplied with necessary modern weapons, can be of vital assistance to the western cause. Japan has a potential of 1,500,000 men ready to fight, if provided with the needed weapons.

We still have time to arm the Japanese and to supply American equipment to a Japanese army which not only will be willing but anxious to fight the Russians and the Chinese Communists. But that would not be nice, diplomatically speaking.

Address by Hon. Athanasios Politis

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD A. GARMATZ

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 4, 1950

Mr. GARMATZ. Mr. Speaker, last evening I was privileged to attend the annual banquet of Worthington Chapter, No. 30, Order of Ahepa, held at the Emerson Hotel in Baltimore, at which Mr. Nicholas J. Nestor was toastmaster.

We were privileged to hear an address by the Honorable Athanasios Politis, Greek Ambassador to the United States, and under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to insert the address in the RECORD.

The address follows:

I am delighted to be with you this evening. It is always a pleasure for me to spend an evening with the Ahepa family, and I am especially gratified to have been asked to come to Baltimore to share your festivities on this occasion.

Each contact that I have with Greek-American organizations is an invigorating experience—a source of new strength with which to carry on my work here.

It seems that fate has brought me many interesting trips around your vast country as a sort of compensation for my years of immobility in Moscow. There it was possible to move about only in a very restricted area. It was inconceivable that I could have met with an organization of Greeks, as I am doing tonight, even if such organizations were permitted to exist. You can be sure that the Greeks living in Russia would give anything to be able to form an organization such as yours. But, of course, you know that the word "freedom" is a word with a different meaning in the Russian vocabulary.

On the contrary, here in the United States, from the first days of my arrival, you have given me much pleasure by inviting me to your gatherings. You have allowed me to share your experiences. You have permitted me to observe your progress, and you have provided me with many opportunities to see how energetic and pretty the younger generation is. Of course, you will understand that when I say "pretty" I am not referring to the Sons of Pericles. Naturally, I mean the young ladies.

Wherever I have been—in Miami, Detroit, Philadelphia, New York, Cleveland, Washington, and here in Baltimore, I have been impressed by their beauty—and more by their charm.

I would also like to tell you that I am very much impressed by the beautiful way in which those of the younger generation in America dance our Greek dances. They dance them ever so much better than we do at home. In Greece, perhaps only Queen Frederika dances them even better.

You must come to Greece, all of you, and show us how to dance our own Greek dances. You must show us the grace and charm which I have seen young Greek-Americans display at all of the gatherings I have attended.

I pray that the world will remain at peace so that you may be able to come to Greece in 1951—the year that has been proclaimed homecoming year for Greeks all over the world. For some of you it will be a happy and joyous reunion with the families and friends you left when you came to the new world many years ago. For the rest of you, it will be a wonderful experience, I know, to visit the land of your fathers—to visit the land where civilization began.

Greece will greet you with open arms. Even 10 years of bitter war and hardship have not killed the open, kindly spirit of welcome that has made Greek hospitality an international byword.

You will see for yourselves that this brave country has attacked her monumental tasks with courage and fortitude and with American assistance has traveled far along the road of economic recovery.

Of course, there are problems which have not been completely resolved. One of these is the resettlement of all the refugees, tragic victims of over 10 years of war, in their villages. Above all, the Greek never loses his love for that bit of land where he was born. Our people in Greece are happy only when they are home—and home is where they were born—where they and their fathers before them tilled the soil. But when many of our people go home they find their towns, their villages and their homes in desolation and ruins—the handiwork of communism, the brutal revenge of the bandits and pillagers who could not break the Greek spirit.

You will see at first hand the wonderful work that has been done by the Greek organizations which sprang up to help those in need. You will meet those who will tell you about the work of the Friends of the Village, the magnificent organization which has helped to rehabilitate hundreds of towns and villages by arranging for their adoption by more prosperous centers that were not hit as hard by the war.

You will hear of the organization founded under the sponsorship of the King and Queen which took on the job of directing relief to the stricken areas. Cooking utensils, blankets, used clothing, woolens and hundreds of other items are being sent—items of little or no value to those who have them, but priceless to those who do not.

Many of the refugees are displaced persons in every sense of the word. Their towns leveled to the ground by Communist terrorists, their farms and homes destroyed, their possessions stolen, they have nothing to return to.

But there is new hope for many of them now. With the passage of the 1950 amendment to the Displaced Persons Act, people who lost everything in their struggle against Communist imperialism can now come to the United States and start new life in a country offering opportunities unmatched anywhere else in the world.

But these displaced persons wishing to come to the United States must be sponsored. For many of them it will be virtually impossible to obtain passage money and to pay for other incidental expenses. They must all be assured of jobs and shelter in the United States in order to qualify under the act.

This will not be too difficult for those who have relatives or friends in the United States ready to sponsor them. But what of the displaced person who has neither relatives nor friends here?

Again the Ahepa has stepped into the breach to add its powerful strength to the efforts of other Greek-American organizations and the churches. With its designation by the State Department as a certified voluntary agency, the Ahepa has undertaken to assume the responsibility of organizing this enormous and complicated task. In doing this, the Ahepa is once again displaying the great humanitarianism which has been a characteristic of this great organization since its birth in Atlanta, Ga., over a quarter of a century ago.

But to carry out this important responsibility, sponsors must be found who are willing to help their compatriots in this great time of need. There should be no qualified displaced person unable to find a sponsor. The members of the Ahepa, and Greek-Americans in general, have always shown that they are inspired by that great humanity which is common to the American and Greek Nations. I know that they will rise again to the occasion and help their people in this special problem so that the maximum number of persons will be enabled to reach the United States.

I hope, as I have already said, that there will be peace and that we will be able to proceed with those tasks that face us—the tasks of the peace-loving nations. But, as we all know, the international situation has entered into a period of crisis. To meet this crisis we must put our combined strength behind the flag of the united free world and take a stand for those principles we hold so dear. If we keep ourselves in readiness, if we hold to our resolve, we can and we shall weather the storm.

The Greek people have given proof of their refusal to bow down to totalitarianism. They gave proof with their victory over Communist aggression—the first victory against the new Communist imperialism. They gave additional proof by sending troops and aircraft to the United Nations in Korea—this from a nation still binding its wounds from its own battle against communism. If further proof was needed, it is to be found in Premier Venizelos' declaration that "Greece unreservedly stands at the side of the United States in the struggle of the free nations of the world."

America is more than the arsenal of democracy. It is the bastion of liberty and the hope of the freedom-loving people of the world.

I salute you as Greek-Americans, for you have both the Greek and the American resolution, and the strength that comes from that powerful combination.

You have a double love for freedom and a double understanding of the meaning of today's world struggle. Your contribution to the moral preparedness of your Nation for the momentous days that lie ahead will be important, for the strength of a nation lies in the strength of its people.

As ranking citizens of this great democratic America, your role will be significant, and your faith will help her to an inevitable triumph.

Dean Acheson's Speech Is Convincing Proof That We Need a New, Vigorous Secretary of State

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GORDON L. McDONOUGH
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, December 4, 1950

Mr. McDONOUGH. Mr. Speaker, Dean Acheson's recent radio report confirms the belief that I expressed last September that he should be fired now as Secretary of State. I thought I was hearing a high-school student in a speech before his graduation class. In fact, it was not as good as many I have heard. Then I thought I was hearing a speech in the House of Lords with the accent, but without the wisdom.

Acheson did not tell the American people one single thing that we do not already know.

It seems that Acheson is just waking up to the fact that communism is a threat to this Nation. We all know that. He did not think so when he sought to defend Alger Hiss. Acheson said that Communist Red China has committed an overt act in Korea. We all know that. It was Acheson, however, who agreed to withhold the veto of the United States to admitting Red China to the United Nations.

Acheson said we will fight to defend our freedom and independence. We have always done that and are doing it now in Korea.

Why did he not think of that when the State Department overruled the Defense Department by removing our Armed Forces from Korea before war broke out there in June? Was he thinking of protecting our freedom and independence when he said Korea was outside our perimeter of defense in the Pacific and thereby inviting Russia and North Korea to attack South Korea and put us on the defensive? Was he thinking of protecting our freedom and independence when he refused further aid to the Chinese Nationalist Government, and abandoned China to the Communists?

Acheson's speech indicated more deals with the Russian Communists on the immoral basis of Tehran, Yalta, Potsdam, and Moscow conferences through which we now find ourselves as a nation subject to the whim and caprice of Russia.

He revealed a complete lack of any policy to meet the crucial situation we are in today.

It was a complete waste of time to listen to Acheson stumble over simple words which showed a lack of conviction of what he was saying.

I am more convinced than ever that what this Nation needs badly—and right now—is a new Secretary of State.

Irresponsible Charges Against Secretary Acheson

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RAYMOND W. KARST
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, December 4, 1950

Mr. KARST. Mr. Speaker, I rise at this time for the purpose of making a most serious brief statement. We have just gone through an election in this country and the people have been privileged to exercise their democratic rights in a manner which stands out as a beacon light for free peoples throughout the world.

If this had been an ordinary campaign I would not feel called upon to make any further comment. But it has not been an ordinary campaign and these are not ordinary times. Thousands of our fellow citizens are removed from their homes and their families. Many have already died. Many more have been wounded. The Nation is making great sacrifices of men and materials on battlefields thousands of miles from our shores.

In the heat of the campaign I believe that too many men have forgotten themselves in an effort to gather a few more votes. All of us know that in a political campaign many things are said which are afterward regretted. Sometimes what is said is colored by a desire to be elected. Ordinarily the country could take these things in their stride.

But in this campaign some have gone too far, I believe, in playing on the fears and the prejudices and the insecurities of millions of our people for the sake of attracting votes. They have maligned and insulted; they have come dangerously close to degrading our elections, in their series of irresponsible charges hurled at Secretary of State Dean Acheson. It is high time they were answered and the charges stopped.

Dean Acheson has been made the victim of everything that is bad, and his name has been used to epitomize all the mistakes which have been made. Altogether too much politics has been played with our foreign policy and it will be very costly to the Nation unless it is stopped.

Mr. Speaker, in normal times we can afford to indulge ourselves to our heart's content. But what man in this Chamber will say these are normal times? I say that irresponsible politics, played today with our foreign policy, is actually being played with the lives and the future of countless thousands of our young men and their families.

Second guessing and grandstand managing are among the great American sports. But this is no game we are playing and the results are much more serious than a run or two for one team or another. Many believed that we could live in this world alone, and separated from the rest of mankind without regard for what takes place or what goes on in different parts of the world. We now know that this cannot be done. But many of us are accusing Secretary of State Dean Acheson of not doing the very things we refused to permit him to do. The time has come to call a halt to this second guessing and grandstand managing.

On the diplomatic front we must close our ranks and present a united front to the outside world. This does not mean that our Government or our State Department should be free from criticism or close supervision. No one could advocate that. It does mean that we will have to be above petty politics—above using our foreign policy to catch a few votes. It does mean an end to irresponsible charges and irresponsible action. It does mean a full realization of the seriousness of the hour and of our actions.

Successful foreign policy today, Mr. Speaker, may be the means of saving thousands of lives—it may even involve the future of our Nation. Victories on the diplomatic front may mean more than the capturing of thousands of prisoners or the conquering of vast areas of enemy territory which we do not want anyway.

Dean Acheson has already won many victories on the diplomatic front as history will eventually prove. He will win many more if we do not destroy him.

It would be a great tragedy, Mr. Speaker, if we did not recognize our obligation to ourselves and the world, if we did not find united effort and approach in our foreign policy and our diplomatic relations with other nations.

I appeal to all to joint in a constructive effort to uphold the hands of our President and our Secretary of State. I urge them to help us show the world that we can stand together in a democracy and that we can abandon politics in our foreign affairs. The challenge of world communism will be met by unity, not dissension; by statesmanship, not petty politics; by forthrightness and constructive action, not by confusion and misrepresentation.

Mr. Speaker, I believe too many of us have made a tragic mistake in not fighting aggressively in defense of our foreign policy and our Secretary of State. Any charges which are false, distorted, malicious and designed to mislead should be answered and the people informed of the actual state of affairs.

I wish to read an editorial on this point which appeared in the Louisville Courier-Journal of Friday, November 17, and to make it part of the RECORD. I commend it to all of my colleagues in the House as well as all our citizens throughout the Nation.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

DEAN ACHESON IS HIS PARTY'S GREAT ASSET—DEMOCRATS SHOULD UPHOLD TRUMAN'S FINEST APPOINTMENT AND REALIZE THE WORTH OF HIS SECRETARY OF STATE

"Before us lies the opportunity for action which can save the hope of peace, security, well-being, and justice for generations to come. Before us also lies the opportunity for drift, for irresolution, for effort feebly made. In this direction is disaster. The choice is ours. It will be made whether we act or whether we do not act."

These words, which were addressed to the United Nations General Assembly on September 20, apply with equal if not greater force to the Eighty-second Congress of the United States. They were spoken by the man for whom a minority of this Congress professes a loud and angry contempt, Secretary of State Dean Acheson.

Some of the crudest and most degrading issues of our preelection battle were fought around the personality and conduct of Mr. Acheson. The sources which carried this type of campaign to victory were not slow to claim that their election represented a decision by the people that "Acheson must go." With appalling irresponsibility they have laid the whole burden and blame of a world torn apart on the shoulders of one man.

No one man and no one nation can solve the problems of the world or stop in its tracks the terrible and simple impulse toward independence, human and national, that this complex century has set in motion. Politicians who bewail "the loss of China" or who demand that we, single-handed, "stem the tide in Asia" are men for the most part ignorant of the lessons of history and the clamorous power behind that Wilsonian phrase, "the self-determination of peoples."

It is perhaps Mr. Acheson's misfortune that in dealing with little men he has not often enough concerned himself with the limits of their mental horizons. For the first time in a decade this country is blessed with a Secretary of State who can see our times and our destiny with the perspective of history. Undoubtedly the Department of State has made mistakes in seeking the perilous path to peace. But at least its viewpoint has had breadth and depth, has encompassed something of the grandeur of the American destiny, has kept in mind the goodness and simplicity that mark the best and truest of our national hopes.

"We speak for people," Mr. Acheson told the General Assembly, "whose deep concern is whether the children are well or sick, whether there is enough food, whether the roof leaks, whether there will be peace • • • a moral peace, so that the spirit of man may be free, and the barriers between the hearts and minds of men may drop away and leave men free to unite in brotherhood."

Thus was the American vision nobly detailed for the world, by an American spokesman at a time when President Truman's political foes were yapping at the heels of their Communist bogies. And what did President Truman's political friends say of the man and his message? It would be pleasant to recall that at least one Democratic office-seeker campaigned on the theory that in Dean Acheson the Democratic Party had its noblest asset. To our knowledge, and we should be happy to stand corrected, not one campaigner spoke of Dean Acheson as the asset he is. Not one pointed out the solid achievements of our foreign policy in five terrible years. Not one defended the man and his works against a backwash of spite and untruth. Not one Democrat seems to have reminded us that China has never been ours, to lose or gain; that the Marshall plan, sparked by Dean Acheson and bearing the name of his friend, former chief and present colleague, is perhaps the greatest example of generous self-interest the world has ever seen; that the Atlantic Pact, the decision to aid Korea, the hopeful beginning toward help for Asian independence, are all the products of a State Department which can see the world in the round.

Not only did these wavering and apologetic Democrats who all but lost their congressional majority fail to boast of these things; those of them who did win through are now holding angry and anxious debates about whether Mr. Acheson must be sacrificed in the interests of harmony. The country and the Democratic Party are fortunate in the fact that the party head is both more courageous and more stubborn than his followers. It is time for Mr. Truman to ask his party, and those Republicans still screaming shrilly for Acheson's head, what sort of cringing eunuch would satisfy them as the voice of this country's foreign policy. Apparently he should be a man who never in his life has expressed an independent opinion and who never in his life expects to say more than a submissive "Yes, sir," to the watchdog of a congressional committee. Dean Acheson of course is not that man, and we cannot believe that the average American, who voted this year out of a sense of frustration and concern only dimly expressed, wants that kind of man. It is our hope that President Truman will stand firmly behind the best appointment he ever made and trust to time and the slow maturing of events to justify him in the eyes of the Nation and the world. Hard as his role will be for the next 2 years, it will be a tragedy of great magnitude if Dean Acheson is forced, or persuaded, or permitted, to retire.

What an Outfit To Run a War!

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDGAR A. JONAS

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 4, 1950

Mr. JONAS. Mr. Speaker, it is my considered judgment that grave and ominous problems are looming up on the far-eastern horizon. It would appear from the reports that are available that the situation has extended beyond that of a critical stage.

Judging the situation by the scores of letters that have recently reached my desk, there is every indication that the American people are beginning to rebel against our present diplomatic and United Nations policies that prevail in the war sector in Korea. Practically all of the letters from my constituents request that immediate action be taken to remove Secretary Acheson. The citizens who write to me appear not to be impressed with labeling the activities in the Far East as a "police action." Their comments are entirely to the contrary and indicate that they believe we are engaged in a fighting and not an imaginary war. Their letters further demonstrate that they do not propose to entrust to Secretary Acheson and his followers any longer the gigantic task of prosecuting the Korean war. Because of this public clamor it is evident to me that the people of America are beginning to manifest their convictions in no uncertain terms.

As a further illustration of the protests to the leadership to whose hands have been committed the task of mastering the war in Korea, I call attention to an editorial in the Chicago Daily Tribune under date of December 1, 1950, entitled "What an Outfit to Run a War!" Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include this editorial, which follows:

WHAT AN OUTFIT TO RUN A WAR!

The proceedings before the United Nations Security Council at Lake Success present the unwonted spectacle of the United States in all its majesty being run up the street by a single Chinese Communist. We are charged with "unlawful and criminal" aggression against Formosa, where we have a military mission of 44 officers and enlisted men. Gen. Wu Hsiu-chuan, who makes the charge, adds that it is inadmissible to argue the very real Chinese Communist aggression in Korea.

We aren't used to being run up the street by spokesmen for China, and we might make a better stand except that the job is entrusted to Warren R. Austin, a former Republican Senator from Vermont, who, with John Foster Dulles, a former Republican Senator from New York, has been enlisted as the mouthpiece of Mr. Truman's administration.

The accounts state that Austin read his piece in a voice so faltering that there was a question in the minds of the audience whether he'd be able to get through the script. Even in debate we have to depend upon a weak need, when the least we could expect is a strong, firm voice breathing conviction.

Austin is an outrider of the Truman official family, but he's typical of the collection of fumblers Mr. Truman has recruited to serve as his Cabinet and close advisers at a time when the Nation staggers in the grip of colossal forces.

There's General Marshall, the Secretary of Defense, a figure whose veracity was found wanting when he was asked to account for his strange behavior during the Pearl Harbor crisis. That was almost 9 years ago. Now Marshall's memory is deteriorating. He can't remember the names of the new collection of generals around the Pentagon. When he attempted to refer to the Korean war the other day he found himself discussing "the war in Puerto Rico."

We've got Charlie Brannan, the Secretary of Agriculture, a genius at storing eggs in caves, painting potatoes blue, and figuring how the farmer can sell dear while the consumer buys cheap. He'll handle the production of food if we get in a war.

We've got Maurice Tobin as Secretary of Labor, the fellow who'll be charged with mobilizing manpower. Just in case Tobin will be preoccupied with his usual duties of humoring the bosses of the CIO and A. F. of L. for political purposes, Marshall has enlisted another manpower expert, Anna Rosenberg. She's the one who proposed a reorientation course for the soldiers before letting them return to civilian society after the last war.

We've got Snyder, the fiscal expert, and Sawyer, in Commerce, who are dangerous not because they are vicious but because they aren't too bright. We've got Postmaster General Donaldson, fitted by his civilian experience to reduce mail deliveries to the boys in the foxholes to one mail call every 6 months. We've got Oscar Chapman in Interior, whose dream of converting central Arizona into a lake can now be pushed as "essential to the war effort." We've got Attorney General McGrath, who about a week ago finally got around to expressing a vague suspicion in a brief that Communists are agents of Soviet Russia. Sharp fellow, that.

Of course, we've got Acheson and we've got Truman, but description would be redundant. We've got Averill Harriman as second-string thinker for Truman, which conveys all anybody needs to know about Harriman. As Secretary of the Army, there's Frank Pace, who got so used to running deficits while presiding over the Budget Bureau, that running up a new war debt to dwarf the old will be duck soup. And in the Navy there's Francis Matthews, who didn't think the war was coming soon enough and urged the Nation to hasten it by launching a preventive attack.

Never in a period of crisis has the country been in the hands of such a crew of nonentities. If we can survive them, we can survive anything that the Kremlin can throw at us.

Isolationism, If—

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES B. HOEVEN
OF IOWA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, December 4, 1950

Mr. HOEVEN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I submit the following editorial which appeared in the Sioux City (Iowa) Journal on December 2, 1950:

ISOLATIONISM, IF—

The time has come, the Journal is convinced, for the United States of America to inform the governments of all the free nations of the world that it expects them to do their duty in resisting the aggressors if another major war results. This ought to be done promptly with nothing spared in the way of the strongest, severest, sternest language Washington can use. The Journal believes it not only is timely but that the circumstances in various foreign diplomatic and military fields wholly justify it. It also believes that in so informing the chanceleries of the world that we expect them to line up with us if we must fight it out with the Communist nations that we should provide a penalty that would be imposed upon them if they were laggard.

The Journal for many years has believed in internationalism. It long ago was convinced that it was our business what happened elsewhere in the world. It felt that, the world having grown smaller, so to speak, because of swift means of communication and transportation, certain natural barriers of protection we formerly enjoyed had disappeared. Neither the Atlantic Ocean nor the Pacific is a protection for us now. Nor is the North Pole region with its vast ice and snow wastes a barrier between us and air attack from a powerful enemy.

The United Nations idea was and still is one of the finest things for world order the mind of man has conceived. In unity there is strength, and it takes power today to preserve peace in the world. We went into that Organization in good faith. We have tried hard to contribute to its success as a world peace agency. We signed the Charter because we believed in it and put our hopes in this world organization. And if the free nations of the world today went along with us in peace or war, whichever it may be, we Americans still would make our contribution to mankind's betterment and progress. But let the free nations of the world keep this in mind: They must stand with us in all their strength of spirit and physical power, fighting beside us, sacrificing as we do, expending as we do, else they will suffer the penalty we most certainly should impose.

The penalty? That is easy. Simply tell every government that still is free that America is willing to do her best in their interest if they keep step with her. And then tell them that if they don't, if they try to wriggle out, if they shirk their plain duty, if they decide to let Uncle Sam do this job of fighting by himself, they will suffer the penalty of our withdrawing from the whole stinking mess and let them shift for themselves. Yes, by all means, let us return to isolationism if they fail to do their part and then build such defenses with our science and industrial power as will cause all the rest of the world to hesitate before attacking us. We're willing to do our share of the spending and the fighting; we're not willing to fight another world war alone.

Should We Drop the A-Bomb on China?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EUGENE D. O'SULLIVAN
OF NEBRASKA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, December 4, 1950

Mr. O'SULLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, we have heard much hullabaloo lately on the part of Monday morning drug store and coffee shop quarterbacks about using the A-bomb on the Chinese Reds.

A certain Nebraska newspaper which is easily the most reactionary publication west of the Chicago Tribune, in an added effort to harry President Harry, have been endeavoring to get a contribution from me for the military I presume, as to whether or not we should at this time make use of the A-bomb in China, all of which made me feel like the colored man in Texas who was asked by his rich, white employer if he could change a $20 bill for him and replied, "No, sir, Mister, but thanks for the compliment."

I have always observed that a public servant gets into trouble when he tries to do more than his job calls for, therefore, I for one shall let President Truman do the exclusive acting and talking on the matter of using the A-bomb on the Chinese Communists.

If I had the power to recommend, I would not recommend dropping an atomic bomb on the Chinese or any other Russian satellite, but would place it some more appropriate and vulnerable place on the theory that one cannot destroy a rat by blowing off his whiskers, or his ear or ears, or his tail or one or more of his feet.

Confidentially though, if the A-bomb is to be used I know some mouthy, witless, reactionary persons in and about the city of Washington, plus a few alleged commentators, doctors, and that certain old Omaha newspaper, who for the good of our country should be parachuted first into the area where the A-bomb is to be dropped so that they too could get the full benefit of the A-bomb for the aid and comfort which they have given, inadvertently perhaps, and are still giving communism by their senseless, unjust, and un-American action and criticism of our President, his aides, and the administration generally, which lie and smear techniques weaken our prestige abroad and spread confusion, discord, and fear at home and make them mentally hand and glove marchers with the Communists.

Because of the conduct of daft, evil, and witless persons who have cried out their scarewords, our whole Nation has been put in a state of unnecessary general alarm.

When I was back in Nebraska before the last election I was appalled to find out that in clubs, lodges, churches, convents, and places where good people are supposed to hold forth that these educated but misguided dupes thought that their worse enemies were the President of the United States and his Cabinet and the administration, bipartisan and otherwise. These people actually thought that their own country and its Government were their worse enemies.

It is startling how history repeats itself. Protégés of those who were given the choice between a savior and a rogue and took the rogue, were there ready to make the age-old mistake all over again. Instead of believing people of good will, they were prepared to believe reactionary rogues, aye thieves.

Now this same badger-faced ilk, in a great crisis like the present, want to impeach the President. It is lucky for them that Andrew Jackson and his Winchester rifle is not in the White House so that mountain justice could be meted out promptly to them.

How could these men lay any claim to patriotism and thus give aid and comfort to the Communist enemy?

What are these extreme right wingers thinking about to so cripple our Nation now?

I guess they just have muscles in their head instead of real patriotic American brains.

Appointment of Anna M. Rosenberg Should Be Rejected

REMARKS
HON. JOHN E. RANKIN
OF MISSISSIPPI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 1, 1950

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, by all means, the other body should refuse the confirmation of the appointment of Anna M. Rosenberg as Assistant Secretary of National Defense in charge of our manpower.

The American people are aroused and indignant that this exalted position, one of the most powerful in the world, should be turned over to a foreign-born individual whose record for association with Communist organizations shows that she is unfit to occupy a place of such responsibility. Besides, Mr. Speaker, we have plenty of Americans whose patriotism is unquestioned to fill these positions.

We shoud follow the advice of George Washington and put only Americans on guard.

This Anna M. Rosenberg is referred to four different times in the report of the Committee on Un-American Activities, known as appendix 9.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

That record shows that Anna Rosenberg was a member of the John Reed Clubs, and that she signed a protest against the alleged anti-Communist propaganda as did appear in the New York Times of May 9, 1930.

The record shows that—

The John Reed Clubs were Communist-front organizations named in honor of John Reed, one of the earliest Communist leaders in the United States. John Reed died in Russia shortly after the Bolshevik revolution and his ashes were interred in the Kremlin in Moscow.

The John Reed Clubs were out-and-out Communist organizations which preceded the contemporary Communist-front organizations which cater to so-called Liberals.

In the May 19, 1930, issue of the New York Times, the following person affiliated with the John Reed Clubs signed a protest against alleged anti-Communist propaganda—

This is followed by the list of signers, one of whom was Anna Rosenberg.

Witnesses now living, I understand, will testify that this is the same Anna Rosenberg who has been appointed to this important position with our Department of National Defense.

She also signed a petition for a consumers' national federation which Earl Browder, head of the Communist Party, when he was a witness before the Committee on Un-American Activities in 1939, identified as a transmission belt. A transmission belt, in Communist nomenclature, is an organization through which the Communist Party extends its influence and ideology to groups that are broader than the party itself.

She signed that petition "Anna M. Rosenberg."

I understand that certain Government files giving these facts on this Anna M. Rosenberg are available, and that there are living witnesses who can testify to her activities in connection with these Communist-front organizations.

Mr. Speaker, while our boys are dying by the thousands in foreign fields, I submit that it is no time to put any questionable character, especially a foreign-born character, in a position of this importance.

I hope the Members of the other body will refuse her confirmation.

American Federation of Labor Opposes Central Arizona Project

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLAIR ENGLE

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 4, 1950

Mr. ENGLE of California. Mr. Speaker, the American Federation of Labor has strongly opposed the proposed $708,000,000 Central Arizona project, now before the House Committee on Public Lands.

The great voice of the A. F. of L.'s 8,000,000 members was heard in denunciation of the Central Arizona project at their recent national convention, held in Houston, Tex.

On September 22, 1950, the delegates to the convention unanimously adopted Resolution No. 29, which not only condemns the fantastic project but instructs the officers of the A. F. of L. to oppose adoption of S. 75, the Central Arizona project legislation.

The complete resolution, as passed by the A .F. of L. convention, follows:

Resolution No. 29, Central Arizona Project

Whereas a bill which provides for the proposed Central Arizona project is now before Congress; and

Whereas the Central Arizona project, under the guise of reclamation is designed to provide irrigation at exorbitant cost for a relatively small acreage of land to grow common field crops; and

Whereas data supplied by Secretary of the Interior, Oscar L. Chapman, reveals that the Arizona project will cost American taxpayers $2,075,729,000 for interest alone; and

Whereas to supply irrigation through the Central Arizona project would require 1,500,000,000 kilowatt hours of hydroelectric power annually to lift irrigation water to a height of 1,000 feet and carry it over 300 miles in an expensive canal; and

Whereas construction cost for irrigation features alone is estimated to be over $1,800 an acre; and

Whereas the field crops anticipated through irrigation provided by the Central Arizona project are the same crops which are now in surplus and are being subsidized by the United States Government; and

Whereas the exorbitant cost of construction and operation of the Central Arizona project will not add to the national welfare, but will create additional taxes through an increase in surplus crops which must be subsidized by the United States Government: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the sixty-ninth convention of the American Federation of Labor convening on the 18th of September 1950, in Houston, Tex., instruct the officers to oppose the of the American Federation of Labor convenate an unjustifiable heavy tax burden for a project that will not enhance the Nation's economy.

Price Controls

OF

HON. JACOB K. JAVITS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 30, 1950

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, the report of the Bureau of Labor Statistics, released yesterday, shows that the Consumers Price Index has just reached a new all-time high of 174.8, an increase of six-tenths percent over September 15, and 2.7 percent over June 15. This figure breaks through the previous high of August and September 1948, which was 174.5. When the House passed the Defense Production Act earlier in the year, there was great ardor for price controls and the coalition of the minority and the majority insisted that the President must be given these powers. Many eloquent speeches were made about the spiraling cost of living and how dangerous it was to our strength in respect of remobilization—military, economic, and spiritual. This new high in the Consumers Price Index, the grave situation in Korea, and the heightened tension between the United States and the Soviet Union underlining the need for even greater efforts in respect of remobilization demand nothing less than utilization by the President of his powers to impose price controls on items basic to the cost of living.

Should the President desire wage stabilization to accompany price controls, then it must be recognized that an immediate wage freeze would also freeze into law fundamental inequities which exist for most clerical, office, and similar workers whose salaries have lagged behind the cost of living, and also for industrial workers in certain areas and industries. This should not stop the invoking of price-control powers, however; but the President should call a high-level collective-bargaining conference of the leading trade union organizations—CIO, A. F. of L., International Association of Machinists, railroad brotherhoods, and other independent unions—and the leading employer organizations, together with public representatives to agree upon a formula which will enable these wages and salaries which have lagged behind the cost of living to catch up conditioned upon the imposition of price controls on basic cost-of-living items. In this way, the objectives of stopping the inflationary spiral can be attained without the injustice of an across-the-board wage freeze. It is also important to note that rent control is an essential element in this program and hence I strongly favor the 90-day extension of Federal rent control.

Mr. Speaker, there is no time for government as usual any more than there is for business as usual. The same Congress which demanded the President be given these powers should now demand that they be exercised. The American people expect of us the same degree of activity and diligence in this crisis as they do of our troops in Korea.

Woman's Club of Hollywood Demands Removal of Dean Acheson as Secretary of State by President Truman

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GORDON L. McDONOUGH

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 4, 1950

Mr. McDONOUGH. Mr. Speaker, the removal of Secretary of State Dean Acheson from office immediately is the demand of the American people. It is the ultimatum of Americans everywhere who are today appalled at Acheson's gross stupidity in the handling of our foreign affairs, at his deliberate disregard of the obvious objectives of the world Communist movement instigated and directed from the Kremlin in Moscow, at his personal defense of suspected Communists or pro-Communists in the State Department.

No longer do the American people have any confidence in the leadership, patriotism, and loyalty of the State Department under Mr. Acheson. Unless Acheson is removed from office, that confidence will not be restored, and in the face of the present critical situation in Asia, we must have competent national leadership now under which the American people can unite and work for the preservation of our Nation and our ultimate victory.

The following resolution was recently adopted by the Woman's Club of Hollywood, and was sent to me by Mrs. C. Arthur Williams, president of the club, whose letter is also included. This resolution demanding the removal of Secretary of State Acheson is typical of the action being taken by many civic and patriotic organizations who believe his removal is necessary in the interest of our national defense and unity. I submit it for the attention of the Members of Congress.

WOMAN'S CLUB OF HOLLYWOOD,
Hollywood, Calif., November 30, 1950.
Congressman GORDON L. MCDONOUGH,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN MCDONOUGH: Enclosed is a copy of the resolution which was sent to President Harry S. Truman, in regard to the removal of Dean Acheson from the office of Secretary of State, and urging his prompt action.

The resolution was unanimously adopted by the board of directors of the Woman's Club of Hollywood and thereafter unanimously approved by the club membership at a regular meeting held on November 29, 1950.

Sincerely yours,
Mrs. C. ARTHUR WILLIAMS,
President, Woman's Club of Hollywood.

Whereas the philosophy of communism is now threatening the entire free world, and particularly we find that the United States is in serious and mortal danger through the gradual and steady growth of communism, directed from the Kremlin in Moscow; and

Whereas it appears that the congressional Committee on Un-American Activities has reported that there are approximately 20,000,000 Communists in the world today, or that about 1 in every 115 persons in the world is a Communist; and

Whereas according to the testimony of J. Eagar Hoover before the said committee: "In 1917, when the Communists overthrew the Russian Government, there was 1 Communist for every 2,277 persons in Russia, nevertheless there are in the United States today 1 Communist for every 1,814 persons in this country"; and

Whereas under the leadership and direction of the Secretary of State, Dean Acheson, our policy of foreign diplomacy has blundered and floundered not only in the Far East, the Pacific, and the Atlantic, but throughout the world; and

Whereas it is now readily apparent that the American people have lost confidence in the leadership, patriotism, and loyalty of the State Department under Mr. Acheson to such an extent that the State Department now holds a reputation of the lowest esteem; and

Whereas congressional investigations, coupled with public utterances on the part of Secretary of State Acheson, have demonstrated beyond the shadow of doubt that a system of slipshop methods, inexcusable laxity in the screening of State Department personnel, together with his public support of a convicted perjurer, Alger Hiss, has further lowered Mr. Acheson in the esteem of people, both at home and abroad; and

Whereas the Department of State under the direction of Mr. Acheson suppressed the General Wedemyer report, whose recommendations, had they been accepted and followed, could and would have pervented the Communists' conquest in China, and such oppression resulted in the abandonment and betrayal of China to communism; and

Whereas it is readily apparent that the State Department under his leadership has ceased to think American; and

Whereas Secretary of State Acheson's policy in the Far East and more particularly as respecting Korea could well have resulted in one of the greatest debacles in all American history: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That we, the Woman's Club of Hollywood, condemn the policy of the State Department under Mr. Acheson for its failure to deal adequately with the grim and bloody advance of communism throughout the world. This tragic failure, together with the presence in the Department of State itself of men and women well known to possess communistic leanings and perhaps even Communist Party membership, has seriously and dangerously undermined the confidence of the American people in the ability of the present administration to deal with the dangers that confront us. We consider Mr. Acheson's further incumbency a distinct and dangerous menace to the future happiness and welfare of this country.

We therefore demand that the President of the United States note without delay the clear lack of esteem and confidence of the people of the United States toward Secretary of State Acheson and that he promptly take the necessary steps to discharge Mr. Acheson from that responsible position.

We further demand that he take all necessary action to insure the prompt dismissal and removal from the Department of State of any and all disloyal officials or employees. It is our belief that unless such action is taken the wholehearted confidence of the American people and the faith of peoples abroad will not be restored; be it further Resolved by the Woman's Club of Hollywood, That should the President of the United States fail to promptly cause Mr. Acheson's removal as Secretary of State, then and in that event, we call upon the Congress of the United States to take such action as lies within its power to remove Secretary of State Dean Acheson from his high office.

National Council of the Republic of Poland

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, December 4, 1950

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include the following communication:

NATIONAL COUNCIL OF THE REPUBLIC OF POLAND,
London, November 22, 1950.
Hon. THOMAS J. LANE,
Representative from Massachusetts, United States Congress, United States of America.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN LANE: I wish to express to you on behalf of the National Council of the Republic of Poland in exile my profound gratitude for the fine speech which you delivered in the House of Representatives on September 1, 1950, on the eleventh anniversary of the invasion of Poland by her enemies, in which you stressed that as the result of the Soviet machinations "Poland exists as a state of the Soviet Union, governed by puppets who dance to the tune played by their Communist masters."

I am also sincerely appreciative that you saw fit to expose that true nature of the Communist pattern of aggression with its lies, duplicity, brutality, and utter disregard for law and international obligations. You have rightly said that the "Poles have the faith and the patience to outlast their conquerors."

Let me also share your view that the "Communists, like Hitler before them, cannot be trusted, for—as you rightly say—"they have made a science of treason." Your effort to unmask the Communist intrigues all over the world should be an eyeopener for all those who still believe that an "understanding" with Soviet Russia is either possible or desirable.

To conclude, I was much gratified to read in your speech that the "Poles have many friends in the United States, which is the last rallying point for the cause of liberty" and that "it is timely to face up to it and prepare to resist and push forward in every way against communism, which is sworn enemy of all that the American people cherish." This courageous warning will not, I hope, remain unheeded.

At the same time I wish to express my most sincere congratulations on your recent reelection for the fifth time to the Congress from the State of Massachusetts.

Yours very sincerely,
T. FILIPOWICZ,
Chairman, Formerly Ambassador of Poland in United States of America.

The Valley

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILL M. WHITTINGTON
OF MISSISSIPPI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, December 4, 1950

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the address as president which I delivered at the fifteenth annual convention of the Mississippi Valley Flood Control Association, New Orleans, La., Thursday, November 30, 1950, to wit:

THE VALLEY

The association is dedicated to the flood-control improvement of the lower Mississippi River and to the protection of the lower Mississippi Valley. We delight to speak of it as "The Valley." The waters from the Rockies and the Alleghenies as well as from the Great Lakes on the north, meet at Cairo and from Cairo to the Gulf of Mexico the Mississippi River traverses the alluvial basin, the product of its own torrential floods in ages past, and the valley of its own making, comprising 30,000 square miles, or about 19,000,000 acres of the most fertile land in the United States or in the world.

The Mississippi River and its tributaries drain an area of 1,240,000 square miles, extending from western New York to western and northern Montana, embracing 41 percent of the area of the United States, exclusive of Alaska, and including all or portions of 21 States of the Union and about 20,000 square miles in Canada, comprising parts of two provinces. It provides more drainage and contributes more to navigation than any other river in the United States. The Mississippi Valley is the second largest valley in the world, the Amazon Valley only being larger. It is larger in extent than the whole of Europe, exclusive of Russia, Norway, and Sweden. In its northern stretches the Mississippi River is picturesque and its waters are clear. In the lower stretches monumental levees have been constructed in the alluvial valley and the waters are muddy.

As one of the world's greatest rivers, the Mississippi is most interesting. None wields more influence upon the country through which it flows. It is the breadbasket and the storehouse of the Nation. As has been well said, "As a dwelling place for civilized man, it is by far the first upon the globe." Ole Man River starts to rolling at the Twin Cities, and it just keeps rolling along to the Gulf where it discharges 3 times as much water as the St. Lawrence, 25 times as much water as the Rhine, and 338 times as much water as the Thames. With the Missouri, it is the longest river in the world. In some places the Mississippi is the most crooked river in the world. In one section the distance as the crow flies is 675 miles, but as the river flows it is 1,300 miles.

The flood-control project of the Mississippi River and its tributaries is the most gigantic ever adopted by any nation. The improvement of the river and the protection of the valley were never more important than today. As the valley grows so will the Nation grow. Progress is rolling through the valley today as new industries are being established, and agricultural production is being increased. The opportunity with soil, oil, and rivers is unparalleled. The eyes of the Nation are turned toward the valley today. Progress rolls just as Ole Man River rolls in the Mississippi Valley.

IMPORTANCE

The rise and fall of civilizations through the centuries have been largely determined by the conservation and the utilization of the bounties of nature. The misuse of land is a warning that the resources of nature are not inexhaustible, and that once lost, it is difficult to replace.

The United States is determined in the programs for reforestation, soil conservation, flood control, and river and harbor improvements to profit by the experiences of other countries. An inescapable conclusion from the study of the past is that the problems of soil erosion and overpopulation go hand in hand.

There is today a connection between the peasant revolt in Italy and soil erosion, for the lands of Sicily are constantly eroded as overpopulation obtains. The Carthagenians used elephants when they invaded Sicily. The people of Sicily used a scorched-earth policy against the elephants of Hannibal. They burned the forests. For 2,000 years forests have been burned. The problem of erosion is tremendous. There is overpopulation in Sicily today.

STREAMS

Nothing in nature is more interesting to me than streams and lakes. They appeal to poets. They are the inspiration of artists. They are useful to the historian. They are the delight of sportsmen. They invite lovers. They are attractive to the writers of fiction as well as verse. They appeal to the engineer as he dreams of building and ministering unto man.

Above the streams and lakes are the sources of both; there are the brooks, there are the forests that have aptly been termed the cradles of rivers. Walking by the side of the still waters of lakes appeals to me, and nothing is more delightful than to roam through the green pastures of valleys. As I linger along streams, my thoughts as I have dreamed for years always turn to the improvement of rivers and to the protection of valleys. Nothing intrigues me more than the journey of the raindrop to the sea. Nothing appeals to me more than beautiful streams over the hills and far away.

PROGRESS

The flood-control works and the river and harbor improvements of the United States surpass those of this or any other country or any other age. No nation has ever made more or comparable progress in production and construction generally, and particularly in the construction of flood-control works than the United States.

CORPS OF ENGINEERS

The Corps of Engineers was organized by George Washington and it has functioned in river and harbor improvements authorized by Congress since 1824.

No agency of the Government has ever wrought better. George Washington was a great administrator. He provided for the construction of nonmilitary works by them. They are the servants of the Congress, the elected representatives of the people. No engineers are better trained. They are prepared to meet the challenges of peace as well as war, of emergency, and of disaster. They respond where there is an explosion such as occurred at Texas City some time ago. They are on the job when cities, States, and regions are snow-bound. They respond to rehabilitation from hurricanes and storms along the Gulf and the ocean where disaster strikes and where emergency calls. They serve the American people in rain, and in sunshine, in prosperity, and in adversity. They should be encouraged. The civil functions of the Corps of Engineers must be preserved and stengthened. They are the outstanding flood-control engineers of the world.

SOUND POLICY

The rivers of the country are the property of the people and they should be improved for the benefit of the people. The flood control is a national problem. The foundation of the policy is built upon the solid rock of a sound policy that benefits must, in all improvements, exceed the cost.

COOPERATION AND AUTHORITIES

The advocates of authorities or administrations in river valleys to supplant and replace the Corps of Engineers erroneously assert that there is no cooperation between the Corps of Engineers and other agencies of the Government. The argument is fallacious. The Corps of Engineers are cooperating with the Bureau of Reclamation in the Missouri Valley. They are cooperating with the Bureau of Reclamation in the Columbia Valley. In the flood of 1950 it was demonstrated beyond a doubt that there was cooperation between the Corps of Engineers and the Tennessee Valley Authority. The Government agencies, like individuals as they grow old, become more sensible. The Tennessee Valley Authority is primarily a power project. Flood-control is incidental. But in practically all the other valleys of the United States flood-control is fundamental. Congress has rejected Authorities for the Missouri Valley and for the Columbia Valley. When Government agencies fail to cooperate, the remedy is not to establish a new and untried agency but to provide that cooperation must obtain.

RIVER AND HARBOR ACT OF 1950 AND FLOOD CONTROL ACT OF 1950

I am glad to report that since the last annual meeting of this association, Congress has passed the River and Harbor Act of 1950 authorizing projects at an estimated cost of $204,253,150, and has passed the Flood Control Act of 1950 authorizing projects at the estimated cost of $1,250,000,000, with an additional $200,000,000 which is the same amount in the act to the Corps of Engineers to the Bureau of Reclamation in the Missouri Valley. Congress has thus passed the largest authorizations for rivers and harbors and for flood-control in the history of the Republic. Of primary importance to the association is the fact that in the Flood Control Act of 1950, authorizations for the lower Mississippi River and tributaries are increased by more than $200,000,000. The acts of 1950 are not only the largest but they are the most comprehensive and complete acts ever passed by the Congress.

The advocates of flood-control and rivers and harbors must not rest upon their laurels. I do not underestimate the cooperation and assistance of the Mississippi Valley Flood Control Association and of the other organizations along the Gulf, in the Mississippi Valley, along the Missouri Valley, along the Atlantic seaboard and along the Lakes as well as in the Pacific northwest and in the Pacific southwest, when I say that after all, the final responsibility for the passage of flood control legislation is with the Senators and Representatives. The association can assist but the real responsibility, I repeat for emphasis, is with the representatives of the people. The association can aid and assist. They can encourage and furnish facts, but the final credit, as well as the responsibility, for authorizations is with the Senators and Representatives. I emphasize, also, that members of this association and similar organizations in the United States should encourage Senators and Representatives to seek assignments on the Committees of Public Works in the Senate and in the House. I know of no greater opportunity for helpful and constructive service than familiarity with the problems of rivers and valleys and service on the appropriate committees of Congress.

APPROPRIATIONS

Authorizations are important, but appropriations are still more important.

For the current fiscal year of 1951, Congress appropriated the largest amounts for flood control generally, and for rivers and habors, ever appropiated. The total for general flood control is $323,408,250; for rivers and harbors $198,811,500. It is fair to say that for the lower Mississippi River and tributaries the amount is $66,422,400, whereas the amount for the fiscal year of 1950 was $67,000,000, but I repeat, the aggregate of rivers, harbors and flood control appropriations is the largest ever made.

THE KEY

I have spoken of cooperation between the engineers and other agencies of the Government. There has been no finer cooperation than that which has obtained for appropriations among the Senators and Representatives of the lower Mississippi Valley. Each State has two Senators. The basis of population determines the number of Representatives. The key to continued adequate appropriations for flood control and rivers and harbors is the enthusiastic and constructive advocacy of the elected representatives of the people of the lower valley. I sound the note that should mark the continued cooperation between the States composing this organization, for the Senators and Representatives of any one cannot obtain authorizations or appropriations for that State without the aid and assistance of the Senators and Representatives from the other States.

The executive officer of this association, like the executive officer of similar organizations, should keep in contact with the Senators and Representatives from the lower Mississippi Valley. He should be able to furnish them with information, and he should be qualified to aid and assist them in making contacts and in securing support for the improvements of the valley.

RIVERS AND HARBORS

There have been authorized some 1,300 river and harbor projects in the United States and Territories. They provide for 28,000 miles of improved waterways, 490 locks and dams, and 270 harbors. The vast inland-waterway, coastal and Great Lakes, networks are without a peer. An all-time record high total of 791,541,717 tons of water-borne traffic was reached in 1948, which is more than double the tonnage of 15 years ago. There are many more harbors to be constructed and waterways to be improved.

FLOOD CONTROL

Some 1,000 projects for flood control have been authorized; and as I recall at the close of the 1948 fiscal year 56 dam and reservoir projects and 170 local protection projects had been constructed. Many other projects have been and many more should be authorized for construction.

ENGINEERING AND RESEARCH

Engineering and research have made possible the improvement of our rivers, the spanning of our rivers, the reclamation of our deserts, the construction of transcontinental highways, the building of transcontinental railways, the harnessing of mighty waterfalls, and the bringing of pure water through mountains, under gorges, and across lands to supply the teeming millions of cities. With the advance in engineering discoveries, science, and invention, there is the opportunity for free America to extend and maintain the highest standard of living ever attained by man.

WAR OR PEACE

President Harry S. Truman stated, about the 1st of June, we were nearer to peace than we had been since the Japanese surrendered on August 14, 1945. The President had done his best to promote peace. Congress had appropriated since the cessation of hostilities, some $48,000,000,000, directly and indirectly, for defense and to promote peace.

When World War II ended, we had the best and the most airplanes in the world; we had the greatest fighting Army in all human history, with more guns and tanks; we had the greatest Navy. As a democracy, however, we ran true to form. The people demanded demobilization. Russia wrecked one peace conference after the other. The Chief of Staff announced, when the President said we were closer to peace than we had ever been, that we were prepared to whip the world. Secretary of Defense Louis Johnson reassured the American people when he said that we were unconquerable.

KOREAN INVASION

On the morning of June 25, 1950, like a stroke of lightning out of the clear sky, North Korea invaded South Korea. The President immediately announced that he had directed the defense of South Korea and the protection of Formosa. His announcement caught the ear and received the approval of the Nation. The future of the United Nations was at stake. The settlement of international disputes by peaceful methods or by force was the issue. The President not only caught the ear of the Nation and brought renewed hope to the free nations of the world, but his prompt and bold announcement that he had directed General Douglas MacArthur to defend South Korea was generally approved by the American people, The President, however, stated that this was a police action. I think the reaction and approval of the Nation were largely based upon the President's statement that this was a police action.

This is no time for criminations and recriminations. Mistakes have been made. We must profit by these mistakes. Those who were responsible must be held accountable. There is nothing for the people of the United States to do except support the prosecution of the Korean War. There was nothing else for the President to do except to aid Korea. We had tried appeasement at Munich. We tried it in Czechoslovakia. We tried it in the First World War.

RUSSIA

We now know that Russia was behind the Communists of North Korea. Arms and tanks and equipment had been furnished. Every day reveals the hand of Russia. By war in Korea, next by war in Iran or Yugoslavia, or some other satellite nation, Russia, without actually fighting but aiding, encouraging, and furnishing guns and cannon, hopes to cripple the United States so that in the event of world war III, the United States will be weak.

Communism is on the march. It must be stopped. The Kremlin recognizes no power save force. A strong America is essential to world peace.

The best aid America can render Europe or Asia is to show the benefits of freedom and demonstrate that the American way of life will promote the welfare of all people.

WARNING

I must utter a warning. We have aided Europe. We have aided China. The conflict between communism and democracy is a contest between ideals. It is a war for men's minds. Guns and cannon cannot destroy ideals. The military thinks of war. The Marshall plan was needed but the military alone cannot conquer communism. The Marshall plan alone cannot overcome communism. This must be supplemented by spiritual plans; the United States can reach the oppressed people of the earth better through spokesmen who understand the needs of humanity rather than by the military who know only how to kill.

No nation has the right to ask the United States for help unless that nation is willing to sacrifice to the limit. People who are not willing to fight are not entitled to our aid. Allies who can be bought with dollars will not fight for freedom.

We must meet force with force, but we are not a military nation. We must show the world that we are not such a nation. We must not saddle ourselves with debts that we cannot pay. Overexpansion, unbridled inflation would please Joe Stalin but it would impoverish us. If we tax our vitality now and prevent the use of our resources as they may be needed, America will be weak instead of strong.

We must help under the Atlantic Pact, but our former allies in Europe must understand that we cannot permanently underwrite their security. They must fight communism with their own money and with their own lives if they expect America to aid them.

While we must be prepared for war, there are other ways to overcome communism. The germs that bred communism must be eliminated. Poverty, inability to acquire a home, or to acquire land must be eliminated in all the world. We must be just. We must demonstrate that we are our brother's keeper. America must not only be prepared for war but the best way to prevent world war III is a strong and a sound America.

The strength of our country does not lie in any one weapon. The strength of America lies in the faith, spirit, the courage, and the intelligence of the people.

Arms alone and furnishing guns and tanks to other nations will not win their friendship. The contest between communism and democracy is for the control of the minds of men. We must demonstrate that the average man in the governments that we aid and assist has a better chance under a free government than under a totalitarian government. We cannot afford to continue the support of corrupt governments whether these governments are in Europe, in China, or in the Philippines.

WHY WE FIGHT

We know why we fight in Korea. Jefferson was right when he wrote: "The tree of liberty must be refreshed from time to time with the blood of patriots and tyrants." We fight to prevent world war III.

AMERICA MUST NOT FALL

One of the most significant stories that came out of the last World War was an incident that occurred in those heart-breaking days of June 1940, when the French troops were crushed and fleeing before the Germans. A young French officer pressing southward came to the cottage of an old peasant who had been his father's friend and comrade-in-arms years before. He paused for a few minutes from his headlong flight, and in conversation with this old friend of his father he said to him: "Tell me what has happened to my country that she now has been broken and conquered. You, with my father, fought for France in the days of her glory. What is the meaning of this, her downfall?" The old peasant promptly replied: "My young friend, I can tell you the secret of France's collapse. In the days of our generation, when your father and I fought in the legions of France, the dominant spirit and only question in the breasts of Frenchmen everywhere was, 'What can I do for France? What can I give to my country?' while in your generation you and your fellows have been thinking only in terms of 'What can I get out of France? What can France be made to do for me?' "

France collapsed long before her armies went to pieces. France collapsed from within when her sons began to think only in terms of what they could get from her.

May the fate of France never be the fate of America. Let us rededicate and reconsecrate ourselves today to the support of America. America must not fall or fail.

"Operation Rain Barrel"

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KARL STEFAN

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 4, 1950

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Speaker, by leave granted me, I include in my remarks the speech by Dr. Allen Burkhardt, superintendent of schools and president of the Junior College of Norfolk, Nebr.:

Mr. Chairman and friends, I have a newspaper clipping in my hand which has to do with Farmer and Mrs. Orr and their rain barrel. It seems as though Farmer Orr and his wife keep 250 chickens. Last May, Farmer Orr, who is past 70 years of age, decided to rig up an automatic waterer. He did this by taking an ordinary rain barrel; setting it up on some supports with one end resting on the stump of a tree. He ran a pipe from it down to a trough, and with a little gadget, he automatically controlled the flow of water so that the chickens would always have water to drink. He and Mrs. Orr filled the barrel with water from Piney Creek. He then took half of another rain barrel and put it over the top of the first barrel in order to keep the leaves and trash out.

That was last May. From that day to this, neither Farmer Orr nor Mrs. Orr nor anybody else has ever added a drop of water to that rain barrel. Strangely enough, the level of the water remains constant. There's no connection between the barrel and any source of water. The chickens drink 3 gallons of water every day without lowering the water level. The neighbors have heard about the never-emptying rain barrel and have stood watch 48 hours at a stretch. Twenty thousand people have come to see the never-emptying barrels that can give out 3 gallons of water a day and never change its water level.

Farmer Orr is sick now and has been in bed for a couple of months. When asked how he explains the strange phenomenon of the never-emptying rain barrel, he says, "I can't understand it." Mrs. Orr says that "It might be an act of God."

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

A bank down in Florida recently published an advertisement which told the following story: In the city of St. Augustine great flocks of sea gulls are starving amid plenty. The fishing is still good, but the gulls don't know how to fish. They don't know how to fish because for generations they have depended upon the shrimp fleet to toss them scraps from the nets. The fishermen for many years have thrown scraps of shrimp from the nets to these flocks of sea gulls. The sea gulls grew fat and comfortable. They didn't have to work for a living. Their children grew up amid ease and plenty and they grew fat and comfortable. They didn't have to work, either. The fourth or fifth generation of sea gulls have come along now. They were doing fine as long as the fishermen threw them scraps to eat. The unexpected happened, however, when the fishermen moved from St. Augustine to a neighboring town. The sea gulls remained. Now they are starving to death because their parents had never taught them how to work; neither had society. They starve amid plenty. The sea is full of fish, but they don't know how to get them. They are gullible gulls. They fell for "ham and eggs without work."

A few years back Ernest Hemingway published a book which he called For Whom the Bell Tolls. In that book are these words which were taken from an essay written 350 years ago by the poet, John Donne. These are the words: "No man is an iland, intire of it selfe; every man is a peece of the continent, a part of the maine; if a clod bee washed away by the sea, Europe is the lesse, as well as if a promontorie were, as well as if a mannor of thy friends or of thine owne were; any mans death diminishes me, because I am involved in mankinde; and therefore never send to know for whom the bell tolls; it tolls for thee."

About 250 B. C., a Roman general by the name of Quintus Fabius made a name for himself by defeating the Carthaginian general, Hannibal. Hannibal had a much superior force of men and equipment, but he was no match for Fabius because Fabius practiced what was then a rather new strategy. He avoided meeting Hannibal head-on. He knew that he would be defeated in direct combat, so he used tactics of striking one sector today, inflicting damage, retreating, striking again in a different place a few days later, retreating, never staying to fight long, but always accomplishing something, always harassing the enemy, demoralizing them, convincing them that he was much stronger than he really was. This Fabian approach, this Fabian method of fighting won Quintus Fabius the victory. George Washington is sometimes called the American Fabius because he, too, avoided direct conflict with the British and fought a sector at a time and then retreated, never was captured, never was engaged in a battle with the entire British force, and he won the American Revolution.

I would like to have you remember these little illustrations or incidents and would like to have you fit them with what I have to say in the balance of this talk.

I have been reading history lately and I have found some interesting facts. I have found that revolutions in various countries of the world have occurred almost uniformly when certain conditions were found. Certain circumstances had to prevail in a country, it seemed, before a revolution could take place. In reading about various important revolutionary movements, I find that in order for a revolutionary attempt to be assured of success, there must be rather widespread discontent in the country involved. The people must be angry or discontented about something important. Then the Revolutionaries have a chance to put across their ideas.

I find that one of the chief causes of discontent and one of the common elements that was present in these various countries before revolution took place was that the monetary system was greatly disrupted and disturbed. Wild inflation, it seems, has been present in most countries where serious revolution has occurred. For instance, just prior to the French Revolution, which took place about the time of the American Revolution, the French monetary system was destroyed through wild inflation. In Germany, wild inflation preceded the Hitlerian revolt. Hitler rose to power in a country which had no monetary system worthy of the name; when a piece of paper could have printed upon it the words "one million marks" and yet would not buy a postage stamp. The Reds in China secured a foothold at a time when prices had gone out of bounds, when there was wild or run-away inflation throughout China. People were discontented; business was confused. Italy was a fit subject for Mussolini because of disturbed economic conditions and because of wild inflation. The first aim of the Bolsheviks just prior to their taking over the Russian Government was to inflate away the currency. Lenin one time remarked that "the best way to conquer the United States is to let them spend themselves to destruction and to cause inflation and a disturbed and chaotic economic condition."

We have the makings in America today of wild or run-away inflation. We have a national debt that is almost beyond our ability to comprehend. We have wild spending in Government circles. We have rain-barrel financing. Those controlling Government spending appear to either have the confused outlook of Farmer Orr or the blind faith of Mrs. Orr because they spend more than they receive.

I find another thing to be true as I read history, and that is that almost always violent or physical revolutions occur only after an ideological revolution has taken place. Revolutions are born in the minds of men. They are fostered in the printed word. I should like to point out today that we in America have been undergoing an ideological revolution for nearly 20 years; that certain socialistic forces have been at work in America for nearly 20 years, and an ideological war relating to social problems and economic problems and governmental affairs has been taking place. I should like to point out, too, that Socialists in America and in Great Britain have been using the Fabian approach. They have even avoided the use of the word "socialism." They have called themselves by other names. They have hidden behind the term "liberal," behind labor, behind the welfare state, behind the fair deal. They have used every word except the true one—"socialism."

Great Britain today is one of the most socialistic countries in the world. United States is not far behind. There are those who think the United States has caught up with Great Britain. Now about 65 years ago the Fabian Society was formed in Great Britain. The Fabian Society was devoted to the idea of spreading the teachings of Karl Marx by using the tactics of Quintus Fabius; by gaining ground a little at a time, and they have done just that thing.

Great Britain has been a very powerful country throughout the centuries. No enemy has been able to cross the English Channel successfully. Hitler was not able to do it, neither was Napoleon. But a soft-spoken man by the name of Marx has crossed it, not only has he crossed it, but he has conquered England. About 100 years ago Karl Marx and Friedrich Engels wrote the Communist Manifesto and much other socialistic material. A few enthusiastic followers began to preach his gospel. The Fabian Socialists have worked hard at preaching the gospel of socialism and they have derided capitalism. They have been so successful that we have a whole nation of people so accustomed to socialism that it is an accepted thing.

Sir Stafford Cripps was the leader, the intellectual leader, of the Labor Party until his resignation a few weeks ago. Sir Stafford Cripps was Chancellor of the Exchequer, a very popular and powerful man in Great Britain. Every time he would get up to present his budget message, the members of the Parliament would cheer, that is, those on his side of the aslie would cheer. A year ago last spring, however, something strange happened. He stood up to present his budgetary message, and as he told of the accomplishments of the Labor Party, cheers came from his side of the House. Suddenly, however, the cheers died down on that side and frowns came across the faces of his followers. Almost simultaneously cheers began to come from the Conservative side of the House and here is why this strange thing took place.

Sir Stafford Cripps had come to that point in his budgetary message, after talking about the necessary expenditures in order to carry on the welfare state, where he said, "And now I must report that the time has finally arrived when we must pay for these benefits ourselves. We can no longer soak the rich because the rich are no longer with us. They have been taxed out of existence." That was not popular talk. It precipitated a crisis within his party and within the nation and Sir Stafford resigned the other day. The papers said he resigned because of ill health.

We have no Fabian Society in the United States, as such, but we certainly have been using the tactics of the Fabian Society in attempting to indoctrinate the citizenry of America relative to socialism. I should like to point out that in America today we have a whole generation, as a matter of fact, more than one generation of young people who have never known anything except a philosophy of spending, of deficit financing, of rain-barrel operation, and of security. We have been trying to make a bunch of "gullible gulls" of our people for nearly two decades by preaching to them and by trying to convince them both by example and precept that security is more important than individual enterprise. That it is more important to have ham and eggs at 65, regardless of how you get them, whether you earn them or not, than it is to work hard while you are young. We have been trying to deprive them of the pleasure of work throughout all of these years. We have been trying to convince them that work is not an important element in success. We have done that by not practicing any thrift ourselves. We have done that by permitting our Government to spend and to spend and to spend regardless of the amount of money that comes in. We have countenanced deficit financing in America, rain-barrel financing.

We have deprived our young people of a certain amount of happiness which is their just due. It seems to me as though happiness can only be had when we do things for other people and when we accomplish things for ourselves and others. It appears to me that everybody in order to be happy must feel significant or important. Nobody can feel significant or important if he is told from youth on that he must depend upon a benevolent and a charitable government to take care of him in his old age; when he is taught that retirement is the thing to look forward to rather than accomplishment.

Young people used to come to my office asking me about the advantages of certain occupations and professions. They wanted to know about the work; they wanted to know about what they could expect in the way of promotion and salary and what the future held for them. Today they come to my office and ask some of the same questions, but almost invariably before they leave, and sometimes very early in the conference, they say, "What is the retirement system?" If there isn't a very good retirement system and if it doesn't come at a very young age, many of them lose interest. These young people should be indoctrinated with the idea that real security can come to a person only when that person possesses confidence in himself; only when he feels self-reliant to the extent that he feels certain he can provide for his own retirement and that of his family. He should know that the dole is not security, but rather the most demoralizing type of insecurity.

I wonder when, in America, we've gotten to the point where we think we can retire all the workers at the age of 50 and still have a productive country. I wonder when, in America, it has become necessary to apologize for the capitalistic system. I wonder why we have to apologize or why we have to shun the use of the word "capitalism," when the capitalistic type of economy in America is one of the things that has made America great; it is one of the things that has helped make America productive. We are the strongest and most productive nation in the world, and we have operated consistently under the capitalistic system, yet we go around afraid to use the word "capitalism." We seem to be afraid to preach to our young people that capitalism is a good thing. We are even afraid to preach to each other that capitalism is a good thing.

Maybe we don't really believe that capitalism is good in America. Maybe we staunch rugged individualists in Nebraska don't really believe what we say. Maybe we are in favor of socialism. Maybe we want socialized medicine. Maybe we want deficit financing. Maybe we want continued subsidies. Maybe our Nebraska farmers want to get themselves in the same shape the British farmer is in today. Ninety-nine percent of the farmers in Great Britain, according to authorities, now operate under the Government-subsidy program. They don't have to operate under that program, it is an optional proposition, but they can't make a living in Great Britain operating a farm unless they do operate under the government plan. And it's gone so far today in Great Britain that if you operate under the Government plan and you don't farm the way the Government thinks you ought to farm, or the way the politicians think, they can walk into your house, sell your land, and put you off the farm. They'll sell your farm at a price determined by themselves and turn the farm over to somebody else to run.

The same thing is true in some other countries in the world today. The politicians can do those things. You say, "No, not the politicians, the government." Well, the politicians are the ones that do it because the politicians are the government. Who operates the Government in America if not a group of politicians? They have to be politicians in order to get into office. They have to be politicians to stay in office. They can be either good or bad politicians, but the point remains that politicians run the Government.

Maybe we in Nebraska want that because we haven't done much to prevent it. You see, in Nebraska we think we should stop spending money, we think we should do away with deficit financing. That is, we think we should except where Nebraska is affected. It's all right to cut out a canal in the State of Maine or Florida or cut out a project in New Mexico or California, but don't go touching any projects in Nebraska. Don't take away any money from our airport, don't close the Kearney base, or the Hastings depot; if you do we'll send delegations of people, even rugged individualists, to Washington to plead for the reopening of these projects. There seems to be a question as to how much we really believe in what we say. Maybe we have become gullible gulls.

"Never send to know for whom the bell tolls, it tolls for thee." Are the bells tolling for us in America today? Are we aware of the fact that we are no longer walking down the road to socialism, but that we are walking down the road of socialism? Are we aware that we are being conquerred by Socialists who are employing and who have been employing for many years the Fabian approach? Knowing these things, do we care? Are we willing to sacrifice our boys and men in Korea in an attempt to stop the spread of communism in the world and then sit supinely by and see the first cousin of the Communist conquer here at home?

I sincerely hope that we citizens of America are smart enough to see what is happening to us and then having seen that, we will gird ourselves for battle. I hope we become so imbued with love for our form of government and our way of life that we will go forth throughout the land preaching the benefits of democracy. Preaching, too, if you please, the benefits of the capitalistic type of society. We must work carefully and assiduously in an attempt to bring the light to people of all ages—even using the Fabian approach—to the end, that our people will some day again be free and truly secure.

Then perhaps the day will come when a tired and weary, but happy mankind will gather in green pastures, even beside still waters for rest and nourishment. There they shall hear, not the tolling, but rather the chiming of the bells. They shall then ask not for whom the bell tolls, but rather—for whom does a new day dawn? Then shall they hear the answer come back to them clear and strong—"A new day dawns for thee—a new day dawns for all."

A Judge Favors Revolutions

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RALPH HARVEY
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 4, 1950

Mr. HARVEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Shelbyville (Ind.) News of November 25, 1950:

A JUDGE FAVORS REVOLUTIONS

"There are revolutions in the world which need management and direction. Revolution is the great heritage of American life."

The above quotation comes from a recent address by Justice William O. Douglas, of the United States Supreme Court. The Justice pointed out that millions of the peoples of the earth are trying to do today for themselves and children what our forefathers did for us in 1776. "It will be shameful if, when the history of the period is written, America is credited with suppressing these struggles, with alining itself on the world scene with reaction, tyranny, and oppression."

We are not sure that we can identify the "millions" of peoples in the world trying to do what this country accomplished in 1776. If the Justice refers to efforts of people in various parts of the world to overthrow their present governments, he seems to suggest that the United States should cooperate with the revolutionists.

We are not quite sure we understand just where there is danger of this country's "alining itself" with reaction, tyranny, and oppression. The Justice suggests that the natives of eastern countries think of freedom in terms of ridding themselves of slavery and includes land reform in areas where the land is largely held by a few. Admitting that in these areas there is no such thing as a free election, the jurist said that the people do not need money so much as ideas and backing reforms. He winds up his address by suggesting that "America should get behind a program of social reforms."

This is, of course, a considerable order of business. It certainly applies to the situation in China, in India, and probably applies to Spain, Italy, and the eastern countries of Europe. Just how the United States can carry out the recommendations of the jurist is something of a puzzle because it is perfectly obvious that this country cannot guarantee or obtain "freedom, peace, stability, and security" for the entire world.

No Communist Is Trustworthy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GORDON L. McDONOUGH
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 4, 1950

Mr. McDONOUGH. Mr. Speaker, communism cannot be trusted whether it be Communist aggression from the Kremlin or Communist promises from an independent Communist government.

Some of our administration leaders attempt to draw a line of distinction between communism as practiced in Yugoslavia under Tito and communism as it is practiced by Soviet Russia. The entire theory of communism is based on the belief that free enterprise must be destroyed, and the government must assume ownership of all property, and that only when all nations in the world agree to government by communistic methods will the Communist aim be achieved.

Aid to Tito in Yugoslavia is aid to communism. It must be recognized as such by the Congress when a request is submitted for further aid to Tito.

No Communist is truthworthy, and the Congress should give careful consideration to any request for aid to Communist Tito. The following article from a recent issue of Pathfinder, by Felix Morley, reviews the Yugoslavian situation and is worthy of your attention:

NO COMMUNIST IS TRUSTWORTHY

(By Felix Morley)

In his speech at San Francisco, returning from the conference with General MacArthur on Wake Island, President Truman drew a fine distinction between communism as an economic doctrine and communism as a political arm of Russian imperialism.

Close readers of the speech noted that Mr. Truman nowhere criticized communism as such, although he sharply denounced the international Communist movement, Communist aggression and Communist imperialism.

This attempt to separate the economic and political aspects of communism has the greater significance because it is also found in the booklet Our Foreign Policy, published by the Department of State and widely circulated before the November 7 election.

In this official publication it is suggested that socialism as an economic doctrine does not necessarily destroy individual freedom. The booklet says: "The deepening division between the Soviet-dominated bloc and the free world is not * * * a conflict between capitalism and communism."

Here the State Department disagrees with Lenin, the great hero of Soviet Russia, who told his people 30 years ago that: "As long as capitalism and socialism remain we cannot live in peace. In the end one or the other will trumph; a funeral requiem will be sung either over the Soviet Republic or over world capitalism."

It is the hope of the Department of State that a wedge can be driven between "national" and "international" communism. That hope is the basis of our friendly policy toward Marshal Tito in Yugoslavia. That hope explains Secretary Acheson's apparent belief that we can recognize Red China and permit its entry into the UN.

An argument heard frequently in Washington is that the Chinese Communist leaders are not really convinced Marxists. Mao Tse-tung, the argument runs, could be developed into a Chinese Tito.

Because that argument is so prevalent, the viewpoint of Constantin Fotitch, the former Yugoslav Ambassador to the United States, acquires particular importance. Fotitch says that communism itself is the enemy, and that those who try to distinguish between Tito communism and Kremlin communism are fooling themselves.

Fotitch is perhaps prejudiced, for he opposed the Tito regime with all his great ability, and would be clapped in jail if he returned to Yugoslavia. But he knows that country, and it would be wise not to discount his conviction that Tito would never be a reliable ally against Soviet Russia.

Yugoslav is now trying to secure upward of $500,000,000 from this country, to meet a food crisis for which the Tito regime blames a drought. Fotitch tells me that the real cause is Communist policies, which have been so confiscatory that many farmers have ceased tilling the soil.

If the former Ambassador is right, or even half right, it could be a stupid and costly error to pour money into Tito's country on the assumption that this is containing communism.

The entire theory of communism is based on the belief that free enterprise itself is evil, that governments everywhere should be taken over by those who aim to destroy private property; that when this is done all Socialist governments will live in peace.

As long as Tito and Mao Tse-tung call themselves Communists their actual or potential deviation from Moscow will be of secondary importance. We deceive ourselves if we think Yugoslav, Chinese, or American Communists are trustworthy because they sometimes criticize Moscow.

The Korean War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT F. RICH
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, December 4, 1950

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include the following editorials from the Washington Times-Herald of December 4, 1950:

TRUMAN SHOULD GET OUT

General MacArthur says that we are in an undeclared war with China. Mr. Truman brought this about in the name of 151,000,000 Americans when he bought himself a war in Korea by executive fiat, in disregard of the Constitution. Now we find ourselves booby-trapped by the hordes of Communist China.

If this can be described as policy, it was policy working under a blindfold. The country is committed to a wholly useless war from which it can gain nothing. The special sin of Truman is that whatever we now do is bound to be wrong. We can't beat the Chinese with what we have. No American can acquiesce in the abandonment of 175,000 of the Nation's boys who are Truman's hostages to fate. And what about the wounded and prisoners left behind?

Very little could improve this terrible predicament but there would be some consolation and some reason for hope if the country could be relieved of the author of its misfortunes. No man has ever done as much wrong to his country as Truman—not Buchanan, who was passive in the face of impending dissolution of the Union, not Wilson, who embarked upon the fatal course of global war, not even Franklin Roosevelt, who represented the all-time low up to now.

Truman doesn't know where he's been or where he is heading. If he expects to find out through consultation with Prime Minister Attlee, he is laboring under another delusion. Nothing productive can be expected from this tête-à-tête of third-raters.

Truman should resign. Under the law of Presidential succession, we will be stuck with old Alben Barkley, the ancient Romeo and baby kisser, but, though he is no genius, the country could stomach him more easily than the dishonest nincompoop in the White House, who long ago lost his rudder.

WHAT DID YOU EXPECT?

The British are knocking themselves out trying to avoid getting entangled in a major war with China or the Communists world empire. We can't blame them too severly. Mr. Truman and Mr. Acheson have got us into this jam, and the British, having seen the appalling result, are saying, "Thanks, no. We have a previous engagement."

This attitude, however, puts a considerable strain on the fiction that the dirty work in Asia is a United Nations war and that "collective security" is in process of being attained.

IT'S ONLY PRETENSE

When Sir Gladwyn Jebb was called upon for a few well-chosen remarks before the UN Security Council, he studiously refrained from any mention of aggression by the Chinese Communists, contenting himself with a routine denunciation of North Korean aggression. This showed a high talent for disregarding the obvious staring one in the face.

Yet it has been a consistent pretense that anything that the United States did Korea involved 52 other nations equally, as this was a United Nations war approved by that many non-Communist states, and our forces were there merely as UN agents. When it comes to laying it on the line, however, everybody else takes a walk.

There is no reason why this should come as any surprise, for Britain has made it abundantly clear that it will honor international commitments only as long as they are in the British national interest. Everybody had proof of that last June, when the executive committee of the ruling Labor Party turned thumbs down on the Schuman plan for pooling western European iron and steel resources.

The party pronouncement rejected any merging of Britain's politics or economics with other countries.

A UN WAR, BUT WHO FIGHTS?

If there were any surviving doubts about Britain's position, they were set to rest in the proceedings of the council of Europe's consultative assembly in Paris just before the Chinese Communists launched their Korean offensive. The idea of a European federation with supra-national authority was abandoned there in deference to the clearly expressed refusal of England to have any part of such an arrangement.

There is not the slightest reason to believe that Britain would make an exception of the United Nations and depart from its established policy of holding aloof from supra-national authorities denying England the power of independent decision in its own interest.

Last May, at Madison, Wis., Mr. Truman said that the sole course before the United States was to "move forward * * * in cooperation with other free countries * * *."

"Isolationism," he said, "is no alternative. Isolationism is only a counsel of despair. Isolationism would bring on another war, and it would be a war in which we might stand alone against the rest of the world."

We have the war, and for all practical purposes we are standing alone, and isolationism certainly did not bring it on. Internationalism brought it on, but the other countries that have wished the doctrine on us are not sharing the results and responsibilities.

Scroll for Courage Heartening Example

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHET HOLIFIELD
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, December 4, 1950

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent, I include in the Appendix of the RECORD a newspaper editorial which appeared on November 14, 1950, in the Los Angeles Daily News:

SCROLL FOR COURAGE HEARTENING EXAMPLE

A few evenings ago approximately 700 citizens, representing almost every racial and religious group in the community and a considerable variance in political thinking, met at dinner to honor Councilman Edward R. Roybal.

These citizens signed a scroll conveying their compliments to the councilman and listened to talks by a half dozen or so prominent citizens. The quality in Roybal which brought him that testimonial was his courage. Intellectual courage and honesty are virtually synonymous, and Roybal certainly has displayed them.

Although it was Roybal's refusal to vote for an ordinance requiring Communists to register that precipitated the action, it was not that alone that brought him praise. Certainly those who organized and spoke at the dinner are not Communists nor sympathetic with them. Neither is Roybal. In fact he despises communism.

It was the way the councilman conducted himself—what he gave as his reasons for opposing the ordinance that brought such spontaneous acclaim from the community. Here, said the people who honored him, is a man who has convictions and is not afraid to express them in public and against great opposition and at great risk to his political future.

Roybal is a devoutly religious man and he believes that it is an important part of his Christianity to fight for the rights of the people. This, of course, is not a belief confined to the Christian religion or any other. Judge Isaac Pacht, who spoke at the dinner on behalf of some 300,000 Jews in this community, expressed a similar sentiment.

Rt. Rev. Thomas J. O'Dwyer a noted Catholic clergyman, was among the speakers.

What the meeting pointed up to many of those who attended it was that here is the answer to the technique of the Senator McCarthys. It is so easy to blame somebody. When the hue and cry start any hoodlum can join in the outcry and hound the accused. It requires neither courage nor intelligence to call names.

It has been amply demonstrated that the antidote for name calling is not more name calling. That puts accusers and attacked on the same level. The answer to name calling is for people to arise and pay homage and tribute to good public officials who show bravery before they can be attacked by the smear artists.

There is no question but that Councilman Roybal would have come in for criticism by some who are chauvinistic, or worse, in their attitude. He may yet suffer. But he is less likely to suffer because the individuals who delight to smear are usually a little on the timid side if they do not feel they have public opinion with them and they are even more timid where they are sure it is against them.

Consequently the moral importance of honoring a courageous councilman was not just that it bolstered one honest public official in his forthright attitude which is good, but that it sets a precedent which it would pay us to follow in America.

Besides, those who blame are obligated also to praise when praise is due.

Sometimes we think Americans need a refresher course in the fine art of honorable mention.—L. E. C.

The Election Didn't Kill Socialism in America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RALPH HARVEY
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, December 4, 1950

Mr. HARVEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Greenfield (Ind.) Daily Reporter of November 24, 1950:

THE ELECTION DIDN'T KILL SOCIALISM IN AMERICA

As time passes since the November elections, many people are striving to inventory and assess what the results of that voting mean as a reflection of the thinking of a majority of the people and any changes thereof which may have occurred.

Naturally, many of these conclusions are far-fetched as more time and subsequent expressions of public will are likely to prove.

It is our feeling that the result expressed public anxiety and discontent, as well as uncertainty with the future, rather than any considerable swing to conservatism after a record-breaking period in which majority public sentiment has been even more liberal in its trend to the left.

We think, also, that many of the substantial exponents of "things as they are," and opponents of some of the fairly radical proposals of the present national administration, became desperate in their opposition, convinced somehow that the 1950 elections might be their last chance in self defense. Therefore, they busied themselves, shook off the carping, pointless apathy which has marked their political activities for more than a decade, exerted their influence in an organized manner, recruited a heavy vote from their side of the argument and enjoyed a measure of success.

If this be true, if the medical profession, the conservative farmers, the various types of religious leaders who had become concerned with the materialistic trend, and the regular loyal opposition really beshook themselves into vigorous action, the surprising thing to us is that the results were not more startling than they were.

True, the total popular vote assessed something like 52 percent Republican and 48 percent Democratic, which could be interpreted as a majority in protest against things as they are. But, because of the quirks of distribution, the objectors failed to capture a majority of either national legislative body; and in the House, which is the best direct reflection of the public will, still are considerably in the minority.

Just the same, we can already detect the beginnings of complacency among the elements which so tardily reactivated themselves politically; a sort of we-killed-the-bear attitude, as if their battle was won and over, once and for all.

That is emphatically not the case. The fight against "big government" against increasing paternalism, against the gradual domination of the individual and domination of local governments, municipal, county, and State by an all-powerful centralized power has just begun.

If some of the results of the last election can be interpreted as an awakening of the people generally to the situation, and we are not at all sure that it can, then, at best, this is victory only in a skirmish.

State medicine, the so-called Brannan plan or any kindred agricultural scheme, rabid internationalism with its tremendous cost and continuous embroilment in war, the general principle of subsidy and its companion, Federal control of production and individual initiative, Federal domination of schools, of welfare and charity, and the ever, ever increasing costs, bureaucracy, inefficiency, waste, the bribing of great sections of the electorate with funds directly from the public treasury, and the ever-mounting taxes, taxes, taxes; these things are not dead. Nor are they even permanently defeated.

These matters have been dignified by being publicly discussed as feasible. They have been made issues in an election. Therefore, the process of rationalizing them in the public mind has begun. We are being conditioned to ultimate acceptance. The advocates of such are too deeply entrenched in positions of influence to give up now. There are still too many Americans who are gullible, who think there is a pot of gold at the end of every rainbow; who have been taught that Uncle Sam knows best; who have fallen for the sophistry of "you take the handout, let them pay for it" and still don't realize that "them" is really "us;" who fail to realize the long-term dangers which lie in unthinking docility.

If you mean it then, the battle has just begun. Perpetual vigilance is the price of continued freedom.

Veterans' Housing

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHET HOLIFIELD
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, December 4, 1950

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent, I include in the Appendix of the RECORD a resolution approved by the national legislative committee of the Veterans of Foreign Wars. This resolution was passed on November 18, 1950:

STATEMENT OF THE NATIONAL LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE, VETERANS OF FOREIGN WARS OF THE UNITED STATES, IN REGARD TO VETERANS' HOUSING

NOVEMBER 18, 1950.

The national legislative committee, Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, views with grave concern the action of the executive branch of October 12, 1950, in applying strict credit controls curbs on the veterans' home loan program.

Due to the necessity for diverting essential materials to an expanded defense effort, and to hold the line against inflationary pressure stimulated by increased defense spending, it was necessary, the committee concedes, to apply certain controls on housing credit. However, the executive branch disregarded certain principles in applying these credit controls and toward this the Veterans of Foreign Wars must take strong exception.

First, the preferences accorded veterans under existing law were given only token consideration, notwithstanding the specific language of the Defense Production Act that such veterans preferences be preserved. In the opinion of the committee the veteran whose annual earnings are in the $2,500 to $4,000 range is for all practical purposes excluded from the housing market. Here, where the housing need was the greatest, was permitted to fall the greater burden of the credit-control program. This, in the opinion of the committee, constitutes a tragic blunder.

Secondly, if 850,000 housing starts is the target for 1951, and the committee believes that the home credit controls will result in little more than half that number, then the great majority of such homes should be channeled into the low and middle price ranges with the veterans obtaining preference in the acquisition of this housing. To provide otherwise constitutes a breach of faith of the men who fought World War II while a grateful Congress in 1944 fashioned the veteran home loan program of the GI bill of rights.

It is also unfortunate that at this time, when many World War II veterans are facing recall to active service and perhaps combat duty against Communist aggressors, that these same veterans must witness or even experience a denial of a veterans' benefit.

The executive branch also erred in not attempting to accomplish the objectives of the Defense Production Act by first curtailing nonessential commercial construction and high- and luxury-priced homes. Instead, the burden was permitted to fall principally on the low and middle income group in which group the veterans of World War II largely fall. This disregard of a veterans benefit by the executive branch must be rectified without delay.

The national legislative committee therefore calls upon the President of the United States to issue instructions immediately to the Administrator of Veterans Affairs to amend the October 12 home credit regulations so that a veteran may obtain a home costing $10,000 or less without the necessity of making a down payment.

Approved by the national legislative committee, November 18, 1950.

Polish United Societies of Chelsea

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, December 4, 1950

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include a copy of my address at the annual Pulaski Day parade and commemoration exercises at the Pulaski monument, Chelsea, Mass., on Sunday, October 15, 1950:

Men are fighting and dying at this very hour.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

Four thousand young Americans, so young that they still seem like children to the parents who brought them into this world just 18, 20, or 22 years ago, have paid the highest price for the manhood that came to them so suddenly and so far from home.

They sleep in eternal rest, and each day more comrades join them in the bivouac of the dead.

The people of Chelsea know, for some of your sons are numbered among the dead, the wounded, and the missing, in the fight for freedom that the United States, in the name of the United Nations, is winning in Korea.

They did not put aside the happy and productive work of peacetime and take up arms to defend their homes, their cities, or their Nation.

Why did they have to travel half way around the earth to defend a people they scarcely knew?

Casimir Pulaski, one of the great men of history, knew the answer to that a long time ago.

One hundred and seventy-one years have passed since the Polish nobleman made a far more difficult journey to help Americans win their independence. This week we commemorate his great vision, his military genius, and the supreme sacrifice which he made on the altar of our freedom.

Pulaski knew that the God-given right to liberty can never be divided by the barriers of geography, language, or creed. It belongs to all men of good will, whatever their origin.

It was a long way, measured in months of travel from Warsaw, Poland, to Savannah, Ga., in 1779. It is still a great distance from Chelsea, Mass., to Seoul, Korea, in 1950, but a soldier can leave here and be there in a few days of interrupted flying.

Korea, its people and its problems, are much closer than we think to the everyday life that is lived in Chelsea, as science and invention make us realize that we cannot confine ourselves to the sense of community we feel in our city, State, or Nation. Another relationship, that of the world-neighborhood, is calling upon us to devise a system that will protect all nations and all men from the new form of slavery that threatens the earth.

In other days, men could escape from tyranny because no oppressor had the means to turn this whole planet into a jail.

But now there is no hiding place left.

The instruments of science can reach everywhere.

In the control of evil men, these blessings can become a curse.

If we are to be free, we can no longer run away.

The thoughtless person who says that what happens in Korea, or Berlin, or Indochina, or Washington is no concern of his is making a terrible mistake. It could be fatal if such ignorance spreads.

We are celebrating Pulaski Day not because it gives us the passing joy of seeing a colorful parade. We have not come here in idle curiosity to consider for a moment a name that meant so much to us in our school days, and then put it aside until we revive its memory again on this day in 1951.

History has no meaning and no lessons for us if we treat it lightly.

Pulaski was a man before he was a general.

The outward trappings of uniform and fame are nothing compared with his faith, his belief, and his actions.

He became great because he was so right, in a way that extended far into the future, to the present and even beyond. Pulaski is alive today because his passionate devotion to human rights and human freedoms is what this world needs above all now, if it is not to lose, what he helped to win.

The victories of yesterday can become the defeats of today forfeited by indifference and neglect.

Pulaski's bones have turned to dust, but his spirit marches on in the minds and hearts of men and women who are alive to the dangers and responsibilities of 1950. Old injustices are corrected. New ones appear. Tyrants soften their unsuspecting victims by thought control before they bear down physically. Vigilance as the protector of our liberties must be exercised in all the dimensions of human experience. Words and deeds are no longer reliable in themselves. We must always look for the hidden meanings to save ourselves from being deceived.

Pulaski believed in the right of all men to be free.

That is why he helped us.

That is why we, in the name of the United Nations, are helping the Koreans.

Our men are demonstrating that courage, as ever, is an indispensable quality of a free man's faith.

But to it we must add intelligence.

The mental alertness that knows what we are fighting for, and the clear thinking that seems through the clever lies of enemy propaganda, so that we will not be confused or taken in by half-truths or rumors.

General Pulaski was a man who did his own thinking. He did not depend on others to do it for him.

He was a leader among the sturdy and self-reliant men who won the American Revolution. They and their discendants, together with the new sons and daughters who fled Europe to find the freedom of opportunity here, have built a nation that helps others as well as itself. And this was accomplished by people first, with Government assisting in a secondary role.

The American experiment, stressing individual worth, has exceeded even the fondest hopes of the fo. ding fathers.

We are not going to abandon this good thing for the empty promises of communism. We know that under our free system, every person has a chance to improve himself, even while he helps others as a member of the greatest production team in history.

We also know that our liberty, with the material abundance which is proof of its vitality, cannot survive in a world where all other peoples have been reduced to slavery. We are helping our war-weakened friends to recover their self-reliance. In cooperation with them, we shall bring order to this world, based on a world constitution guided by reason, justice, and faith in God.

The Western World looks to us for leadership, not only in material things, but in the spirit that made them possible.

We demonstrated this positive leadership in Korea and took the ball away from the Communists.

To continue we must have allies rather than dependents.

Weaker democracies will become strong, and those now in captivity will regain their independence, if we do not slacken in our purpose.

The trend toward concentration of power in the hands of the few must be reversed. In government and in industry, we must strive to keep close to the citizen and the worker. Freedom has a hollow ring when a person cannot see or speak to his representative in government or to his employer in business.

That self-reliance which we find in the example of Pulaski, and Americans like him, will disappear from our way of life unless we decentralize as much as possible, permitting people to have a genuine feeling of paricipation in the events which affect their lives.

If Pulaski were living in our times, I cannot imagine him feeling so insignificant concerning his government that he would not even bother to vote. I cannot visualize him as taking some small job at the age of 25 and staying in that one groove for the rest of his life in return for job-security. It is impossible to imagine him as a person who would say: "Let George do it" to every problem outside of his family and his work.

To him, life was not just a span of years along which he could coast with as much comfort and as little annoyance as he could manage.

It was much, much more than that.

He did not live for himself alone, but to win the freedom under which hundreds of millions of people would find greater fulfillment in the generations that followed.

It is a strange but inspiring parallel of history that two countries so far apart—Poland and America—should have been so alike in their early desire for freedom and in the vigor with which they have fought for it on every front down through the years.

It has created a kinship between our two peoples that will never die.

Encouraged by the memory of Pulaski, Poland will regain her independence. No one can predict just when, but of this we can be sure. The United States will be a leader among those who will bring about the liberation of Pulaski's homeland.

We offer prayerful thanks to the memory of a great soldier in a great cause.

Because of him and his fellow-revolutionists, we in these blessed United States are free.

We promise that we shall carry on the good work until the people of Poland and all other enslaved nations can live as human beings again.

When that day comes, Pulaski's victory will be complete.

Who Failed?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, December 4, 1950

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, today's New York Herald Tribune carries a very timely discussion of the present emergency in Korea written by Joseph and Stewart Alsop. I offer it for the perusal of my colleagues, not as carping criticism but as the basis for constructive action to prevent a recurrence of this type of catastrophe:

WHO FAILED?

(By Joseph and Stewart Alsop)

WASHINGTON.—Every American, in and out of public life, is asking who is responsible for the disastrous intelligence failure which has now led to military disaster in Korea. The answer is simple. The whole responsibility belongs to Gen. Douglas MacArthur's own intelligence organization, headed by one of the little circle of high staff officers who have been with MacArthur since Bataan, Maj. Gen. Charles A. Willoughby.

This would not be so, if General MacArthur were subject to normal rules. In a normal war theater, agent nets and other machinery for gathering and processing intelligence belong to the national intelligence organization, the CIA. In a normal theater, by the same token, the theater G–2 is primarily responsible for military interpretation of the intelligence thus obtained, and has only the most limited responsibility for intelligence collection.

Even during the Second World War, however, when this pattern was becoming established in other theaters, General MacArthur showed sharp dislike for it. Indeed, he actually banned the CIA's wartime predecessor, the Office of Strategic Services, from operating in his Pacific theater. Postwar, he continued to maintain the same ban until this spring, when the CIA was at last permitted to get its toe in the door. Even then, moreover, the unusual concession was demanded and granted, that the local representatives of the CIA should be placed under the operational control of General Willoughby, as theater G–2.

TROUBLE AFTER INCHON

This arrangement remained in force after the Korean war broke out, until after the Inchon landing operation. The bold and brilliant stroke at Inchon was the best possible proof that a great military commander like MacArthur can work real miracles with good intelligence. Inchon would hardly have been possible without solid detailed information about the weakness of the enemy defenses, and MacArthur himself congratulated the CIA representatives on their part in securing this information.

For some occult reason, however, trouble followed almost at once. Not very long after the Inchon landing, the arrangement made in the spring was suddenly upset. The old ban on the CIA was again enforced.

The whole task of gathering and processing intelligence, as well as interpreting the intelligence for the theater commander and for Washington, once more reverted to General Willoughby's organization, where the entire responsibility still remains.

Rather transparent attempts are now being made to suggest that the intelligence thus provided was not really so bad after all. It is hinted, in one breath, that our plans in Korea only miscarried because of the interdict on air operations beyond the Chinese border (which General MacArthur, of course, knew all about long before he gave the recent order to attack). In the next breath, it is also stated that the true intention of the "Home by Christmas" offensive was only to blunt an expected Chinese onslaught. This is demonstrable nonsense.

MAC ARTHUR'S BELIEF

As early as late September General MacArthur had been positively convinced that the Chinese would not intervene in Korea. At Wake Island, he expressed this conviction most forcibly to the President, only a few days before the Chinese crossed the border. The sudden appearance of Chinese troops in combat in October very evidently took our divisions in Korea wholly by surprise. And even thereafter, the authorities in Tokyo clearly believed that the Chinese intervention was essentially unimportant, inspiring many stories about the small numbers of Chinese troops in Korea and their demoralization by American fire power.

Finally, no general in his senses would have hurled our thin lines of men, with a great gap in the center, against an enemy whom he did not confidently regard as weak and on the run. General MacArthur must, he can only, have ordered the "home by Christmas" offensive on the basis of an estimate of enemy capabilities and intentions so grossly false that over 200,000 Chinese troops were somehow lost in the shuffle. He must, he can only, have been perfectly sincere in saying that he hoped to "end the war for all practical purposes." It is a dreadful thing that General MacArthur thus walked into a huge, well-laid trap. But it is more just to our most eminent American soldier to admit this frankly, than to try to pretend that he got into the trap of his own volition.

In short, the horror that confronts us proves the converse of a rule already given. Just as a great commander can work miracles with good intelligence, so even the greatest commander cannot overcome bad intelligence. Since the bad intelligence emanated from General MacArthur's own headquarters, this may displease those who like to believe that he has attained a sort of divine perfection. But facts are facts nonetheless, and they must be faced.

Puerto Rican Radicals in Minority

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRED L. CRAWFORD
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, December 4, 1950

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, following the Nationalist disorders in Puerto Rico recently and the attempt on the life of President Truman by two of their numbers, Gov. Luis Muñoz Marín made a speech in which he expressed the deep feeling of the majority of his people against these criminal disorders.

Radicals in this country have seized this opportunity created by their fellow travelers in Puerto Rico to launch new blasts against our form of government, all based on false or distorted facts.

It was my privilege to sponsor a bill in Congress which permitted the people of Puerto Rico to elect their own governor for the first time in 1948. Political rights there are fully guaranteed. Puerto Ricans are citizens of the United States.

In justice to the sane-thinking citizens of Puerto Rico, I believe the facts set forth by Gov. Muñoz Marín are worthy of our consideration, and I herewith present the speech which he made:

GOV. LUIS MUÑOZ MARIN'S SPEECH, NOVEMBER 1, 1950

The people of Puerto Rico are profoundly indignant at the attempt made at Blair House, in which two Puerto Rican nationalists were involved. We would feel ashamed of calling ourselves Puerto Ricans, if it were not for the fact that the Nationalist gangsters are less than 500 in number, among the more than 2,000,000 decent, democracy-loving American citizens that make up our community. We have a genuine admiration and affection for President Truman, not only because of his leadership in these troubled times of the world, but in a more intimate sense, because of his constant, fair-minded, generous attitude in helping Puerto Rico to help itself. We are deeply relieved that this criminal attempt was as futile as the violence that we have experienced from the same source and under the same guidance in Puerto Rico during the last 2 days. This crime confirms my conviction of the connection of these mad, grotesque, and futile Nationalist violence makers in Puerto Rico with communistic propaganda strategy all over the world.

The Nationalists started violence and assassination last Monday in Puerto Rico. Twenty-seven people were killed and about 90 wounded. In numbers, they are an insignificant group favoring the independence of Puerto Rico. The issue in Puerto Rico is not between colonialism and independence. We are not a colony of the United States. We are citizens of the United States and our island is associated on a basis of freedom with the United States. We are members of the independence of the United States.

The last time the Nationalist Party risked the hazard of democracy by going to the polls was in 1932. At that time they managed to get only 5,000 votes out of 400,000 votes cast. Since then, they have expressed the conviction that votes and democracy are not important. I am Governor of Puerto Rico by a majority of 390,000 votes out of a total of 640,000, but my opponents, who polled the other 250,000, are 100 percent with me in condemning this dastardly attempt on President Truman's life and all the criminal works of this Communist-prompted lunacy. The Nationalists have no political power. They have no votes and they hate votes. Votes to them are as repugnant as holy water to the devil. As decent Christians, as militant members of the democratic world, all Puerto Rico tonight is filled with wrath and indignation.

I have just talked to President Truman on the telephone and I expressed to him the joy of our people that the criminal attack was warded off. I am happy to say that the President answered me that the facts are clearly understood.

In the name of the people of Puerto Rico, I wish also to convey our grief to the family of the guard who lost his life at Blair House today.

As sensational as these developments have been they have had little effect on the economy of the island. This is revealed in a letter I have received from the Sugar Producers Association which follows:

ASOCIACIÓN DE PRODUCTORES
DE AZÚCAR DE PUERTO RICO,
San Juan, P. R., November 29, 1950.

Hon. FRED L. CRAWFORD,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: You are certainly aware of the recent events in Puerto Rico: uprise in the Insular Prison, rioting and street shooting.

You are also aware of the fact that two individuals in Washington made an attempt to shoot President Truman. Two days before, a similar attempt against Gov. Muñoz Marín also failed. The uprising, the rioting, and the criminal attempts against both President Truman and Governor Muñoz Marín have had general condemnation in the island.

Since you may have been given a distorted version of the events in Puerto Rico, it may be appropriate for us to explain some facts. We are doing that herein:

The government of Puerto Rico is genuinely democratic; a government elected by the people with their votes at a democratic election with political rights fully guaranteed to all. Because of these circumstances, the citizens of Puerto Rico, who are at the same time citizens of the United States, enjoy the benefits of freedom as do the citizens of all democratic countries.

The unfortunate events of the last few days are the work of misled fanatics of an ill-assorted group of irresponsible individuals, moved by a misconception of ideals. Their kind is limited to a minority of 500 to 1,000 individuals out of a population of over 2,000,000 peaceful, law-abiding citizens. Many of them have already paid with their lives for their mistaken ideal of liberty.

Commerce and industry have not suffered in the least as a consequence of these acts. There has been no interruption of trade. Factories have continued their normal operations. Banks have not closed their doors. The life of the community has not been altered except in the few places where the riots occurred. Puerto Rico is today going about its business as if nothing had happened. And we feel that this is the best indication that the sudden disorders caused were promptly and effectively controlled by the government.

In justice to all Puerto Ricans, it has been our earnest desire to convey to you a true picture of the situation, and we sincerely request your cooperation in passing on the information to your friends and associates hoping that by so doing you will be rendering a valuable service to a people who under no circumstances should have thrust upon them the indignity of the acts of irresponsible individuals.

Sincerely yours,

J. B. GARCÍA MÉNDEZ,
Executive Vice President.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

Address of Hon. A. O. Stanley

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARENCE CANNON

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 30, 1950

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I am including an eloquent and thought-provoking address delivered by Hon. A. O. Stanley, chairman of the United States section, International Joint Commission and for many years a Member of the United States Senate, before the Rotary Club at Philadelphia, Pa., November 15, 1950:

The ages present no scene so fraught with pathos or tragedy as that of the most opulent, prosperous, and puissant nation on this earth seeking nothing for itself and endeavoring only, perhaps in vain, to preserve that peace of the world against a single insolent and arrogant aggressor.

While sages, jurists, and statesmen in a war-weary world are exhausting all the resources of international council and conciliation to avert the impending catastrophe, our youth gird themselves for war and mothers weep and pray.

Is it humanly possible to substitute the rule of reason for the arbitraments of the sword?

How can international differences be submitted to some form of judicial determination, can any leagues, alliances or any other concert of peace-loving peoples save a devastated and ravaged world from a last dismal resort to organized murder known as world war?

In the abhorred event of the recurrence of international conflict nothing is obviously so essential as international solidarity on this hemisphere.

Above all, there should be between Canada and the United States the most cordial and complete cooperation, yea, more than cooperation, complete integration of all our powers, resources, equipment, and manpower for the common defense. Happily both countries keenly alive to the exigency of the hour are laboring earnestly and efficiently toward the immediate attainment of that end. It is generally assumed by the man in the street that this cordial and cooperative spirit now so manifest between these great and friendly neighbors always existed simply because it should have existed. It is a fact nevertheless that nothing could have been further from the truth. Prior to the organization of the International Joint Commission, under the so-called Boundary Waters Treaty of January 11, 1909, and other similar measures, looking to the just and peaceful settlement of differences between these two countries, no such feeling existed.

Until 1912, when the International Joint Commission was formed, interminable disputes accompanied almost every effort to establish the approximately 3,000 miles of boundary extending from Passamaquoddy Bay to the Strait of Juan de Fuca. On more than one occasion border controversy brought the two countries to the verge of armed conflict.

Battleships poised for action at the mouth of the Columbia River; a United States Senator calling for 30,000 to 40,000 rifles beyond the Rocky Mountains; the British Premier declaring in Parliament that "England knows her rights and dares to maintain them"; and "54–40 or fight" was a party slogan in a Presidential campaign in the United States.

This background of hostility had its genesis in the American Revolution. A numerous and powerful minority, having resisted through the conflict any resort to arms or separation from the mother country, at its close, estimated at more than 100,000 were forced into exile. Sailing for Nova Scotia and New Brunswick or crossing Lake Huron and the Niagara River to people in the uninhabited wilds of Ontario and, unfortunately, carrying with them the bitter memories of 8 years of savage civil warfare, passed on to their children and their children's children the bitter story of confiscation, persecution, and exile. For more than a century this unfortunate atmosphere of suspicion and hostility was prevalent especially in the maritime provinces. All efforts to adjust the boundary were productive of more or less acrimonious disputes. The Webster-Ashburton treaty fixing the boundary between Maine and New Brunswick was negotiated only after 50 years of wrangling and threats of war by both sides. And as late as 1903, in the controversy over the Alaskan boundary, Canada protested against the award, alleging that Great Britain in cultivating the friendship of the United States had sacrificed the best interests of the Dominion Government.

Following the Alaskan boundary dispute, it became more and more apparent that the peace, prosperity, and happiness of both countries depended upon the maintenance of a more friendly relation between these two great countries and in ultimately securing, if humanly possible, their close and cordial cooperation. Both Governments were seeking a more flexible and more direct means of adjusting the differences constantly arising between the two countries.

Happily that delicate and difficult task was assigned to the two men, who, in all the world, probably were best qualified to discharge it—the then United States Secretary, Elihu Root, whom Theodore Roosevelt regarded as the wisest man he ever knew, and the erudite James Bryce, British Ambassador to the United States and dean of the diplomatic corps. After years of study their arduous efforts at last resulted in the Boundary Waters Treaty whose prime purpose was "to prevent disputes regarding the use of boundary waters, and to settle all questions involving the rights, obligations, or interests of either Nation in relation to the other or to the inhabitants of the other along their common frontier, and to make provision for the adjustment and settlement of all such questions."

The treaty provided for the establishment and maintenance of an International Joint Commission composed of six members to carry out those objectives.

Without precedent in the history of international relations, this unique body is clothed with varied and plenary powers—administrative, investigative, arbitral, and judicial. In fact, it can exercise some form of jurisdiction over all "matters of difference involving the rights, obligations, or interests of the United States or of the Dominion of Canada either in relation to each other or their respective inhabitants."

Few courts, national or international, have ever been called upon to exercise jurisdiction over a wider domain, a greater number of inhabitants, or more vast interests. And no such court from the days of Henry of Navarre has been more successful in the discharge of its grave and difficult duties than this International Joint Commission.

International differences of course multiplied with the progress and development of the two countries. The ever-increasing use of boundary waters for purposes of power and irrigation produced trouble spots all along the 3,000 miles of boundary.

As stated by Elihu Root, one of the authors of the Treaty, it was the result of three years of negotiations "upon a great and increasing number of vexatious questions and controversies then pending for solution between two countries. There was the question of the diversion of water at Niagara Falls, the diversion of the waters of the St. Mary and Milk Rivers; the proposed change of the levels of Lake Champlain, the utilization of the border lakes from North Lake to the Lake of the Woods, and the effect of a change of levels in that vast watershed upon riparian property—industrial development and fisheries and wildlife in the whole region."

"With all these and many other questions," says Mr. Root, "we have undertaken in this treaty to treat matters in a little broader way."

In fact, the Commission created by this treaty is unique in the extent, the number, and character of powers conferred upon it.

As stated by Mr. Chako in a recent history of this Commission:

"Since the Hague Convention in 1899, nations have concluded numerous agreements among themselves which provided for investigations—agencies to elucidate the facts or the laws involved in disputes arising among them. • • •

"But not one single Commission in this entire galaxy is clothed with that aggregate of powers which is delegated to the International Joint Commission.

"It is to a certain extent, an administrative agency like the Commission on the Rhine and the Danube; it acts as a court in protecting water rights in boundary streams, it is a Commission of inquiry and conciliation, and last but not least, an arbitral tribunal, a miniature Hague Court under article X. The vast scope and variety of its duties and powers is apparent in the provisions of article IX that:

"The high contracting parties further agree that any other questions or matters of difference arising between them involving the rights, obligations, or interests of either in relation to the other or to the inhabitants of the other, along the common frontier between the United States and the Dominion of Canada shall be referred from time to time to the International Joint Commission, etc."

Some idea of the extent of authority and jurisdiction hitherto exercised by one or the other of the two Governments was abrogated and vested in this great Commission, as evidenced by the fact that this body now exercises some form of supervision or control over all changes of level, diversion, uses, or pollution of all boundary waters or of streams crossing the boundary. In this category fall the Great Lakes, whose waterborne traffic is the wonder of the world.

"A steam shovel," remarks Michael Costello, "at an iron mine in Minnesota scooped up 20 tons of iron ore at a single bite and dropped it into a railroad dump car. Seven days later and 1,000 miles away a Pittsburgh mill was making that ore into steel."

In 8 months the freight carried over this waterway exceeds the total annual tonnage of all our Atlantic, Pacific, and Gulf ports combined, and nowhere else in the world is it carried at greater speed or less cost. During the First World War, Lord George pertinently observed, "Coal is life." At that time the statement contained much truth, since the bulk of all our commercial and industrial activities were then dependent upon steam. This is no longer the case—modern life is literally "wired" in every essential phase; by electricity homes are lighted and heated; trains are driven and the wheels and looms of mills and factories whirl and buzz in response to this silent but irresistible force.

Now in the bulk this electrical energy is derived from falling water, and the greater part of these lakes and streams which furnish this hydroelectric power which cross or form the international boundary, and consequently under the terms of the treaty, fall to a greater or lesser extent under the supervision or control of this International Joint Commission.

To illustrate, at the direction of the two Governments, we have for several years been engaged in a most interesting study of the great Columbia River and its tributaries. It is as amazing as true that approximately 40 percent of the hydroelectric power of this continent, developed or potential, is derived from this single river system.

Some years since Professor Magnusson, in a series of exhaustive studies of the Columbia and other transboundary streams, declared that a river system is in a way like a living organism. In its proper development you cannot bisect it by an imaginary boundary line without irreparable injury and loss to the parts thus arbitrarily separated.

In the economic and efficient utilization of the illimitable national resources of these great waterways forming or crossing the boundary they must necessarily be treated as one system, absolutely without regard to any local interest or imaginary line.

The great structures in these streams essential to meeting the agricultural and industrial needs of both countries necessarily supersede or supplement one another. The effects of a great dam on one side of the border may and often does directly or indirectly affect similar structures on the other. For that reason the efficient and economical development of both countries demands that such works should be as they are constructed by the concurrent action of both countries through the services of the International Joint Commission.

To illustrate the close interrelation of such structures in boundary and transboundary waters, we are now considering the probable construction of the Libby Dam. This great structure located on the upper reaches of the Kootenay River in Montana to a height of approximately 400 feet and impounding 6,570,000 million acre-feet, is capable of generating 620,000 kilowatts of electrical energy. The flow of this stream derived as it is from the glaciers and ice fields of the far north, is highly seasonal, consisting in the main of the floods and freshets caused by the melting of the ice and snow fields in the early spring. These surplus waters from time immemorial have flowed unused from the frozen heights and plateaus of our Rocky Mountains to the sea, of little or no use to man or beast, and in their destructive course flooding towns and villages and devastating the richest agricultural lands in Idaho and British Columbia.

This one structure will change the whole picture in both countries. This dam will impound all the flood waters of the Upper Kootenay and will forever save harmless from formerly recurrent floods, the surpassingly fertile flats of the Kootenay and all the dwellers therein. These waters thus captured will then pass in controlled stages down the stream through the penstocks of six great installations in Canada on the west arm of the Kootenay, structures producing the bulk of the installed hydroelectric power of the whole Dominion, adding to the volume and value of the present installed capacity of 400,250 horsepower, with an annual average output of 282,521 kilowatt-hours. Rolling on these once dreaded and desolating flood waters, will return to the United States and to the great forebay of the Grand Coulee Dam, the mightiest structure of its kind on the face of the earth, firming and enriching its huge capacity of electrical energy and lending further aid to the future irrigation of more than a million acres of fertile and now semiarid lands, thence on down the course of the mighty river to the sea, it will perform a similar service for the great dams at Rock Island and Bonneville.

This Libby Dam project is but a part, and a small part, of the enlightened and cooperative effort of these great and friendly neighbors in a joint and comprehensive development of the illimitable natural resources of their boundary and transboundary waters under the wise guidance and direction of the International Joint Commission.

We are now considering ways and means for a further utilization of the potential hydroelectric power of Niagara Falls without detriment to the beauties of that natural wonder. Our skilled experts and engineers have just demonstrated that it is physically possible and probably practicable to harness and put to beneficial use the illimitable force of the ocean's high tides in Passamaquoddy Bay, and having once before approved, to again investigate, and I trust recommend, the enormous hydroelectric power patented in the international section of the St. Lawrence River where by the erection of a single structure we can readily develop a plant of 2,200,000 horsepower with an average output of 12,600,000 kilowatt-hours. Half of the installed capacity will be on the United States side and half on the Canadian side of the international boundary. Each country would get 6,300,000,000 kilowatt-hours per year.

What an example we set to the hostile, snarling, and suspicious nations of the Old World. Here we have learned that our future happiness and prosperity lies in cooperation, not aggression. In a wise and broad-minded program of mutual aid in sharing and not by impeding or preventing prosperity of our neighbors, this program, so admirable in time of peace, is absolutely essential to our survival in time of war. In the presence of the pending threat, we may well exclaim with wise old Ben Franklin, "We must hang together or we shall hang separately."

I devoutly rejoice that today, in all our preparations for mutual defense, we are as one nation, in absolute accord in the pooling and allocating of our national resources, the quality and character of munitions, arms, and armament. In the event of that awful and evil hour, Canada and these United States shall stand as one man in resources, in armament, equipment, in an invincible and unconquerable purpose, for a high cause, "to suffer, resist, fight, and, if need be, to die." And well we may, for I am firmly convinced that in the event of attack we shall alike feel the impact of the same blow and at the same time.

No great and free nation ever was or ever will be dominated by air power alone. Airplanes and atomic bombs may devastate but they can never subdue our countries. In the nature of things we can never be taken, can never be subjugated without the physical presence of an irresistible army. No such force threatens, of course, save from Russia, and Russia can never in the face of our superior Navy transport such a body of troops across the Atlantic.

If ever Stalin comes, he must come over the top of the world and across the 52 miles of water separating Alaska from Siberia. Billy Mitchell, the prophet, the apostle and the martyr of air power, first crucified and then canonized by his repentant countrymen, was right, dead right, when he declared that Alaska was the key to our national defense. "With Alaska as a base," said he, "America could dominate the entire world."

Of course if Russian troops landed in Alaska they would have to pass through Canada to reach their arch enemy, the United States. Happily Canada understands this as well as we do. Rejoice as we may in our unexampled facility in the smelting and fabrication of iron and steel and in the assurance of a superior weight of armament and the certainty of an inexhaustible supply, in the last analysis I rest my abiding faith not in armaments but in men, not in the gun—however good that may be—but in the man behind the gun. Not for one instant do I question the imminence of the peril or the might and malignity of this sinister adversary. Whenever and wherever that iron curtain falls it drops like a pall upon all that makes life worth the living; behind it is utter darkness, extinguishing the last ray of hope for any form of liberty, political, industrial, economic, or spiritual.

Russia's recent and rapid acquisitions of people and countries whether by the unsuspecting generosity of her former allies or by her own cunning falsehood and chicanery, has no peer and parallel in the history of this world. In 10 short years, since 1940, Russia has added to her Communist holdings 4,000,000 square miles of territory with a population of 647,000,000. After the First World War, Russia dominated less than 8 percent of the world's population; now more than one-third of all the peoples of this world have been brought to a greater or lesser extent under her evil and debasing dominion and over more than one-fifth of this good earth's surface floats the baleful ensign of the hammer and sickle. With an area exceeding 8,500,000 square miles and a population of over 210,000,000 people, all other empires, ancient or modern, pale before it.

"When Rome sat on her seven hills, and in the zenith of her power in the golden age of Trajan and the Antonines, Gibbon tells us that the whole Roman Empire "did not greatly exceed 2,000 miles in breadth or 3,000 in length with a population roughly estimated at 120,000,000," which, at that time observes the same great historian, "formed the most numerous society that has ever been united under the same system of government."

This dark and ominous shadow of universal servitude and oppression has a pink penumbra that to my mind is more insidious and in many respects more menacing to free government than out and out communism. It is the diluted form of this devilish thing that most I fear. They tell us that confiscation is tolerable if taken in broken doses. A comparatively harmless form of this social disease—socialism—resembles communism as varioloid resembles smallpox. The political heresies of Carl Marx and LaSalle have at least a certain consistency. This plan for the nationalization of the property of one class for the benefit of another is as inconsistent as it is absurd. To arbitrarily take property not plainly impressed with a public use simply on account of its amount or extent, differs only in degree from the nationalization of all property and inevitably leads to it.

This pernicious paternalism in one form or another, this modified communism dubbed collectivism, socialism or what not, has to a degree undermined the original concept of personal right and personal liberty, the courage, the resourcefulness, and the rugged individualism of an elder and better day in the old world. Men leaning upon governmental aid, the hungry supplicants for some form of Federal handout, are seldom prompt or determined in resisting the insidious encroachment of that same government upon personal rights and personal liberties.

Again in the old world all personal and property rights were originally property and concessions rung from the crown by entreaty or by force. In this new world, men derive their inherent rights and liberties not from governments but from God.

Bancroft observes that the divine doctrine that all men are endowed by their Creator with the "unalienable" right to life, liberty, and property, was older than the Declaration of Independence. Jefferson expressed the same idea in a somewhat different phraseology when he wrote "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness."

But to the practical continentals the right to property was as sacred and as unalienable as liberty or life itself. John Stuart Mill has vividly expressed this concept of the essence of any form of free government in the statement that—

"Whatever theory we adopt respecting the foundation of the social union and under whatever political institutions we live, there is a circle around every individual human being, which no government, be it that of one, of a few, of the many, ought to be permitted to overstep; there is a part of the life of every person who has come to years of discretion within which the individuality of that person ought to reign uncontrolled either by any other individual or by the public collectively."

It was to preserve forever inviolate these unalienable rights, the right to live their own lives and to express their own opinions, religious or political, and to own and control their own property, that the Puritans and Pilgrims fled to New England and to the fertile fields of Virginia, the one to set up an altar and the other to establish a house where each would be dependent only upon the fruitfulness of the seasons and the goodness of God. Governments with them, by them created, were always the servants not the masters of the people.

Their holdings, torn from the wilderness and the savage, purchased by their valor and their toil, were as much an inherent part of their "unalienable rights" as freedom of speech and religion.

The greatest and most erudite of all English statesmen at the time of the Revolution called attention of the House of Commons to this clear conception of their right and their familiarity with all the guaranties of the English Constitution greater perhaps than even Englishmen themselves. To know the very weight and fineness of their liberties and the great legislator and jurist who warned a blinded king and his stubborn monsters that no matter what the cost, they would never surrender to them. Said Burke:

"In other countries the people judge of an ill principle in government only by an actual grievance; here they anticipate the evil and judge of the pressure of the grievance by the badness of the principle. They augur misgovernment at a distance and snuff the approach of tyranny in every tainted breeze."

At the time of the Revolution, the colonists all were in complete agreement as to the fundamentals of free government and as to existing grievances, they differed only in the method of redressing them. The royalists, the Tories, hoped for relief by ultimate concessions from the Crown; the Revolutionists, impatient of further aggressions, bade defiance to King and Parliament and flew to arms. The thousands of exiled royalists who subsequently peopled Canada carried with them the same simple and sublime concept of personal liberty and political freedom as the rugged individualists in the Colonies. These opinions have not changed in the passing years. In Ontario, in Nova Scotia, as in New York and New England, in our western States and Provinces, in Montana and the Dakotas, in Manitoba and Saskatchewan, in Vancouver and Seattle, there is in this Western World but one way of life. Stronger than any unity in armament or in arms, is this eternal unity of the spirit.

Alike in social customs, laws, and institutions, forever one in our invincible purpose never to desert or surrender our inestimable and common heritage, we in the Western World are prepared, if need be, to turn a face of flint to the ruthless hordes who threaten us with an unendurable servitude and oppression. As one man, as one people, in arms, in armament, and in spirit, we are prepared to resist to the last gun and the last man.

In the inspiring words of Winston Churchill, as one people we will fight upon the beaches, in the cities, in the fields, and in the hills, we will never surrender. Regardless of what may happen in other countries or other lands, here on the shores of the Western World freedom has set her eternal Ebenezer, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it.

The American Way of Life as Seen by an Educator

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 4, 1950

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, in the December 1950 issue of the magazine Progressive, there is published an article by Robert M. Hutchins, the chancelor of the University of Chicago, which is timely and thought provoking. In view of the recent passage of the antisubversive bill, the thoughts expressed by Mr. Hutchins take on special significance. This world-renowned educator calmly discusses the meaning of the American way of life and the role of education in these troubled and tense days. He warns that we must retain our sense of perspective and proportion, that we must recapture our national sanity and courage.

I commend this article to the attention of my colleagues:

WHAT ARE WE AFRAID OF?

(By Robert M. Hutchins)

We hear on every side that the American way of life is in danger. I think it is. I also think that many of those who talk the loudest about the dangers to the American way of life have no idea what it is and consequently no idea what the dangers are that it is in.

You would suppose, to listen to these people, that the American way of life consisted in unanimous tribal self-adoration. Down with criticism; down with protests; down with unpopular opinions; down with independent thought. Yet the history and tradition of our country make it perfectly plain that the essence of the American way of life is its hospitality to criticism, protest, unpopular opinions, and independent thought. A few dates like 1630, 1776, and 1848 are enough to remind us of the motives and attitudes of our ancestors. The great American virtue was courage.

We ought to be afraid of some things. We ought to be afraid of being stupid and unjust. We are told that we must be afraid of Russia, yet we are busily engaged in adopting the most stupid and unjust of the ideas prevalent in Russia, and are doing so in the name of Americanism.

The worst Russian ideas are the police state, the abolition of freedom of speech, thought, and association, and the notion that the individual exists for the state. These ideas are the basis of the cleavage between east and west.

Yet every day in this country men and women are being deprived of their livelihood, or at least their reputation, by unsubstantiated charges. These charges are then treated as facts in further charges against their relatives or associates. We do not throw people into jail because they are alleged to differ with the official dogma. We throw them out of work and do our best to create the impression that they are subversive and hence dangerous not only to the state but also to everybody who comes near them.

The result is that every public servant must try to remember every tea party his wife has gone to in the past 10 years and endeavor to recall what representatives of which foreign powers she may have met on these occasions.

A professor cannot take a position on any public question without looking into the background of everybody who may be taking the same position on the same question. If he finds that any person who is taking the same position on this question has been charged with taking an unpopular position on another question, the professor had better not take any position on this question, or he may be haled before some committee to explain himself.

Is this the American way of life? The great American word is freedom, and in particular, freedom of thought, speech, and assembly. Asserting the dignity of man, and of every man, America has proclaimed and protected the freedom to differ. Each man is supposed to think for himself. The sum of the thoughts of all is the wisdom of the community. Difference, disagreement, discussion decided by democratic processes are required to bring out the best in the citizens. America has grown strong on criticism. It would be quite as consistent with the American way of life to offer prizes for the most penetrating criticism of our country as it would be to offer prizes to those who have done the best job of advertising it.

The heart of Americanism is independent thought. The cloak-and-stiletto work that is now going on will not merely mean that many persons will suffer for acts that they did not commit, or for acts that were legal when committed, or for no acts at all. Far worse is the end result, which will be that critics, even of the mildest sort, will be frightened into silence. Stupidity and injustice will go unchallenged because no one will dare to speak against them.

To persecute people into conformity by the nonlegal methods popular today is little better than doing it by purges and pogroms. The dreadful unanimity of tribal self-adoration was characteristic of the Nazi state. It is sedulously fostered in Russia. It is to the last degree un-American.

II

American education has not been constructed on such un-American principles. In general, the practice has been to give the student the facts, to try to help him learn to think, and to urge him to reach his own conclusions. It is not surprising that the heart of American education is the same as that of Americanism: it is independent thought.

American education has not tried to produce indoctrinated automatons, but individuals who can think, and who will think always for themselves. The basic principle of American Government, and one that accounts for the importance of education in this country, is that if the citizens learn to think and if they will think for themselves, the Republic is secure. The basic principle of the Russian dictatorship is that the people cannot think or cannot be trusted to think for themselves.

The American doctrine rests on the proposition that it is the individual in himself that counts. It is not who his father was, or how much money he has, or what his color or creed is, or what party he belongs to, or who his friends are, but who and what is he? So the test of a teacher is hardly a question on which lay bodies, or even administrators or trustees, would wish to pass without the advice of persons professionally competent in the teacher's field.

If we apply any test other than competence in determining the qualifications of teachers, we shall find that pressures and prejudice will determine them. In 1928 it was said that Al Smith could not be President because he would be subservient to a foreign power, and today in many places, and if not today it may happen tomorrow, anti-Catholic or anti-Jewish compaigns may mean that teachers who belong to those churches will not be able to practice their profession.

Teachers may be expected to obey the law of the land. But it is still permissible, I hope, to ask whether a law is wise. To discriminate against teachers, to act as though they were all disloyal, and to put them under special legal disabilities seems injudicious if we want able, independent men to go into the teaching profession.

The assumption appears to be that American education is full of Reds, an assumption that is the precise reverse of the truth. All the excitement of the last few years, all the hearings, investigations, and publicity releases, have not turned up more than four or five Communist professors, even though membership in that party has been perfectly legal up to now. To require oaths of loyalty from all because of the eccentricity of an infinitesimal minority is an unnecessary and derogatory act. And, of course, it will not effect any useful purpose, for teachers who are disloyal will certainly be dishonest.

The way to fight ideas is to show that you have better ideas. No idea is any good unless it is good in a crisis. You demonstrate the failure of your ideas if, when the crisis comes, you abandon them or lose faith in them or get confused about them to the point of forgetting what they are.

The American idea is freedom. Freedom necessarily implies that the status quo may come under the criticism of those who think it can be improved. The American idea is that the state exists for its citizens and that change in society must occur to meet their developing needs.

The whole theory of our form government is a theory of peaceful change. Many of the changes that Marx and Engels demand in the Communist Manifesto have taken place in this country, and they have taken place without communism, without dictatorship, and without revolution, thus disproving, incidentally, one of the central theses of Marx and Engels, that such things cannot be accomplished without communism, dictatorship, and revolution.

These reflections on the Communist Manifesto lead me to say that labeling some thing or some man Communist because Communists happen to favor it or agree with him, that easy process by which one disposes of different views of applying a dirty name to them, involves the negation of thought of any kind. If it had been applied consistently in American history it would have deprived us of some ideas and some men that we are proud to think characteristically American. For example, the Communist Manifesto demands free education for all. Are we therefore to recant, and renounce the American doctrine of free education for all?

And what would the FBI say of Thomas Jefferson, who calmly remarked in his first inaugural, "If there be any among us who wish to dissolve this Union, or change its republican form, let them stand undisturbed, as monuments of the safety with which error of opinion may be tolerated where reason is left free to combat it"?

Jefferson was not in favor of revolution; he was serene in the face of talk of it because he had confidence in our people, in our institutions, in democracy, and in the value, power, and results of independent thought.

We are now in the midst of a cold war. We must protect ourselves against external enemies, their representatives in this country, and any citizens who may be conspiring to overthrow or betray the Government. But the statute books are already filled with laws directed to these ends. It has never been shown that there are so many spies or traitors in this country, or that the external danger is so great and imminent that we have to divert the entire attention of our people into one great repressive preoccupation, into one great counterrevolution in which the freedoms of our citizens must be thrown overboard as too burdensome for the floundering ship of state to carry.

It is useful to remember that Jefferson spoke in 1801, when our Constitution was 12 years old, and when the infant Republic was in dreadful danger from deep divisions within and from the wars that were raging between the great powers. If he was right in speaking in such a way at such a time, we cannot be far wrong if now, when America is the most powerful Nation on earth, we seek to recapture some of his sanity and courage.

How is the educated man to show the fruits of his education in times like these? He must do it by showing that he can and will think for himself. He must keep his head, and use it. He must never push other people around, nor acquiesce when he sees it done. He must struggle to retain the perspective and the sense of proportion that his studies have given him and decline to be carried away by waves of hysteria. He must be prepared to pay the penalty of unpopularity. He must hold fast to his faith in freedom. He must insist that freedom is the chief glory of mankind and that to repress it is in effect to repress the human spirit.

Hamstrung

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT F. RICH
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, December 4, 1950

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Altoona Tribune of December 2, 1950:

HAMSTRUNG

From some sources come criticism of General MacArthur for the Chinese Communist attack. Probably, if the full story were known, it would reveal MacArthur as the most politically hamstrung military commander in history.

For weeks, he has been saying he should have authority from the United Nations to bomb concentrations of Chinese troops across the border in Manchuria. But, his orders from Mr. Truman, and from the United Nations, forbid any American or United Nations plane to cross into Chinese territory.

Thus, under cover of this protection, the Chinese massed 300,000 men, and, although the Yalu River bridges were bombed out, they stalled and fooled the Americans by withdrawing small forces, sending back prisoners, and the like, anything to gain time until the river froze solid enough for those massed troops to cross.

A few days ago, that occurred, and nearly a half million Chinese Reds poured across unhindered to slaughter the boys of the American Eighth Army.

The President should not stand for that. He should show enough consideration for American boys to withdraw those forces immediately unless the United Nations gives consent for MacArthur to mass-bomb the Chinese wherever he may find them, in China, in Manchuria, or in Korea.

As it is, our boys must stand and fight endless Chinese Reds, as they emerge from frozen Manchuria. With a free hand MacArthur could turn loose terrific destruction upon those Chinese slaves of Stalin. He would not even need the atomic bomb.

Most expert opinion says the atomic bomb would be of little value in that region because of the broken terrain and scattered troops.

Our use of the atomic bomb probably would serve only to provide Russia with the right excuse to hand one to the Chinese and tell them to hit New York or Seattle with it.

Mr. Truman Friday asked for a vast outlay of funds to build for victory in Korea and to prepare for possible attack in other parts of the world.

When is the President going to prepare the United States for defense against attack?

Upon General Bradley's advice, he left our own country bare of defenses to send troops into Korea, where they have been led into one trap after another while UN delegates have wasted time and bickered over the most trifling technicalities.

Russia has tremendous military power, concentrated power. She is reported to have at least six full armies backed by 1,500 war planes in eastern Germany.

How many more armies and planes she has in Russia is mere conjecture, but estimates run up to 10,000 war planes including good jets, and 15,000,000 trained men.

Backward Russia! Backward China! So some Americans say, and express contempt. But, no matter how backward in other ways they may be, a nation armed to the teeth with modern weapons, into which it has put all its wealth and effort, can be a hundred times more deadly than a great and rich nation concerned with taking its ease, and in seeking more security for its people.

From Frankfurt Thursday came a news report from a reporter who has been interviewing the German people, and the people of western Europe. They do not want war, and are not interested in taking sides in it.

They are afraid of Russian might, poised at their frontiers. Their military men are convinced Russia could overrun western Europe almost at will, in a matter of days.

Europe has no will to resist Russia.

In China, our ground forces can be ground to pieces, as we commit them piecemeal.

Had Mr. Truman had sound military advice last June, and had he not permitted Louis Johnson to scuttle the Navy and cripple our fighter forces, we might have handled the Korean conflict with only aerial and naval forces, not committing ground troops, which, now one must admit, would have been the sensible thing to do, as hindsight shows.

Now, in view of this confused world situation, Mr. Truman surely will forget the temptation hung before him by Russia to indulge in little wars and instead, concentrate our efforts in building a mighty America, a powerful fortress unwilling to have its strength drained off as Moscow wills.

Labor Day Address of Hon. Horace W. Harper

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT CROSSER
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, December 4, 1950

Mr. CROSSER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following address by the Honorable Horace W. Harper, member of the Railroad Retirement Board, at Altoona, Pa., on September 4, 1950:

Mr. Chairman and friends, Labor Day is a good occasion to boast about labor's achievements on the one hand, and to point to the many tasks still to be achieved, on the other. I cannot, of course, speak of all the gains that labor made in the past and to outline a goal for all future achievements. I can, however, do so by limiting myself to one topic, which is of interest to railroad workers, and that is the Railroad Retirement Act.

This act was born out of a great conflict between the standard railway labor unions, on the one hand, and the carriers, on the other. This conflict began around 1931 and ended in victory for labor when the Railroad Retirement Act of 1934 was enacted. Labor's victory in Congress, however, was lost when the carriers got a victory in the courts. The first Railroad Retirement Act was declared unconstitutional in 1935. Labor tried again and secured the enactment of the Railroad Retirement Act of 1935. The carriers tried for another victory in the courts, but this act withstood the test. Later the carriers and labor agreed on the Railroad Retirement Act of 1937, which has been amended a number of times, the major amendments having been enacted in 1946.

There was general agreement in 1946, and until recently, that the railroad retirement system was the best in the world—was much superior to any system that afforded workers security in old age. During the last year, however, there have been a good many free pension systems established in various industries; and, recently, the President of the United States signed the bill, H. R. 6000, which provided substantial increases in benefits under the Social Security Act. These events naturally raise the question whether the Railroad Retirement Act is still better than the Social Security Act.

There have always been enemies of railroad labor who wanted to see the railroad retirement system scrapped. They invariably referred to railroad employees as the aristocracy of labor, receiving preferred treatment over all others, particularly in social insurance, and were very jealous of the higher benefits railroad employees received under the Railroad Retirement Act. It is these critics who are now stumping the country and are misrepresenting to railroad labor that the railroad retirement system is inferior to the social security system. But this is not the case. Even with the new benefits provided under H. R. 60, railroad employees still fare better than employees covered under the Social Security Act. I have not had sufficient time to analyze H. R. 6000 in complete detail but I do know that—

1. Employees covered under H. R. 6000 still lack the protection afforded under the Railroad Retirement Act in cases of disability. Let us take the case of two men aged 30 years, one in the railroad industry and the other in some other industry. Each entered service at the age of 20, and both were in a serious automobile accident so that each is totally and permanently disabled for all regular employment.

At age 30, therefore, the railroad man would be entitled to an annuity of at least $36 and as much as $48 a month for the rest of his life, while the man in the other industry, if he is only covered by the Social Security Act, even under H. R. 6000, will get no benefits whatever for 35 years, that is, until he attains the age of 65. In other words, the railroad man will get benefits for 35 years at the rate of as much as $48 a month while the nonrailroad man will get nothing during those 35 years. I would like those who keep pointing to the higher tax rates under the railroad retirement system to tell me whether the benefits for 35 years which the railroad man will receive are worth 10 times, 20 times, or 100 times the higher tax rate which the railroad man paid for 10 years?

In the same example, if the two men were now 40 years of age and each had 20 years of service, and were each disabled only for work in his regular occupation, the railroad man would start getting benefits at age 40, and could get at least $60 and as much as $96 a month for life, while the nonrailroad man would get nothing for 25 years. Here again I would like those who criticize the higher taxes under our system to tell me whether a maximum of $96 a month for 25 years is worth 10 times, 20 times, or 100 times the higher tax rate which the railroad man paid for 20 years.

2. The maximum an employee can receive under H. R. 6000 on an average wage of $300 a month, even on as much as 40 years of service, is $80. This amount is $3 less than the present average under the Railroad Retirement Act. The maximum under the Railroad Retirement Act on the basis of 40 years of service will be $192 instead of $80.

3. Under H. R. 6000, a man with 40 years of service and an average of $300 will get no more than a man with 10 years of service and an average of $300—each will get $80 maximum. Under the Railroad Retirement Act, however, the 30 years of additional service are given due recognition. It is true that on the basis of 10 years of service, the maximum under the Railroad Retirement Act is now only $48; but it is also true that the number of employees retiring after 10 years of service is extremely small, except for disability, which H. R. 6000 doesn't cover. By far the greatest majority of workers spend all their lives in industry. Yet the extra years of service, wages, and taxes do not add up to a greater monthly benefit under H. R. 6000, while they do so decidedly under the Railroad Retirement Act.

4. The maximum for a man and his wife under H. R. 6000 is $120, but only if both are age 65. The maximum for a man alone under the Railroad Retirement Act in $144, regardless of whether he has a wife or how old she is.

5. At the present time, the maximum under the Railroad Retirement Act is $144, while H. R. 6000 provides a maximum, for a family, of $150. However, in order for an individual covered under H. R. 6000 to receive the $150 maximum, he would have to have a wife and a child under age 18, or two children under age 18. Most men of 65, of course, don't have children less than 18 years old. On the other hand, the railroad employee's present maximum of $144 is not subject to any conditions as to wife or child. He gets that amount for himself as a matter of right.

6. The railroad retirement system guarantees that no tax payment by the employee will ever be forfeited. That is, if the sum of all benefits paid to an employee during his lifetime, or to his survivors after his death, or to both, amounts to less than the total of the taxes he has paid during his lifetime (plus a slight amount of interest) the difference will be paid to someone the employee designated, or to certain of his surviving relatives, or to his estate. In other words, the guaranty is that there will always be paid out more in benefits than the employee paid in taxes. There is no such guaranty provision in H. R. 6000.

7. There is no forfeiture of service under the Railroad Retirement Act; a railroad worker never loses credit for his service no matter how little or how scattered it may be; while forfeiture of insured status, that is, forfeiture of service has always been a feature of the Social Security Act, and is still possible even under H. R. 6000. Eventually, the forfeiture under H. R. 6000 could be as much as 9 years and 9 months of service and the wages therefor. As I said before, however, railroad employees suffer no forfeitures of service or compensation under the Railroad Retirement Act.

8. Credit for service before the passage of the act was provided for in all three Railroad Retirement Acts; the Railroad Retirement Act of 1934, 1935, and 1937. I do not have to tell you, gentlemen, that substantially all of the retirement annuities payable under the Railroad Retirement Act now are based to a large extent on service rendered before 1937. Such services will continue to be credited at least until the year 1967. Yet, it is well known that under the Social Security Act, service before 1937 is not counted under any circumstances.

I do not mean to simply that H. R. 6000 is not a great improvement on the existing benefits under the Social Security Act. In fact, I consider its enactment a great victory for labor. It is certainly the clearest proof that Congress no longer looks upon adequate protection against the hazards of old age, unemployment, and death, as socialism. Such protection is now as American as, for example, workmen's compensation, which some 35 years ago was also called socialism. Judging by the overwhelming congressional support of the Social Security Act liberalization, it is safe to say that even the great majority of the die-hards have learned their lesson—even they will now admit that it is more American to enable our aged workers to enjoy the serenity of old age in their own homes rather than at the poorhouses. What is more, our old-age protection is not a philanthropic hand-out, but security which we purchased with our own money in the form of tax deductions from our salaries, and which we can enjoy with the utmost self-respect. This, in my opinion, is the true American way to provide for the aged and disabled workers. There is certainly no difference between buying our protection from a commercial insurance company and buying it under the terms of a Federal act. Both are self-respecting, except that we get more for our money under the Federal act than we would from the private insurance company; and to try to get more for one's money is a good old American custom.

The purpose of my comparison was merely to show that with all the improvements under the Social Security Act the Railroad Retirement Act is still a better retirement system. Railroad employees have many more advantages under the Railroad Retirement Act than other employees have under the Social Security Act. I am not suggesting that we should be satisfied with things as they are. Of course not. We all know that our formula for computing annuities was established some 13 years ago when the value of the dollar was nearly twice that of today—when the annuity had some reasonable relationship to the prevailing wages and provided a decent sense of security. Since then the cost of living has risen tremendously and wages have risen considerably so that by now, even with the 20-percent increase we secured in 1948, the ratio of annuities to wages is much lower than it should be, and the annuity is far from adequate to enable us to quote with the high cost of living.

Of course, the big obstacle to an increase in benefits is the matter of cost. In 1948, we were able to increase benefits without increasing taxes because the taxable yearly payroll in the railroad industry proved to be far in excess of what was estimated when the 1946 amendments were considered. When these amendments were first proposed, the Railroad Retirement Board's estimate was that the average future taxable railroad payroll would be about $3,500,000,000 a year. The railroads estimated it would be about $2,500,000,000 a year; while an actuary consulted by a congressional committee estimated it would be about $2,750,000,000. By 1948, it was clear that all three estimates were wrong, although the Board's estimate was less so than the other two. The railroad payroll was $4,600,000,000 for the fiscal year 1946, $4,700,000,000 for 1947, and $4,900,000,000 for 1948. Of course, it could not be assumed that the payroll would always be this high, but there was enough basis for revising the old estimate as to what the future average taxable railroad payroll would be; and after a careful study, it was estimated that it would be $4,300,000,000. On such basis, an increase of 20 percent in retirement annuities and pensions, without an increase in taxes, was warranted because the existing tax rate, being on a larger annual payroll, would necessarily result in previously unexpected income, sufficient to cover the additional cost.

It is true that we have in our reserve about $2,000,000,000, but many people have misunderstood the meaning of this reserve—they considered it to be a surplus. I am sure I don't have to tell you that there is a substantive difference between a reserve and a surplus. If the $2,000,000,000 were a surplus, we could use it for anything, including increasing benefits. But this is not the case. That money is reserved for future use. When our railroad retirement system was established, the standard railway labor unions insisted on putting it on a sound financial basis. There was, of course, a very good reason for this. None of us, I am sure, has forgotten the unfortunate experiences with the railroads' private pension systems which the railroads established and maintained on a pay-as-you-go basis; they had no reserves to meet future contingencies. The result was that during the depression in the early 1930's, most of the railroads just didn't have enough money to pay their pension obligations. By obligations I mean moral as distinguished from legal obligations because, as you will recall, those pensions were voluntarily set up by employers without contributions from employees; and the employers looked upon these pensions as gratuities or gifts which they could give or withhold. The legal authority to compel them to live up to their promises was very questionable, to say the least. Because there was no reserve set aside to meet contingencies, most of these pensions were reduced, during the depression of the early 1930's, all the way from 10 to 50 percent. This was certainly not a happy situation for those already on the pension rolls, and a much less happy situation for those not yet pensioned. The latter certainly had very little to look forward to. It was for this reason, among others, that the standard railway labor unions insisted on your railroad retirement system being set up on an actuarial-reserve basis. In simple language, this means that for a number of years when the system is young and benefit payments are low, the revenues from the tax rates will be sufficient not only to pay the current benefits but also to lay aside a considerable sum in a reserve to earn interest at 3 percent from investment in Government bonds. Later, the time will come when the benefit payments will be substantially in the same amount as the income from taxes. Finally, a time will come when benefit payments will be larger than the income from taxes. By that time, however, it is expected that the reserve will be large enough so that the interest on it will be sufficient to make up the difference between the benefit payments on the one hand and the tax revenues on the other. By then we shall have reached what the actuaries call maturity, and our system will be safe indefinitely.

We are, of course, planning to increase benefits, but under the present method of financing we can't increase benefits without increasing taxes; and we definitely don't want to increase taxes. At first blush, the problem looks insoluble, but it looks so only to those who do not know, or have forgotten the ingenuity of the leadership of the standard railway labor unions. Time and again they were confronted with even greater problems and they managed to come out on top, and I am confident that they will do so again. In 1933–34, when they were confronted with serious opposition in the halls of Congress in their effort to secure the enactment of the Railroad Retirement Act, who would have believed that they would succeed? But they did. When, in the following year the Supreme Court of the United States declared the 1934 act unconstitutional, who would have believed that they weren't licked? The 1935 and 1937 acts are living exhibits of their success. Again, when in the years 1944–45 they sought the enactment of the amendments, which were finally enacted in 1946, there were many who were skeptical about their success. Need I add any more evidence of their will to succeed, and of their success, once they are fighting for a just cause? Therefore, gentlemen, I submit that the past record of the railroad labor chiefs is more than ample to warrant our confidence in them that they will find some way out of the present dilemma. And I assure you that the way out will not mean giving up our independence from the Social Security System.

I am hopeful that during the next 5 months or so, a definite plan will be worked out with the aid of the Honorable ROBERT CROSSER, the dean of the House of Representatives and the father of the Railroad Retirement Act, so that early next year a bill to increase benefits will be introduced in Congress.

In mentioning BOB CROSSER I must tell you that I was shocked recently when I was told of an editorial in the Progress, of Clearfield, Pa., under date of August 8, 1950, which held Mr. CROSSER responsible for the failure of an amendment in this session of Congress to increase benefits under the Railroad Retirement Act. Anyone who knows BOB CROSSER and his interest in the welfare of railroad workers would know that there is absolutely no basis for this statement. It is true enough that Mr. CROSSER did not himself introduce any bill during this session of Congress to increase benefits under the Railroad Retirement Act, and it is also true that, as chairman of the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, he scheduled no hearings on any such bills introduced by other Members of Congress. But this was not because he was not interested in securing an increase in benefits. The contrary is very true. He has been thinking about it very seriously. But it is easy enough to introduce bills providing for an increase in benefits and let someone else worry about where the money will come from. That, gentlemen, is the difference between Congressman CROSSER and some other Congressmen. When Mr. CROSSER finally introduces a bill to increase benefits you will have the assurance that the bill will have been thought through carefully not only with regard to the increase in benefits but also as to financing these increases without increasing your taxes. This has not been the case with regard to the many bills introduced during this and the last session by other Congressmen.

It is true enough that their bills provided increases in benefits one way or another, but not one of them contained a single provision as to where the money would come from. Any of those bills would have required an increase in taxes; and that is what we want to avoid. For anyone to accuse Mr. CROSSER now of lack of interest in you because he refused to hold hearings on any of these bills, is nothing less than an attempt to pull the wool over your eyes. Did Mr. CROSSER's accusers tell you that the bills proposed to increase your benefits made no provision whatsoever for the financing of them? Or that these bills all left this important question to Mr. CROSSER to figure out, and that was the reason he did not hold hearings on such bills? Yes, gentlemen, it is easy enough to introduce bills. It costs a Congressman nothing to do so. As a matter of fact, he can get such a bill drafted by the House Legislative Counsel, or, as a Congressman, he has the privilege of calling on any Government agency for technical assistance in getting the bill in shape, and even thereafter everything is done for him. The Government Printing Office prints copies of the bill free of charge and in large numbers. The Congressman can get as many copies as he wants free of charge. Then he can and does mail large numbers of this bill under his franking privilege, free of charge, to all of his constituents saying, "See what I have done for you." Yes; all that is easy enough—it costs nothing and helps on election day. But that is not the way Mr. CROSSER does things. He waits a long time before he introduces a bill in your behalf. But when he does, something comes of it. It was his bills that ultimately became the Railroad Retirement Act, the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act, and all the important amendments to both acts. This was so because they were all thought out carefully, as it should be. Now, gentlemen, BOB CROSSER does not need me to defend him. His record speaks for itself—so much so, that, in my opinion, anyone who said about him the things stated in that editorial has not been open and aboveboard with you.

In conclusion, I plead for your cooperation and patience with regard to amendments to the Railroad Retirement Act. As I said before, I think we will have a bill in Congress early next year—a bill which I am sure will be introduced by Congressman CROSSER—a bill which will have been carefully thought out both as to increases in benefits and the method of financing benefits without taxing you any more. But bear in mind, gentlemen, that the problem is not a simple one, and that the bill will have the backing of the chiefs of the standard railway labor unions. You know, and I know, that these chiefs have never failed us before, and I am confident that they will not fail us now.

The Honorable Oscar R. Ewing's Address at Pioneer Women's Silver Jubilee

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, December 4, 1950

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, Pioneer Women, the women's labor Zionist organization of America, recently celebrated the silver jubilee anniversary of its founding. Established in 1925, the organization has sponsored health, education, and youth projects in Israel. It has built homes and vocational training centers for immigrant women, and institutions and nurseries to care for orphaned children. Pioneer Women numbers between 40,000 and 50,000 women in this country. It participates in various cultural and social welfare activities, and keeps its membership informed on world events and the struggle of the free world against all forms of totalitarianism.

The Honorable Oscar R. Ewing, United States Federal Security Administrator, was the principal speaker at the silver jubilee celebration of Pioneer Women at the Mayflower Hotel, November 19. Guests of honor were two women leaders from Israel, Beba Idelson, a member of the Israel Parliament, and Mrs. Elisheva Eshkol, a leader of the Israel labor federation Histadrut.

Mrs. Murray Frank, chairman of the silver jubilee committee of the organization, presided. The program was opened by Mrs. Morris Golden, president of the Washington Council of Pioneer Women. Greetings were extended by Moshe A. Tov, member of the Israel delegation to the United Nations; and Mrs. Eva Berg, of New York, one of the national officers, and a founder of Pioneer Women.

In introducing Mr. Ewing, Mrs. Frank told the audience of more than 600 members and guests:

It is my distinct honor to introduce at this time a very distinguished American and one of the leading personalities in the administration in Washington. In addition to his successful legal career, Mr. Ewing has made an outstanding career for himself in the last 10 years in public service.

Just 3 years ago at this time, he was appointed United States Federal Security Administrator. He has acquired a great name and a great reputation in this office and has shown himself to be an able and outstanding administrator. He is one of the most ardent friends of the state of Israel and visited it earlier this year as a special emissary of President Truman.

It gives me great pleasure to present the Honorable Oscar Ross Ewing.

The text of Mr. Ewing's address follows:

I am very glad to be here with you tonight. The story of Labor Zionism, in which the Pioneer Women have played so useful and energetic a role, is very familiar to me. I have had the privilege, not only of seeing how hard and well you work here in the United States, but also—and even more important—of seeing the fruits of your labors in Israel itself.

I visited Israel in the first days of this year. I was there only a short time. Yet the impact of that visit makes the memory of what I saw just as fresh as if I had been there last week. I saw the cities—the ancient city of Jerusalem and the new metropolis of Tel Aviv—and the farms—the collective settlements beyond Tiberias and the orange groves along the coast. I saw the feverish building everywhere, the factories, the hospitals, the homes, the farm houses. Above all, I saw the spirit of the people of Israel. That may sound to you like a figure of speech, for you cannot in reality see the spirit of a people—yet in Israel it is very close to visible; it is evident in every action of a nation building for the future, a nation confident that it will overcome the huge difficulties that confront it, a nation firm in the ways of freedom and democracy.

As Pioneer Women, you have a right to be proud in your share in having made Israel a reality—and of your share, today, in making Israel healthy and strong. I hope some day that each one of you will be able to go over there and see for yourself what the Jews of Israel have done with the help they have received from you. As I understand it, your organization was founded when an appeal came, many years ago, for a few hundred dollars to dig a new well. Out of that appeal burst a mighty movement of Jewish women in America, women who were none the less Americans because they were keenly interested in the upbuilding of Palestine and the ultimate creation of a Jewish state there. Today the state exists. It is a historical fact; indeed, a political fact of the first water. For, in the world-wide conflict of ideologies, every piece of land where there are people who believe in freedom and self-government, who refuse to give in to the blandishments of the totalitarians, who are ready to stand up and fight for their self-respect and their future—every such piece of land is a vital redoubt of the free world.

But it is not enough for a nation to have courage and determination. It is not enough for a government to be founded on the principles of parliamentary democracy.

Today we have learned the hard way that no nation is strong unless its people are strong—unless they are healthy, and adequately fed and clothed and housed, with a decent opportunity to improve their standard of living continuously. That is true of our own country; and I earnestly hope that some of our new leglislators will not need to learn it all over again when they deal with the pressing need for social progress here in the United States. But it is especially true of a land like Israel, where a very large proportion of the population comes from countries which had, at some time in the past, standards of living higher than those of Israel itself; and where another great group of the population has immigrated from areas where standards of living are virtually nonexistent. In the new Jewish melting-pot, where intellectual and unskilled worker, western European and Yemenite, concentration camp alumnus and proud young Israel-born boys and girls, must all learn to live together—in this new melting-pot, there is the pressing need to establish a sound, healthy, firm economy.

There is only one way to build such an economy, and that is to help mold a sound, healthy, courageous people. That is why the work of the pioneer women is so important. Like good pioneers in the classical sense of the word, you have led the way. You have helped make it possible to prepare the land for the newcomers. You have helped improve health conditions. You have worried about water supplies. Today you are creating day nurseries, women's hostels, and vocational courses for women and girls. And now, in your second quarter-century, you have taken upon yourselves the building of a new youth village and agricultural school on the road to the desert that must bloom if Israel is to prosper.

I suppose many people see in what you are doing the evidence of your sentimental desire to make this land a refuge for oppressed Jews from many parts of the world. But I think you are doing something even more fundamental than that. You, and the Zionist organizations which have worked with you, are giving the world a very real example of how to tackle the universal problems of under-development, how to meet the need for raising living standards, how to lead the way to a better life for peoples everywhere.

The friends of Israel have been carrying on their own voluntary point 4 program for Palestine for a quarter of a century and more. And, when you examine the basic approach, you will see that there is really no difference in purpose between what you are doing and what the United States as a Nation is undertaking for underdeveloped areas in various parts of the world.

The Government of Israel, and the friends of Israel in this country, are vitally interested in building up the services that will improve the health, the education, and the welfare of the people of Israel.

That is precisely what the Government of the United States is interested in, not simply for the people of Israel but also for all the peoples of all friendly nations on earth. This is a basic tenet of our foreign policy—not simply because we have humanitarian motives—but out of sheer self-interest, because we know that the spirit of freedom and resistance to tyranny thrives only when people have something worth living for. A long life, a happy life, a contented life, a flowering culture, an assurance of opportunity for the young; these are things worth living for. And these can be brought about only through a concerted attack on low living standards wherever they occur, at home and abroad.

That is why President Truman's point 4 program, and the technical assistance programs of the United Nations, have so great an appeal for most of the nations of the world.

Low productivity, ignorance, disease, and poverty go together. They are the four horsemen of defeatism, of disaster, of communism. In large parts of the world the working capacity of the population is kept down by incapacitating endemic diseases, by poor nutrition, by illiteracy, by lack of skills. Through the point 4 program, and the United Nations technical assistance activities, we hope to attack these evils.

The Federal Security Agency, as one of the participating organizations in carrying out the point 4 program, is prepared to provide technical assistance in the fields where we have most to offer, at the request of the Department of State. This assistance will include projects to control and eradicate endemic diseases which interfere with economic productivity; projects to improve basic sanitation; projects to develop and strengthen public-health services. In education, our projects will be concerned particularly with expanding and improving facilities for education, including adult education and vocational education. When I was in Israel early this year I made the preliminary arrangements for an American educational mission to help solve the special educational problems there. A few weeks ago, Dr. Earl J. McGrath, our Commissioner of Education, followed up on these conversations with a special visit to Israel, and next year we expect to send a larger mission to continue this work.

Basic education, in all lands, must help people, not only to learn to read and write, but also to deal with all the problems of everyday living, raising food, and maintaining minimum standards of sanitation and hygiene. These are tremendously important; and so are projects to develop other types of community services to improve welfare.

In all these fields, in cooperation with the Department of State, we are prepared to supply experts to advise with governments on strengthening their services and to carry out demonstration projects on the spot. We will help train personnel who will return to their home countries to organize and administer these new programs. Depending on the local situations and the desires of the governments concerned, American personnel may assist in strengthening training facilities in foreign countries. In some cases, grants will be provided for training in educational institutions and agencies in this country. These people, trained in the United States, can go back and train others at home, giving real leadership in the mobilization of brains for the improvement of man's lot.

Now, it is perfectly obvious that technical assistance of this kind must go hand in hand with work to increase food production and to develop other economic resources. The Federal Security Agency naturally will work closely on these problems with the Department of Agriculture, the Department of the Interior, and other parts of the Government. And we will try to adapt each project so that it will best fit the economic, the social, and the cultural needs of each country—and, of course, so that it will be in keeping with the kind of help which the government of each country most wants.

A few weeks ago, Secretary Acheson said, "The peace the world wants must be free from want, a peace in which neighbors help each other, and together build a better life." We can only achieve the peace the world wants through the exchange of experience and ideas in improving health, increasing literacy, and helping people deal better with their own economic and social problems. The Government of the United States, through the point-4 program, is committed to such a program. It is part of our whole new pattern of American thinking on foreign policy, which envisages a new and expanding partnership among the friendly nations of the world, building a better life and thereby strengthening ourselves against the enemies of freedom.

As members of the Pioneer Women, you have a natural interest in the special problems of Israel. That little country has many problems to solve—problems that would terrify the faint of heart and the weak of will. You and I know that the people of Israel have the heart, the will, and the brains to meet these problems head-on and to lick them.

But the people of Israel need help. They need help of a magnitude which this Government has not yet provided. The need for that help continues. So the people of Israel turn to you, as free-thinking and free-moving Americans, to provide as much help as you can through your voluntary drives to support peace and progress in Israel. They look to you to carry your share of the American program for bettering the lives of our friends abroad. When you carry on your activities as members of the Pioneer Women, therefore, you are extending the program of the Government of the United States; and you are acting in the finest traditions, in the noblest spirit of the American people.

With the help of all of us, and most of all by virtue of their will to survive and prosper, the people of Israel will bring to fruition on the shores of the Mediterranean a great country, a rich new life, a proud culture in a proud tradition, and a mighty bastion in the fortress of freedom. May these people, and all of us, enjoy the blessings which come from the lips of every man and woman and child who greets you in Israel: "Shalom!"—peace, peace to the people of Israel, peace to the whole Middle East, peace throughout the world, just and lasting and founded on freedom, peace to all men of good will, Moslem and Jew and Christian, peace on earth.

Give the GI a Break

OF

HON. THOMAS J. LANE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 4, 1950

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include the following editorial from the Daily Evening Item, Lynn, Mass., Dec. 2, 1950:

We've learned that American casualties in Korea are unusually high when measured against the total size of our forces there. But most of us realize that, given the number of our troops at the outbreak of war, there's very little that could have been done about it. In other words, we just didn't have enough men under arms at any stage to provide adequate relief for United States soldiers fighting at the front.

This isn't the place to go again into the reasons for that inadequacy. Presumably if we got into a major war with Russia or anybody else, we'd have more ample manpower for reserve use.

Every American ought certainly to hope, however, that when reserves are available they are employed with greater concern for the welfare and effectiveness of the individual fighting man than was shown in World War II.

In the big way the United States had something like 100 divisions in being. Of these, 64 saw battle action. In case you may not have realized what happens to men who do the actual fighting, consider these figures from an instructor at the Army Command and General Staff School in Fort Leavenworth, Kans.

Eighteen of the sixty-four fighting divisions had greater total casualties than they had men in the beginning. Five suffered casualties of 176 percent—they were in effect almost wiped out twice over.

The figures indicate that on the average half a division's strength was gone after 50 days of combat. Give them 150 days in the front lines and they were down to 18 percent. After 300 days, nearly a year, only 3 out of every 100 soldiers in the original outfit was still fighting.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

In 85 to 100 days up front, infantry regiments will suffer total casualties equal to their starting strength.

Said an Army report: "Under present policy no man is removed from combat until he has become worthless. The infantryman considers this a bitter injustice."

The command school instructor, Lt. Col. U. P. Williams, believes combat infantrymen deserve frequent rest periods. He says: "Important manpower savings can be achieved only by having each man believe that an honorable extended period of relief from combat awaits him. The rotation of individuals from the front line to less dangerous duty * * * offers the only practicable method of providing relief."

This officer is talking sense. We all know that the mud-caked, water-soaked GI is the backbone of the Army. If his welfare in the field is not made a prime goal, how can we expect him to do a consistently good job of fighting for us who are comfortably lodged at home?

Accept Military Help of Chinese National Government in Far East

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES W. VURSELL
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, December 4, 1950

Mr. VURSELL. Mr. Speaker, I am not a military strategist and realize we have very able military leaders who I know are giving earnest thought to the serious military condition that has developed in Korea and the Far East.

Like thousands of other American citizens, I have given thought to our present serious situation in Korea, trying to reason out what changes or moves we might make in our military plans in the Far East to relieve the very desperate situation confronting our soldiers in Korea and for the welfare of our people.

I have come to some definite conclusions which I feel it is my duty as a Member of the Congress to offer to this body, our military leaders, and the State Department. I believe the suggestions I offer to relieve our military situation in the Far East add up to just sound common-sense reasoning. These suggestions represent my own thoughts, and I make them for whatever value they may have, if any.

Mr. Speaker, it appears that our military situation has reached the very critical stage in the Far East where we should change our war plans at once in that area.

I believe the time has arrived for a new military approach and that an effective approach is available at this very moment.

The Chinese people, for over a half century, have been the friends, and later the allies of the American people. The continuing of their friendship can be a tremendous asset in the future, and vital to the peace of the world. If we make open war against China, we will lose that asset. If we win such a war, after years of sacrifice and struggle at a tremendous cost, the population is so great and the territory so expansive, we could not afford to occupy China and give leadership or rehabilitation to the people.

The Nationalist Government, when Korea was invaded, offered to furnish 35,000 of her best Chinese troops and trained fighters now on the island of Formosa.

Our military leaders should consider the shortage of American troops because of the more serious situation which has developed, and the great number of American lives that can be saved by the acceptance of the offer of the Nationalist Government to throw its forces into the fight. We know by experience we can expect very little help from other countries, members of the United Nations. That offer was rejected by the United States and the United Nations on the theory that it would invite an all-out war with China if we attack Manchuria.

Later events have proved that position to be erroneous by reason of the fact that over 200,000 Chinese Communists from Manchuria have crossed the border and are attacking United States and United Nations forces in a war of aggression in Korea.

This action on their part opens the way for the acceptance of Chiang Kai-shek's offer again made only a few days ago to enter the war with all of his available resources.

Mr. Speaker, this presents the opportunity to now accept the help of Chiang Kai-shek and lays the foundation for a new plan of military action which I suggest as follows:

Accept at once all of the available power and force Chiang Kai-shek is able to deliver. Let him cross into the mainland of China in full force with an appeal to the Chinese people to join with him and the United Nations, to increase and consolidate their military power and effort in organizing a force to move north against the Chinese Communists. Such an appeal should instill a revolutionary fighting spirit in the Chinese people bringing millions of them to his support.

When Chiang Kai-shek moves in with his military force we should assure the Chinese people that we will furnish them with all the food that is necessary and available, placing upon Chiang Kai-shek and the Chinese people the obligation to furnish the military power.

Mr. Speaker, the one thing the millions of Chinese most need and desire is food. Given the assurance of food and the renewal of our support and friendship the Chinese people can be set upon a crusade to reestablish the Government of China and drive out the Communists, a revolution that would overthrow the Communist control and the Communist ideology of their Government.

We should assure the people that when the Communists are driven out and the Chinese Government is reestablished we shall continue to help with food and finances to rehabilitate a Chinese Government of freedom for all of the people.

This action could bring about a complete revolution now before it is too late, of the Chinese people against northern communism and would doubtless cause thousands of Chinese Communists to desert who are fighting today because they were promised land and food which they have failed to receive.

This, in my judgment, offers an opportunity to regain freedom for 400,000,000 people and a stanch ally in the Far East who was sold into communism through a series of blunders of the executive department throughout the past few years.

Such a plan if adopted and successful would free China of communism without the loss of the lives of any American soldiers. It would permit us to use our present forces in Korea, holding the line there. It would compel the Chinese Communist government to fight a war on two fronts that should spell certain defeat.

With this diversion, causing them to fight a war on two fronts it would permit us to limit our military commitments in the Far East, and to furnish much greater military power for Western Europe so much needed, where we could threaten the very heart of Russian imperialism. Such action now would increase the morale of Western European nations.

Millions of Chinese people who have always been our friends are hungry and starving. By giving a southern Chinese army some military equipment, food for their soldiers and the Chinese people, such action should stimulate a military revolution that would sweep the Chinese menace out of all of China. We have vast stores of surplus food. Food will go far toward helping win such a war against communism.

I believe it would save us billions of dollars and countless lives of American soldiers if we adopt such a plan rather than continue to follow the present policy of the administration which can bankrupt our Government financially and never achieve the victory sought.

The administration plan to date has failed miserably. It has shaken the confidence of our European allies, threatens to wreck the United Nations, has brought fear and gloom to the American people, and to the freedom-loving people of the world.

This plan, I believe, will give us the relief we need, will recover the prestige we have lost, and will make it possible us to draw a much greater force and power into the redevelopment of a strong military force in Western Europe, so much desired now by the free governments of Western Europe and for the future peace of the world.

It could relieve the Indochina situation, releasing for action on the European western front large numbers of French soldiers now tied down in the Indochina area.

Economic Development of Underdeveloped Countries: Report of the Economic and Social Council

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LISTER HILL
OF ALABAMA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, December 5 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, as a representative of the United States in the United Nations Assembly, my colleague, the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr.

SPARKMAN] made an address in Committee No. 2 on the Economic Development of Underdeveloped Countries: Report of the Economic and Social Council, on October 19, 1950. I ask unanimous consent that the address be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. President, before entering upon the discussion of the problem of financing economic development, I wish to say a word concerning the accomplishment of the Economic and Social Council at its eleventh session in Geneva. I am sure that it is unnecessary for me to reiterate what has been stated by representatives of the United States on other occasions, namely, that my Government looks upon the Economic and Social Council as the basic instrument for bringing into being throughout the world those conditions of human well-being that are essential to the maintenance of permanent peace. I think that the active part played by our delegation at Geneva provides sufficient evidence of our deep interest in and concern for the affairs of the Economic and Social Council. Further evidence of the faith and confidence that my Government has in the Economic and Social Council is to be found in the remarks of our Secretary of State at the opening of the plenary of the assembly, particularly in his recommendation that the task of developing a program for the rehabilitation of Korea should be given to the Economic and Social Council.

During the closing days of the last session our permanent representative to the Economic and Social Council stated that in the years to come that session may be looked upon as an historic event. The results of its work in the fields of economic development and full employment may prove to be the beginning of a new era in human welfare and happiness.

In referring to the work of the Economic and Social Council, Mr. Chairman, I wish also to pay tribute to the leadership of its president, Ambassador Santa Cruz, whose skillful guidance and patient understanding played so great a part in making the tenth and eleventh sessions such a success.

I mention these things here at this time because my delegation has not felt it necessary to impose upon the time of the joint sessions of committees 2 and 3 by commenting on the underlying work of the Economic and Social Council. The United States delegation was one of the sponsors of the resolution creating the ad hoc committee to study the work of the council. When this body has the results of the work of the ad hoc committee before it, we propose to discuss in detail the problem of ECOSOC's work and organization.

Mr. President, the item now being considered by this committee is, in the opinion of my Government, essential to the attainment of the fundamental purposes of the United Nations Charter. Since the delegation of Poland has attempted to mislead this committee with regard to the attitude of my Government to this question of economic development, I think it necessary to quote a few basic paragraphs from the speech of President Truman which first proposed the now famous point 4 program. This is the speech which has constituted one of the basic directives under which my Government has operated over the past 2 years in its efforts to speed and facilitate the economic development of the underdeveloped countries:

"Our aim should be to help the free peoples of the world, through their own efforts, to produce more food, more clothing, more materials for housing, and more mechanical power to lighten their burdens.

"We invite other countries to pool their technological resources in this undertaking. Their contributions will be warmly welcomed. This should be a cooperative enterprise in which all nations work together through the United Nations and its specialized agencies wherever practicable. It must be a worldwide effort for the achievement of peace, plenty, and freedom.

"With the cooperation of business, private capital, agriculture, and labor in this country, this program can greatly increase the industrial activity in other nations and can raise substantially their standards of living.

"New economic developments must be devised and controlled to benefit the peoples of the areas in which they are established. Guaranties to the investor must be balanced by guaranties in the interest of the people whose resources and whose labor go into these developments.

"The old imperialism—exploitation for foreign profit—has no place in our plans. What we envisage is a program of development based on the concepts of democratic fair dealing."

I think, Mr. President, that there is no need for me to say more. This is the policy of my Government.

I would like, Mr. President, to address myself to the general topic of economic development, and to reserve the right to comment on the specific resolutions which have been introduced when you submit them to this committee for specific discussion.

The problem of economic development has been at the forefront of the discussions and debates in ECOSOC and in this committee from the beginning of their existence. Those who have been present at these debates are cognizant of the great effort and the great amount of time that has been devoted to arriving at a common agreement on the basic elements of this fundamental problem. The principles that should guide our activity in this field were developed at the early sessions of the Subcommission on Economic Development and of the Economic and Employment Commission. Their achievements were followed by the action of the third session of the Assembly providing for a limited technical assistance—an action which was later amplified by the expanded program of technical assistance which came into existence less than 5 months ago.

It is gratifying to my delegation to note that the technical-assistance program has had the approval not only of so many of the member states of the United Nations but also of eight nonmember states, all of whom have undertaken to bear a share of the cost of carrying on the program. It is also gratifying that 52 countries have contributed to this significant and constructive United Nations venture. Equally important and worthy of emphasis is the large number of requests for technical assistance that have been received by the Technical Assistance Board. To date, more than 40 such requests have been received. They vary all the way from requests for assistance for the control of leprosy and for reorganizing the structure and operations of local governments to requests for advice by a national development bank for planning agricultural development. These are evidences of the realization by those countries seeking accelerated economic development of the part that the technical-assistance program can play in assessing their resources and potentialities and in formulating plans for the economic development these countries are so actively striving to achieve. The progress of the technical-assistance program during its formative period is a source of tremendous satisfaction to my Government.

The resolution of ECOSOC now before us is in a sense a distillation as well as an amplification of the work of the fourth session of the Subcommission on Economic Development, certain phases of the experts' report on full employment, studies prepared by a group of experts convened by the Secretary-General, and the fourth session of the Economic and Employment Commission. The resolution was built on foundations that represent months of work on the part of many exceedingly able government representatives as well as of independent experts in the field of financing economic development. It is the most comprehensive approach to the problem that has ever been formulated. The importance of its recommendations justifies our reviewing them at this point.

First, the resolution emphasizes the desirability of forming development banks, with the participation of domestic banks and local industrial enterprises, as instruments for attracting and channeling foreign investment into essential projects. It is well to note that several such institutions are now in the process of formation in countries that have been in negotiation with the International Bank.

Second, emphasis is placed on the need for establishing conditions to encourage foreign private capital to take part in desirable developmental undertakings, either by direct investment or by investment in bonds of governments or of private or public corporations. As a supplementary measure, in the same connection, the resolution recommends that the more developed countries seek to encourage their nationals to invest their private capital in countries seeking to accelerate their economic development.

Third, in order to increase the lending power of the International Bank and reduce as far as possible the difficulties created by exchange shortages, the resolution suggests that more of the developed countries permit the International Bank to use increasing amounts of their 18-percent subscriptions and place the bank's bonds on their financial markets.

Fourth, it recommends that the more developed countries progressively extend the principle of untied lending of governmentally controlled or guaranteed foreign loans.

Fifth, the resolution emphasizes the indirect effects of non-self-liquidating projects such as transport, communications, housing, and public health upon national productivity and national income. The record of the eleventh session of ECOSOC is replete with references to so-called economic and social overhead projects which are essential to a coordinated development program and to the need for international financing for such projects.

As I have listened to the debate in this committee, I have been conscious of a tendency to overlook the fact that lending institutions have been giving more and more attention to the part that nonself-liquidating projects must play in economic development. I need merely cite the case of the United States Export-Import Bank which has for some time been making loans for highway construction, irrigation, low-cost housing, and similar types of projects. And, let us not forget that the International Bank has also made loans for irrigation, flood control, and similar types of projects. It has recently made several loans on other types of nonself-liquidating projects, such as roads, which should contribute greatly to the productivity of the borrower.

Sixth, since development projects may give rise to the need for importing consumer goods which are not related to the construction of the project itself, because of the shift of labor from agriculture to construction activities or because of the additional labor incomes created from employment on development projects, the resolution recommends that in making international loans lending institutions give appropriate consideration to the foreign exchange requirements for such consumer goods, as well as to the foreign costs of the materials directly required by the project itself. It is gratifying to note that the International Bank, in its fifth annual report, considers this matter at some length and gives promise of a more flexible approach to this problem in the future.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

Seventh, particular emphasis is placed in the resolution on the importance of countries seeking to accelerate their economic development to formulate integrated development programs and prepare them for presentation to the International Bank in a manner which will facilitate the bank's operations. It is in this connection that the technical assistance program should be especially helpful to many countries. It should be of particular aid in preparing projects for submission to the International Bank which will contain the basic economic and technical data that are essential to the determination of their feasibility and to the justification of their financing.

To avoid waste, etc., may I, in passing, call attention to the fact that a training course in the economic appraisal of development projects is under way, at this very moment, at Lahore, Pakistan. This course, attended by some 50 Government officials, is a technical assistance project. It is being sponsored by the United Nations, the Government of Pakistan, the Food and Agriculture Organization, and the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development. The Economic Commission for Asia and the Far East is a part of this venture. The purpose of this technical assistance project is to train the officials of the countries in this region, both members of the FAO and of the Economic Commission for Asia and the Far East, some 14 in number, as well as the officials of non-self-governing territories to prepare development projects and appraise their economic feasibility, so that they will be in a more suitable form for consideration by governmental and international financing institutions.

Eighth, the ECOSOC resolution recommends that the organizations furnishing credits for economic development give consideration to means whereby the funds they loan can be used to carry out integrated programs, that is, coordinated development projects in different branches of the borrower's economy.

Ninth, it is recommended that the interest and amortization terms of development loans made by governmental and inter-governmental institutions should be at rates which will place the smallest feasible burden on the foreign exchange available to countries seeking such loans, consistent with the maintenance of these institutions as self-supporting entities.

These are the highlights of the resolution now before us. I have reviewed them, briefly, because they cover virtually every aspect of the problem of financing which has in the past been the concern of those who have taken part in the discussions on economic development. (They recognize the important part that private investment has to play in this field and the responsibility of governments seeking foreign investment to establish conditions for encouraging such private investment. They also point to the part that the more developed countries can play in stimulating private capital to go into the areas that require economic development.)

I need not reemphasize the importance that the Government of the United States attaches to the place that private investment should and can play in economic development. (My Government has recommended to our Congress legislation which, through adjustments in our tax structure, should stimulate our private investors to invest greater sums abroad. There is also recommended legislation which will provide machinery for insuring, up to certain limits, the convertibility into dollars, of earnings which cannot be repatriated because of foreign exchange shortages.) Consideration is also being given to using this same machinery for insuring investors against certain other nonbusiness risks as may be attendant upon investment abroad. My government is also particularly interested in bringing about arrangements through treaties of friendship and commerce and economic development, which will encourage and expedite a greater flow of American private capital into countries seeking to accelerate their economic development, either by way of direct investment or by way of investment in the securities of governments or in securities of private and public corporations.

Despite the recent hesitation on the part of private investors to send their capital abroad we should not fail to take note of the fact that large sums are still available for investment in areas where conditions are conducive to private participation. One need only look across the border to Canada where very significant amounts of private long-term investment have been flowing during the past year. Private American capital to the extent of almost a quarter of a billion dollars has been committed within recent months to a single project.

My delegation was particularly impressed by the statement of the distinguished delegates from Mexico and Colombia in which they depicted the progress that their countries have been able to make by mobilizing their own domestic resources. The suggestion made by the delegate of Mexico to the Economic Commission for Latin America for an investigation into the factors influencing the demand for and supply of capital should, in our opinion, receive careful consideration.

I wonder how many people appreciate the significance of the war in Korea on the international investment picture.

It is possible that the long-range effect of the Korean War will be beneficial to the international flow of private capital. As time goes on investors are bound to realize that the United Nations—united and strong nations with a will for peace—have become a very powerful influence for political stability and economic growth. (This new influence, we believe, will become a part of the working consciousness of private businessmen, traders, and investors. It is only now beginning to operate. Its full force is yet to come.)

All of this does not mean, Mr. President, that there is not also a compelling need for governmental lending for economic development purposes. My Government in the course of the past 5 years has made available over $28,000,000,000 in the form of loans and grants to individual countries. It has paid in $635,000,000 of its subscription to the International Bank, and has made itself liable up to $3,175,000,000. It has contributed $74,000,000 to the United Nations Children's Emergency Fund, $30,000,000 to the United Nation Relief for Palestine Refugees, and the United Nations Relief and Works Agency in the Middle East, and $237,000,000 to IRO. No government which has such a record as this can be looked upon as not appreciating the need for Government financing of the needs and the economic development of other peoples.

The United States delegation places great weight on the constructive suggestions of the Economic and Social Council concerning governmental and intergovernmental lending institutions. Because of their importance it might be well to review the status of such institutions, as of this moment.

Since July 1, 1945, the United States Export-Import Bank has made loans for economic development in excess of $1,000,000,000. More than 70 percent of this amount has been for development loans to Latin-American and Asiatic countries. These loans were for development projects such as the generation and distribution of electric power, agricultural activities, the production of metals and minerals, highway construction, flood control, and other developmental work. During the past 3 months, some $212,000,000 were loaned to various countries in these same areas. A significant number of these loans have been based on the recognition of the need for general economic development as envisaged by the resolution of the Economic and Social Council. In other words, the Export-Import Bank has extended lines of credit to borrowing countries, and has thereby provided a firm basis for the coordinated planning of their economic development.

As the outstanding loans of the Export-Import Bank are repaid, the funds received can be reloaned, thus automatically providing the bank with additional lending power for suitable additional development projects. However, the rate at which the present resources of the Export-Import Bank are now being committed indicates the need for increasing its resources. It is therefore the intention of my Government to seek an increase in the lending authority of the Export-Import Bank.

The Government of the United States has viewed with considerable favor the current trend in the activities of the International Bank. The outstanding loans of the bank, as of this date, amount to almost a billion dollars—$972,000,000, to be exact. Of this amount, approximately 70 percent represents loans to countries that are seriously in need of economic development. Almost all of these development loans were made within the past 2 years.

The increasing concentration by the bank on economic development has been accompanied by a heightened awareness on its part of its responsibility to go out to its members and to assist them in assessing their needs and possibilities. Thus, the bank has developed a pattern of consultation and mission, of technical assistance in short, that should measurably increase both the volume of its development loans and effectiveness of the part it plays in the economic development of its members.

From the very beginning of its activities, the bank has had the authority to loan out the entire paid-in capital share of the United States Government. Moreover, the United States' contribution to the bank's capital can be used without any restriction as to where it is to be spent. To aid the bank in the flotation of its securities the United States Congress has enacted legislation authorizing National banks and State banks, which are members of the Federal Reserve System, to deal in and underwrite obligations of the bank. As a result of this legislation the market for the bank's obligations in the United States has been greatly broadened. The bank has borrowed from American investors the amounts that it has felt that it could lend within a reasonably short period of time. There is no doubt but that it will be able to borrow on very favorable terms such additional sums as it may reasonably be expected to require for lending purposes for a considerable period ahead.

I should like to point out that the amount the bank can still borrow in the private market, against the guaranty of the United States subscription, is approximately $2,250,000,000. To this amount should be added such sums as are being made available to it in the currencies of other countries. It is with satisfaction that we note the increasing amounts of the 18 percent contributions that have become available to the bank during the past year. It is also gratifying to know that the bank has been assured of increased loanable resources through the use of additional 18 percent subscriptions in the future, and to hear that France has now made possible the sale of the bank's bonds in the French capital market.

My Government has looked with particular approval upon the broadening scope of the loans made by the International Bank. The recent road loan to Ethiopia is fresh evidence of the bank's recognition of undertakings, which though not self-liquidating, involve a contribution to productivity and to increased national income. The purpose of the loan is to improve the highways of Ethiopia. Not only will improved roads facilitate internal and external trade by expediting deliveries and cutting down the present inordinately high transportation costs, but, as the bank has pointed out, by making government service more easily accessible to outlying communities, these improvements should also be conducive to bringing improvements in health, education, and governmental administration.

Similarly, the loan to the new Ethiopian Development Bank evidences the interest of the bank in aiding general economic development. This loan will make available to Ethiopia the foreign exchange necessary for the purchase of imported agricultural and industrial equipment. It will provide capital to finance the replacement of obsolete machinery, as well as for the purchase of additional equipment needed to bring existing plants to higher levels of efficiency.

In effect, the International Bank is providing a general line of credit to the Ethiopian Development Bank. The capital stock will be subscribed by the Ethiopian Government in local currency. The credit extended by the International Bank will permit the financing of many private projects, any one of which in itself might be too small to warrant bringing before the bank as an individual project. By the same token the arrangement eliminates the need for a separate government guaranty for each project to be financed. Although small, this undertaking by the bank sets a pattern which, on a wider basis, should both encourage the participation of local capital, and provide large amounts of foreign capital for a wide variety of undertakings in serving general developmental needs.

This experimentation by the bank with new techniques, the wide geographic distribution of its loans, the progressive enlargement of its technical assistance activities, the broader scope of the projects it finances, the promise of greater flexibility with regard to financing local currency costs, are all factors which should expedite and increase economic development. It is the hope of the United States delegation that as the bank becomes more familiar with the needs and capacities of its members, the tempo of its operations will increase and the bank's resources will be expeditiously devoted to the financing of as many development projects as can be economically and efficiently undertaken by borrowing countries.

The Economic and Social Council was fully conscious of the difficulties faced by certain borrowers in servicing foreign loans. Consequently, it undertook to further the collection of the information needed to measure the capacity of countries seeking accelerated economic development to service the required investment of foreign capital. It has recommended that the International Monetary Fund collect and analyze the data showing the proportion of foreign exchange receipts that are now being devoted to servicing foreign investment, as compared with the experience of more developed countries in the earlier stages of their development. It has also recommended that the Fund look into the question of administrative measures that can be used to provide for servicing such investment in times of exchange stringency. This analysis by the Fund will throw light on the extent to which countries in need of foreign funds for development can carry the burden of servicing such investment from abroad. It should bring into focus the extent to which the problem of foreign financing can be met by existing institutions and by current methods of financing. It should enable us realistically to assess those aspects of the problem of foreign financing which have been stressed before this committee by the distinguished representatives of Pakistan, the United Kingdom, Australia and other countries.

My delegation is aware of the fact that there are many projects that require financing which cannot be provided for under present circumstances. I can assure you that we will give careful consideration to the many stimulating ideas and suggestions that have been presented by the distinguished delegates from countries that are at this moment at grips with the problem before us.

And let it not be assumed that the endorsement of the resolution of the Economic and Social Council on Financing Economic Development by this committee will in any way lessen the interest of the Council or its members in this vital problem. To stimulate further progress in this field the Economic and Social Council increased the size of the Economic and Employment Commission to 18. To reemphasize the importance of economic development and to assure its continued consideration, the Economic and Social Council added the word "Development" to the name of the Commission and has instructed it to place the problem of financing economic development on the agenda of at least one of its sessions each year. Thus, provision has been made for this item to appear on the agenda of the Economic and Social Council each year and hence, automatically to be brought to the attention of the General Assembly each year.

Now let me look back for a moment, Mr. President, to compare and evaluate what has been done. We have ended a period of intensive preparation. We have begun a period of progress. In perspective, our work together should lay a sound basis for the confidence of the world—the confidence of those who conduct the trade and business and production of the world.

In all the centuries of search for better things, has any international group—public or private—ever sat together, as the United Nations has, analyzed problems, and then gone to work together to tackle those problems directly? Here, for the first time, mankind has brought together and analyzed his collective experience in economic growth. As a result he has fashioned certain tools which he knows have great usefulness. I refer first to technical assistance—a bad technical name for a program of immense importance. It comprises a whole mental and scientific tool kit of great diversity which can be applied to remedy many different problems. With it, we no longer leave to merest chance the discovery of our economic problems and our economic opportunities. Factories, roads, and ports and dams are being built with the support of skills and technique drawn from many countries. We know that at relatively little cost farmers can be taught to grow more rice and healthier cattle and we have set about to do it. We are internationally organized, for the first time, to do these things on a growing scale.

We have also pooled our financial experience. Never before have the nations together accumulated such a mass of expert data and analysis on which to base their international policies relating to economic growth.

Mr. President, the place that economic development holds in the thinking of the present generation represents a new and important departure in social thinking. In the past, the early stages of economic development have, in too many instances, been a rather painful process. The current approach to the problem is based on the idea that economic development should fit in with modern concepts of social betterment, and with an accompanying rise in the standards of living of the general population. It is this concept that underlies the interest of the Government of the United States in the economic development of other countries. It is this concept that underlay President Truman's statement that:

"New economic development must be devised and controlled to benefit the peoples of the areas in which they are established. Guarantees to the investor must be balanced by guarantees in the interest of the people whose resources and whose labor go into these developments."

My Government is of the conviction that a basic step to a smoothly working international order is the improvement of the living conditions of that vast portion of the world's population who have neither adequate food, housing, nor medical care. It is of the conviction, also, that to attain such improvement requires balanced development programs which include the development of factories, power, transportation, and health, as well as modern agricultural development. It is within our capacity, both as a United Nations, and as individual member countries, to help these people help themselves to secure a better life.

This cannot be attained by mere exhortation or the shedding of crocodile tears. If these hundreds of millions of people are to be benefited it will require more than sponsorship by those who boast of their great industrial expansion, boast of the continuous increase in their national income, question the motive of any country that attempts to help these people help themselves to a better life—and then refuse, or, perhaps, conveniently forget to bear any portion of the cost of carrying out such undertakings.

Mr. President, I should like to refer the members of this committee to the record of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics whose distinguished representative has just expressed so great a concern for the welfare of those who are in need of economic development. I submit that if they look at those economic and social activities of the United Nations which were established to benefit mankind they will find a most interesting record. Mr. President, one time a very learned man in this country wrote, "What you do speaks so loudly I cannot hear what you say." I hope the members of this committee will keep that wise saying in mind as they consider that record which will show:

1. The International Children's Emergency Fund: The U. S. S. R. contribution was zero.

2. The Palestine Refugee Organization: The U. S. S. R. contributed nothing.

3. The International Relief Organization: The U. S. S. R. made no contribution.

4. The special account for the expanded program of technical assistance: The U. S. S. R. did not contribute a single red ruble. In fact, it is worthy of note that the U. S. S. R. delegation attempted only yesterday in committee 5 to cut in half the appropriation in the United Nations budget for the technical assistance administration of the United Nations Secretariat.

5. The U. S. S. R. failed to pay its assessments to the World Health Organization, an agency which has contributed so much to the welfare of men, women, and children everywhere.

6. As to the International Bank, which was created to help finance economic development and in whose formation the U. S. S. R.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

participated at Bretton Woods, the U. S. S. R. has not contributed a single cent.

Again, I say to my colleague from the U. S. S. R., "What you do speaks so loudly I cannot hear what you say."

The Economic and Social Council is now engaged in the formulation of a plan to rehabilitate Korea from the ravages of aggression. The combined effort of the United Nations in this venture will furnish practical proof of what collective effort can accomplish in assisting peoples to improve their own conditions of life.

The United States of America believes that the one great objective of the United Nations is lasting peace for all the world.

Today no such condition prevails. There are wars and threats of war. We still have aggression and threats of aggression.

The United Nations was founded on the assumption that there would be genuine disarmament backed by effective measures of control and inspection which would permit governments and peoples to rid themselves of the economic burden of maintaining armaments. This has been blocked by the refusal of a small group of countries to accept such measures.

Because there is no assurance of lasting peace among the nations of the world and because there is as yet no effective system for disarmament, many governments, including my own, feel the absolute necessity of using huge amounts of their resources for defense against aggression. For this purpose the American people have tightened their belts and have voluntarily increased their tax rates. American tax rates now run up to a maximum of 80 percent.

Despite this drain on our economy, my Government will do everything it can during the coming months to expedite the availability for economic development of such materials and equipment that can possibly be spared without seriously interfering with the preparation of the defenses of the free democracies.

Many centuries ago there came to us from the east the voice of a man, simple in his way of life but wise in his teachings. He told of the day when men "shall beat their swords into plowshares and their spears into pruning hooks; nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more."

We in the United States, he said, still cling to the hope given in that prophecy. Above all things we desire peace—world peace—lasting peace, and the world-wide prosperity and progress which that peace will make possible. Prosperity, in turn, will be an assurance of the continuation of peace.

We look to the day when all nations will agree to a plan of universal disarmament with adequate control, inspection, and enforcement. When that happy day comes and we can all take from our shoulders these heavy armament burdens, then we of the United States of America feel that we and many other member nations will be in a position to join in a real widespread program of development, the need for which has been so eloquently stated by so many of the delegates to this General Assembly. We look forward to all freedom-loving democratic countries associating together in applying these resources which they will save through disarming, to the building up of the areas whose need has been so well described to this committee. The sooner certain countries free the world from the fear of aggression the sooner will my country be in a position to fulfill its determination to carry out this great program.

Paraphrasing Isaiah's great prophecy, then we can truly beat our tanks into dynamos and our guns into machines and factories for industrial and economic development throughout the world, for "we shall not have to learn war any more."

In the meantime, Mr. President, it is the intention of my Government to continue to lend its weight through private investment, the Export-Import Bank, the International Bank, the technical-assistance program, and the specialized agencies to the furtherance and expansion of economic development.

The Military Situation in Asia

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 4, 1950

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, permit me to direct the attention of my colleagues to the following two articles which appeared in the New Leader under dates of November 20 and November 27, 1950, in the hope that it will clarify our thinking with reference to the military situation in Asia. The articles follow:

WHY RED CHINA INTERVENED—THE CHINESE COMMUNISTS' ROLE IN THE KOREAN WAR WAS DECIDED UPON LAST FEBRUARY—IN MOSCOW

(By David J. Dallin)

Communist China's intervention in the Korean war is now a fact. Contrary to prevailing opinion, however, the decision to intervene was not made in recent weeks as American forces approached the border of Manchuria. It would be the gravest folly for the United States to base its policy on this assumption.

The long-range plans for the conquest of Korea were actually laid as long ago as January and February 1950. In mid-December, immediately after the creation of the Peiping government, Mao Tse-tung arrived in Moscow accompanied by a large retinue and was shortly joined by his premier, Chou En-lai. The Moscow negotiations, which lasted for 2 months, resulted in one public treaty (a Sino-Soviet alliance ostensibly directed against any revival of Japanese aggression) and a number of secret agreements.

The essentially aggressive character of the Moscow-Peiping combination was apparent from the fact that the Russians were granted continued use of Chinese military bases for another 3 years. The clear implication was that, at the end of that time, Japan would no longer constitute a menace to China. Presumably, either the Japanese Communist Party would emulate its continental Asian brethren and take Japan into the Soviet camp; or military means would have to be applied by the Moscow-Peiping axis—or a combination of both would be required. At all events, the Communist victory in China was obviously regarded not as a decisive event in itself, but rather as an interim stage in a vast campaign which can end only when Japan is forced to join the Asian Cominform.

The first step in the achievement of this goal was the projected conquest of South Korea. By a logical division of assignments, Moscow was to supply the necessary arms and other equipment, while Peiping furnished battle-hardened Korean veterans of the Chinese civil war.

A complicating factor, however, was the possible American reaction. The most likely eventuality appeared to be that Washington would adopt a hands-off policy; in that case, the Korean Communist army would be able to crush its opponents and occupy the entire peninsula without outside help. On the other hand, to guard against a possible American decision to resist the attack, it was necessary to hold 1,000,000 Chinese troops in Manchuria in readiness to be thrown into the breach.

The Moscow conference ended in the middle of February; early in March, the first Korean contingents started to cross into North Korea from Manchuria. A number of prisoners taken by the United Nations forces have confirmed this significant time relation. Others have reported that the invasion of South Korea was originally slated for the last week in April, but had to be postponed for 2 months.

The postponement of the attack until June 25 and most of the difficulties encountered by the Korean and Chinese Communists in the fighting so far are attributable to one characteristic aspect of the far eastern war: the fact that the troops of both Mao and Korean puppet leader Kim Il-sung must be equipped up to 90 percent by the U. S. S. R. This contrasts sharply with the situation of the eastern European satellites, which are able to supply much of their own military matériel and one of which Czechoslavakia, is even superior to the Soviet Union in industrial power.

Although a few arms plants have been hastily erected in Manchuria and Korea, almost everything from bayonets and revolvers to machine guns and tanks has had to be supplied by the senior partner in Moscow. Before the armies could be set in motion, huge stockpiles had to be amassed from supplies shipped either by way of the overloaded trans-Siberian railroad or by the sea route from Odessa and Leningrad all the way around the Asian continent to Vladivostok and Dairen. (The industry of the Soviet Far East is able to supply very little.) To make matters worse, with the Far East rapidly developing into the pivotal area of world politics, considerable quantities of supplies had to be diverted to the Soviet forces in that region, so that they could be prepared for any eventuality. As a result, the preliminary phase of the conquest of Korea proved far more difficult and protracted than anticipated.

Once the drive was launched on June 25, the assumption that America would not weigh decisively in the balance seemed on the way to realization. Although United States troops were ordered into the battle, they were apparently too little and too late to check the invaders and the North Koreans appeared well able to finish the job without Chinese aid.

But then, after two and a half months of retreat and defeat, the UN forces staged the landing at Inchon and the reoccupation of Seoul. This bold stroke resulted in the destruction of 80 percent of the Korean Communist army and the rapid overrunning of most of North Korea. The Chinese Communists were now faced with the alternatives of either fighting on alone or remaining on the sidelines.

A new appraisal of the situation was necessary. Early in October Moscow decided against moving for a peaceful solution. The first indication that the war was to continue came on October 12, with the publication in large print in Moscow newspapers of an exchange of messages between Stalin and Kim Il-sung. Kim expressed the gratitude of the Korean people for the Soviet help, to which Stalin replied: "I wish the Korean people, which is heroically defending the independence of its country, a successful completion of its protracted struggle for a united, independent, democratic Korea." The Soviet dictator would never have jeopardized his personal prestige by sending congratulations to a doomed satellite regime. His telegram clearly signified that new forces were to be thrown into the Korean conflict.

The very next day Kim promised the Korean people that "decisive blows will be dealt the enemy" and "the armed interventionists as well as their servants will be destroyed on our soil." He called on the people and army "to defend to the last every inch of our soil."

Within another fortnight considerable Chinese Communist forces were across the border and taking part in the fighting. Despite some initial successes, however, the position of these Chinese troops is essentially a precarious one. With the Korean Army nearly gone, Chinese cities wide open to aerial bombardment, and arms and equipment still arriving at a slow rate, China has no chance of winning a war against the United States in Korea. The dilemma that faces the Kremlin is, therefore, quite simple: unless the Soviet Union enters the war directly the Chinese will be badly beaten.

This is the real meaning of the confusion that has reigned in the Korean war theater since the first engagements between Chinese and United Nations troops. If Stalin does not intervene directly and in force, the Chinese are doomed to defeat, whether they commit 100,000 troops or 500,000. The United States will have the support of a sizable Chinese Nationalist Army from Formosa as well as the other UN forces; American aviation will continue to control the skies, and UN ground forces will have the advantage of superior arms.

Although they may inflict heavy losses on our armies, the defeat of the Chinese Communists will be an even greater disaster for the Communist cause than the North Korean debacle. It will shatter the Stalin-Mao alliance and imperil the key Sino-Soviet stronghold of Manchuria. Furthermore, the conquest of Japan, the No. 1 objective of Communist policy in the Orient at the present time, will recede into the realm of idle fancy.

This situation can be retrieved only by Russian entry into the far-eastern war as a full-fledged participant. And that would mean world war III.

STALIN ALSO HAS TO MAKE THE CHOICE: ASIA OR EUROPE?—WHICH THEATER OF OPERATIONS WILL PAY OFF BEST? THE QUESTION IS KEEPING KREMLIN LIGHTS BURNING

(By David J. Dallin)

The recent elections constituted a clear popular mandate to Congress to pay more attention henceforth to the Far East and to correct the grave mistakes of recent years in America's Asian policy. This national decision was an exceedingly wise one—wiser, in fact, than the average voter realized.

The same issue that confronts the Government and people of the United States—East or West, Asia or Europe?—exists as well for the Kremlin, just as it did for the Tsars whenever they were seized by the itch to move across established frontiers and expand into foreign lands. Of course, Stalin has never recognized any intrinsic necessity for making this choice; up to 1948 he was advancing simultaneously in Europe and in Asia. In the last 2 years, however, fundamental developments have taken place.

In Europe, Stalin has found himself forced to retreat in Berlin and Greece, and to acquiesce in the emergence of an independent Communist regime in Yugoslavia. In Asia, on the other hand, a series of signal triumphs have carried Soviet influence deep into China, Malaya, Burma, and Indochina. Logically, therefore, the Far East is today a more attractive locale than Europe for a Communist offensive.

At present, Stalin's forces in Europe are lying in ambush—an ambush from which they may spring at any moment, depending on the vigor with which the west rearms. In Asia, however, they are already attacking with constantly mounting intensity. The United States Government long failed to recognize the symptoms in this shift of emphasis. Now the grave events in Korea have driven home the shortcomings of past American policy and sharply outlined our future course.

The Korean Communists, fighting alone, have suffered defeat and been forced to call upon a stronger ally. Communist China will meet the same fate at the hands of the United Nations forces, and it, too, will have to cry for help. At this juncture, will the Soviet Union acknowledge the defeat of communism in Asia, with all that implies? Or will it stake all on a mighty gamble and launch the third world war? Or, alternatively—and this is more in keeping with Stalin's personality and the tactics of Stalinism—will it try to operate with "volunteers" for whose actions Moscow will disclaim any direct responsibility?

If the decision is for war, the question will arise once again: East or west, Asia or Europe? Even in an open war, with every frontier ablaze, it will be impossible for the belligerents to conduct operations with equal intensity in every part of the world. Great strategic decisions will be necessary as to which theater shall receive top priority. What blueprints are lying in General Staff headquarters in Moscow no one can say. However, it is by no means too soon—if anything, it is late in the day—for this country to train its sights upon the issues which may assume a tragic immediacy in the not-too-distant future.

Within the larger framework of the U. S. S. R., the Soviet Far East has its own special strengths and weaknesses. Primary among the latter—and most obvious—is the enormous distance separating the eastern region from Russia's European heart. With the outbreak of war, the Siberian and Manchurian railroads will be disrupted by enemy aviation, and sea transport will be made impossible. The only means of communication remaining between Moscow and the eastern war theater will be an ineffectual airlift. Thus, to all intents and purposes, the Soviet far east will be isolated and obliged to wage war chiefly with its own resources.

Alerted to these difficulties by the border conflicts with Japan in the 1930's, the Kremlin has sought to develop the east at a furious pace. New cities sprang up, new industries were created, and the population was increased through compulsory migration. An army, at times estimated at almost a million men, was stationed in the region, with large stores of war material. Nevertheless, in time of war enemy aviation, striking from Japanese bases, will be able to wreak swift destruction upon Russia's only four major cities in the Far East, together with their industries. Soviet air power will retaliate with raids on Japan, but this will not alter the outcome of a war in which Japan will necessarily play only a minor role.

On the credit side, the Soviet Far East possesses one great advantage: If Moscow decides on direct intervention, more than enough troops will be available to eject all the western forces now in Korea. Against 200,000 UN troops, the Soviet-Chinese-Korean Axis will be able to throw in a million, of which half will be well-equipped Russians. The victory, to be sure, will be only a temporary, inconclusive one. But even the lure of a temporary triumph, of humiliating the American "imperialist invaders" and hurling them into the sea, will be tremendously tempting to Stalin and his Asian satraps.

In analyzing the possibility of a Soviet attack in Asia, an additional factor must also be taken into account: the traditional attitude of the Russian people toward far eastern questions.

To the Russians, the Far East has always been a remote, little-known region. Although for 60 years a goal of Russian imperialist expansion, neither Korea nor Manchuria has ever aroused particularly warm feelings among the people or any spontaneous longing for their annexation.

Fifty-five years ago, Russia fought a war against Japan, in which Korea and Manchuria were the stakes. No war in Russia's history ever evoked less patriotic enthusiasm. Defeatism was rampant not only among the left-wing parties but even in circles close to the Government; the people at large were indifferent. The war finally ended in a Russian defeat and had as a direct consequence the emergence of a powerful revolutionary movement which ultimately overturned the Czarist regime.

Much the same thing occurred when the Soviet Union joined the Allied war against Japan in August 1945. In marked contrast to the patriotic fever that had gripped it in the last 2 years of the war with Germany, the Russian people greeted the intervention against Japan with notable coolness. The army obeyed orders, of course, but who can tell what might have happened had Japan not surrendered a scant 6 days after Moscow's declaration of war?

The outbreak of war in Europe means, almost automatically, a major role for Germany, with all that implies. Like most people in Western Europe, millions of Russians view with apprehension any revival of German military might. Poignant memories of recent date make anti-German feeling still a significant psychological factor, whereas anti-Japanese sentiment hardly exists.

To the extent that the outcome of a future war depends on the mood of the Russian people, the Far East is clearly the least favorable theater of war for the Soviet government. The average Russian will not respond to appeals and slogans centering upon Korea and Manchuria, and the inevitable military set-backs might well have dire consequences.

The part of wisdom from the Kremlin's point of view is to swallow its humiliation in Korea with the best possible grace and thereby cut its losses. Should it decide instead to risk all in order to restore the luster to its fading prestige, however, a chain reaction may well result whose last link will spell disaster for the Soviet dictatorship.

A Tax Program To Support the Policy of Containment

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS E. MARTIN

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 5, 1950

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I agree with the present national administration on the drastic need for additional revenue to meet our preparedness program without forcing us to resort to fantastic deficit financing, but the need for revenue extends far beyond the prospective yield from present revenue laws and the proposed excess-profits tax. I was terribly disappointed when the hearings started on November 15 to learn that the majority side of the Committee on Ways and Means refused to accept testimony of witnesses who had prepared outstanding articles covering the whole field of potential revenue. Many of these statements are deserving of careful study by every Member of Congress, but they do not appear even in the appendix of the hearings to help us maintain a comprehensive view of the tax field while we have this bill before us.

One of the best statements presented to the committee but the admission of which was refused by the committee, was offered by Dr. Arthur Smithies, professor of economics, Harvard University, Cambridge, Mass., appearing for a group of faculty members from Harvard business school, law school, and the department of economics. I am including this study in my remarks so that each Member of Congress can read it. It follows:

A TAX PROGRAM TO SUPPORT THE POLICY OF CONTAINMENT

THE OBJECTIVES OF TAX POLICY

The success of United States foreign and military policy will depend heavily upon the willingness and ability of the people of this country to sustain the program over a long period of time, should that be necessary. In Mr. Harriman's vivid metaphor, this is not a sprint but a 4-mile race. In comparison, preparation for the last war can be regarded as a sprint, and the economic measures that carried the country through it will not necessarily be appropriate at the present time. In particular, for a sustained effort we cannot hope to rely as heavily as we did then on a comprehensive system of direct controls to secure the resources necessary for the defense program and at the same time avoid inflation. Although the control system during the last war worked better than many had expected, we feel reasonably confident that, had it been continued much longer, the United States economy would have been exposed to the well-known weaknesses of a policy of suppressed inflation.

This time, we must rely much more heavily than before on tax policy and credit policy; direct controls must be applied on a strictly selective basis and must not be permitted to grow into a general control system through lack of an adequate financial policy. In order to avoid the need for undue reliance on direct controls, every effort should be made to approach as nearly as possible a balanced budget during the current emergency.

We are assuming that the total expenditures of the Federal Government, despite all feasible reductions in nonmilitary expenditures, will amount to about 25 percent of the national product. Such an estimate is obviously subject to constant readjustment in the light of rapidly changing circumstances, and we are of course aware that the tax program outlined below will have to be revised to take account of these changes. But even now we are faced with an inflationary situation despite the fact that very little of the planned additions to defense expenditures has already been made and that the Federal budget is currently substantially balanced on a cash basis. Consequently, with the certainty of rapidly rising defense expenditures and large Federal deficits in the near future, we favor early action to gear the tax objectives of the Nation to the requirements of an economy in which the Federal Government will absorb about 25 percent of the national product. In view of the inflationary pressures already existing and the length of time required to put large tax increases into effect, we believe that the following tax proposals should be enacted as rapidly as the legislative process will permit. With all factors taken into account, the risk of passing unduly prompt and severe tax increases seems much less than that of following a policy of "too little and too late."

In this memorandum we deal only with tax policy, but we must emphasize that a tax program alone, however well-conceived and however severe is not enough. An easy credit policy, for instance, can offset many of the beneficial effects of the tax program; and if powerful organized groups—in agriculture, business, and labor—refuse to accept the view that they must deny themselves gains that may be within their reach, and must accept sacrifices in the national interest, a tax program will be fruitless.

Although the tax program must be severe, it is more likely to deprive the American people of the gains in consumption standards they might have enjoyed rather than to impose sharp reductions in living standards. Provided the economy can expand at the rate it has sustained over the past few years, a defense program of the size we assume may be expected to permit a steady increase in consumption standards. On the other hand, if productivity does not increase, mounting pressure for higher consumption standards in the various sectors of the economy is likely to endanger the defense program itself.

As we have indicated, the tax measures that are adopted now should not be devised as short-term emergency expedients, but should provide a basis for the tax structure of the indefinite future. It is therefore essential that the tax structure as a whole should conform to our standards of fairness as among various classes of taxpayers, should be effective in controlling inflation, and should preserve in so far as possible, the incentives to both labor and management to work hard and maintain maximum efficiency.

I. THE CORPORATION INCOME TAX AND EXCESS PROFITS TAX

The above objectives require that at least $5,000,000,000 of additional tax revenues, beyond those provided by the Revenue Act of 1950, be raised from increased taxes on corporate profits. Such an increase would bring the effective tax rate on aggregate corporate profits to a substantially higher level than at any time during World War II. And even with profits before taxes one-third higher than such profits from 1947–49, this higher effective tax rate would leave net profits after taxes somewhat lower than the average net profits after taxes in this recent period. Increases of this severity are nevertheless necessary if corporations and stockholders are to bear their share of the burden of increased defense expenditures.

An additional $5,000,000,000 to $6,000,000,000 could be obtained by raising the present corporate income tax rate from 45 percent to 60 percent or by levying an excess profits tax designed to yield the same amount of net additional revenue. As between these alternatives we believe that: the income tax rate on corporate earnings in excess of $25,000 should be increased from 45 percent to 60 percent.

This recommendation stems from our conviction that an excess profits tax would have more serious disadvantages, if adopted for an indefinite period in a semimobilized economy, than would an increase in the corporate income tax. The most important disadvantage of an excess profits tax is that it would inevitably place a greater penalty on new businesses and growing businesses than on their entrenched competitors and on expanding industries as compared with declining industries. Also, efficiency would be penalized and inefficiency, in effect, subsidized.

Under an excess profits tax new and growing businesses typically would have relatively low base period earnings, or none at all, and frequently would possess only small amounts of invested capital. Consequently, most of their earnings would be subject to the excess-profits-tax rates. In contrast, established companies, most of which have had large earnings in the years 1947–49, and many of which are heavily capitalized and hence would be eligible for a large invested capital credit, would be exempt from the excess profits tax on a sizable fraction of their earnings. Thus an excess profits tax inevitably tends to strengthen entrenched corporations by placing what amounts to a freeze on the economy and, even more seriously, to restrict severely the vitalizing contributions of new and growing businesses to the economy. These defects of an excess profits tax obviously are far more serious in their implications in a semimobilized economy for an indefinite period than in a relatively brief all-out war.

The second major disadvantage of a high excess profits tax is that it encourages waste and extravagance. The extent to which padded expense accounts, wasteful production methods, inflated cost structures, and other unnecessary expenditures were stimulated by the 85 percent rate of World War II, is too well known to require comment. These effects, too, would be potentially much more serious in a long-continued period of semimobilization than in an all-out war; the restraining influence of intense patriotic zeal and rigid controls would offer less protection now than under more extreme conditions.

In deciding whether an excess-profits tax would constitute sound policy now, as it did in World War II, differences other than the duration of the emergency need to be noted. In general terms, a strong case can be made for an excess-profits tax only if a reasonably clear and equitable distinction can be drawn between excess profits and normal profits. Such a distinction, difficult at best, would be essentially impossible to make in an equitable manner under current circumstances. The earnings of many companies in the years 1947–49, for example, would not serve as a reliable basis for the distinction because they were swollen by deferred consumer demands and were otherwise distorted by the inflationary aftermath of the last war. Similarly, the numerous difficulties and highly arbitrary character of definitions of invested capital makes reliance on this approach at least as erratic and unfair as the use of 1947–49 earnings as a means of distinguishing between normal and excess profits.

For all these reasons, plus the very difficult administrative problems posed by an excess-profits tax, we prefer straightforward increases in the corporate income tax to an excess-profits tax. To avoid any misunderstanding, this preference has nothing to do with the amount of additional taxes which should be raised at this time from corporations, but simply with the way in which the increase should be allocated among corporations.

Despite our opposition to an excess-profits tax, we recognize that unjustified profits will be made both on Government contracts and on private transactions in the process of transition to a semimobilized economy. We sympathize with the objectives of those who wish to tax away a large part of these profits through an excess-profits tax. We believe, however, that unreasonable profits on Government contracts can best be handled by direct renegotiation of these contracts, similar to the World War II procedure. As for the remaining unjustified profits, our frank opinion is that it will be better to live with those that will not be removed by a 60-percent income tax than to attempt to deal with them by means of an excess-profits tax. When the practical problems of attempting to devise such a tax are examined, we believe it becomes clear that the tax would be indiscriminate in its impact and would not effectively single out unjustified and undesirable profits for special taxation. On the contrary, its most severe impact, as we have already pointed out, would be on the profits of new businesses and of growing businesses—generally speaking, the most socially desirable type of profits.

If, nevertheless, an excess-profits tax is deemed necessary, we believe it should be limited in duration to the build-up phase of the current military expansion and that it should be carefully designed to minimize the adverse effects which we have noted. In this connection, it is important that:

1. The excess-profits-tax rate should not be so high as to destroy incentives to efficient operations. If necessary, we should prefer to have the excess-profits tax cut into pre-emergency earnings rather than to have a very high tax rate imposed. In general, the difference between the income-tax rate and the excess-profits tax rate should be as small as feasible.

2. The taxpayer should be given the option between an invested capital credit and a base-period earnings credit. The arbitrary character of both of these credits is so great under present circumstances that unreasonable hardships would be imposed if either were applied separately.

3. Corporations should be permitted to retain sufficient earnings to be able to provide for the needed development of the economy. This objective can best be achieved by enacting a ceiling provision similar in construction to that of World War II. Such a provision would be of little or no value to the large, entrenched companies but it would be of great help to new businesses and relatively small, rapidly growing enterprises. A ceiling provision limiting the maximum effective rate of the combined excess-profits and corporate-income taxes on the taxpayer's total net income to say, 65 percent, would also eliminate to a large degree the need for detailed relief of provisions and would avoid the essentially insoluble administrative problems posed by such provisions as sections 721 and 722 of the World War II tax.

II. THE INDIVIDUAL INCOME TAX

The rates of the individual income tax should be increased to their World War II levels, or slightly higher, but exemptions should not be lowered and the split income provision should be retained. An additional credit should be provided to ease the impact of these rate increases on unmarried individuals with dependents since these individuals do not benefit from the "split income" provision.

In view of the central place which the individual income tax should occupy in a well-designed tax structure, we recommend that these tax rates be increased to at least their World War II levels. The beginning rate might, in fact be raised to, say, 25 percent rather than to the wartime level of 23 percent. In this event, commensurate increases should be made in the other income-tax brackets. In a long-continued period short of total war, the widespread desire for steeply progressive individual income taxes must be balanced against the adverse incentive effects of high income tax rates. At all income levels it is important to preserve insofar as possible the mobility of labor, the incentive to work hard, and the willingness of investors to provide risk capital. To the extent that take-home pay and net income after taxes are reduced by heavy income taxes, these incentives are weakened.

We do not recommend a reduction in exemptions since, after allowing for the change in the purchasing power of the dollar, the existing exemption of $600 is lower in real terms than was the wartime exemption of $500. By the same token, however, the wartime rate structure, which is fixed in dollars and not adjusted for changes in the value of the dollar, is steeper now than during the war. This fact needs to be borne in mind in appraising the extent to which individual income-tax rates can be increased without impairing incentives.

We believe that the split-income provision, especially if it were to be supplemented by a larger credit for unmarried heads of families, provides a fairer allocation of the tax burden among taxpayers than would any feasible alternative. Consequently, we recommend that this provision be retained and be so supplemented.

Given the anticipated level of Federal expenditures, these increases in the corporate and personal-income taxes, severe though they are, will not yield more than about half the additional revenue needed to approach a balanced budget and to hold the inflationary pressures within reasonable bounds. Short of total war, however, we believe that the increases in the corporate and personal income taxes which we have recommended are about as severe as are consistent with the long-run welfare of the economy. Consequently we face the necessity of recommending that additional revenue be raised from other sources.

III. EXCISE TAXES

(a) Excise taxes that are fixed in dollars, notably those on liquor and tobacco should be substantially increased.

These taxes have remained fixed since 1942 during a period when the general price level has greatly increased; and other excise taxes that are levied on an ad valorem basis have increased correspondingly in dollar amounts. With the greatly increased need for revenue, we therefore feel that it is fair to make substantial increases in the taxes on these commodities.

(b) Heavy manufacturers' excise taxes should be levied on consumers' goods produced by those industries that are major users of the major commodities that will be in short supply as a result of the defense program. Such products include passenger automobiles, household appliances, radio equipment, rubber products, etc. These taxes would take the place of all existing excise taxes on such commodities.

We believe that such taxes constitute one of the most important features of an adequate program. They would be especially effective in removing illegitimate profits arising from the scarcities created by the defense program. On the basis of experience since the war, we may suppose that manufacturers of these commodities will charge far less than the market will bear. This leaves the way open for the gray marketeer, and neither persuasion nor compulsion can close it effectively. Excise taxes go to the root of the trouble by reducing the potential profits from the gray market.

While these taxes would also have to be paid by those consumers who deal in the regular markets, they would apply to durable goods whose purchase can be deferred. Consumers could, in effect, save at least part of the tax by making more intensive use of their existing equipment. Or they could divert their funds to purchases of goods that are not in short supply or to savings. In either event the tax will serve its purpose of relieving pressure on the critical items. In fact, one of the more important advantages of this tax would be that it might avoid the need for allocation controls in some instances. And even where those controls could not be avoided the tax would reduce the pressure on the control system.

(c) Existing ad valorem taxes on other commodities should be increased in line with the excise tax structure that emerges from the foregoing recommendations. However, no change should be made in the present transportation tax.

In our view certain luxury taxes should be increased at the present time. Our opposition to an increase in the transportation tax stems from our belief that the productivity of the country depends heavily on relatively cheap transportation, especially at a time when large shifts in the location of productive resources may be necessary.

IV. ELIMINATION OF MAJOR LOOPHOLES REMAINING IN THE TAX STRUCTURE

In view of the urgent need for increased revenues over a considerable period of time and for a fair distribution of the increased tax burden, we should undertake promptly the task of eliminating the major existing loopholes in the tax structure. We therefore favor measures such as the full taxation of future issues of presently tax-exempt securities; gradual reduction in the excessive allowances now granted through percentage depletion; removal of the present opportunities of avoiding income tax by accumulation of large capital sums of life insurance, and of avoiding the impact of the estate tax through such measures as the use of life interests. The capital gains tax structure should be generally reviewed in the light of the above proposals for general tax increases, and the estate and gift tax structures should also be examined.

V. GENERAL SALES TAX

Further tax revenues that are needed to finance the defense program should be obtained by levying a tax on retail sales.

The measures here recommended, other than the sales tax, can be expected to yield some twelve or thirteen billions of dollars at the 1950 income level. Despite the recent tax increases of four or five billions of dollars provided by the 1950 act, several more billions are likely to be required. We do not believe these billions can safely be raised from existing sources of taxation. We therefore see no alternative to a new tax on a broad base.

A Federal tax on retail sales appears to be the most feasible addition to our existing tax structure. Under present circumstances a sales tax would have significant advantages which at least partially offset the regressive characteristics of the tax. It is, for example, much less subject to evasion by such groups as farmers, small businessmen, and professional people whose income is often not completely reported. The importance of this evasion problem is of course accentuated as income tax rates are increased. The income of some classes of income recipients, mainly labor and white-collar workers, under withholding procedures is fully subjected to the income tax while that of the above groups often escapes the full income tax under the self-assessed system.

A sales tax also would have less restrictive incentive effects than further increases in the income tax and would, to some degree, tend to stimulate saving. Moreover, if food, rent, and perhaps some other necessities were exempted from the sales tax, the most burdensome regressive features of the tax would be substantially mitigated. In our opinion, such a sales tax would be preferable to a reduction in the exemptions of the individual income tax.

These considerations are not advanced to indicate that a sales tax is positively desirable but rather that—after large increases have been made in all other major sources of revenue—it may well be the least undesirable source of raising the further needed revenues.

An alternative to a sales tax would be a flat-rate tax on disposable incomes, i. e., on incomes after deducting the regular income tax. However, as we have noted, the sales tax leaves less room for evasion than the income tax and exempts savings from taxation. Individuals can help finance the defense program by increasing their saving as well as by paying additional taxes.

In conclusion, we realize that the tax system we propose is more severe than any in our history; but we are in a better position to bear it than ever before and the alternatives to it are inflation, a fully controlled economy, or dangerous curtailment of the defense program.

What Can We Do?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CECIL M. HARDEN
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, December 5, 1950

Mrs. HARDEN. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I submit the following editorial which appeared in the November 29 edition of the Daily Clintonian, edited and published by George Carey, of Clinton, Ind. The editorial follows:

WHAT CAN WE DO?

Rome was complacent when the barbarians began nibbling at the outposts of her far-flung empire. It was business as usual in Rome, the usual waste and inefficiency in government, the usual corruption in high places, the usual bread and circuses for the masses of the people who had been taught to look to the government for a living and to shun work as fit only for whatever the Latin word for suckers may have been.

There was nothing to worry about, for was not Rome the master of the world? Had not the Roman army set an all-time record for consecutive victories? Were not Roman arms and brains and resources superior to any in the world? What were a few low-browed, mongoloid barbarians to worry about, anyway?

There was nothing to worry about when the outlying provinces were lost, for Rome had too much territory anyway. A sort of hysterical frenzy of pleasure-seeking swept Rome. Never had the country been gayer, the parties wilder, the government more inefficient or the spending freer.

Nothing was going to happen to Rome for Rome was the greatest country in the world. Rome refused to wake up; it tried to buy peace and then it was too late. The barbarians moved in and the iron curtain of the dark ages settled over the splendor that the civilized world had known for a thousand years.

Historians see an ominous parallel between the events of the declining days of the Roman empire and the situation in which this Nation finds itself today. It is no use to point them out, for they speak for themselves.

There is no use to delude ourselves any longer. This Nation is at the crossroads. Only by strong and immediate action can it hope to stay the forces pushing our civilization into another dark age.

We dare not vacillate and wander any longer in our foreign policy. We dare not continue on a day-to-day basis in our world associations. We must decide where we are going and get started.

Russia knows exactly where she is headed. Unhampered by such capitalistic handicaps as truths, honor, and decency, she has embarked on a program of world domination using every device that atheistic brutality combined with oriental cunning can encompass. She recognizes no rules; she refuses to live by any. We must recognize this.

Today this Nation is playing Russia's game by bleeding itself white in blood and dollars fighting a war of Russia's planning to save a decadent race from a fate they seem to ardently desire. We are living up to rules Russia scorns; recognizing a border that to her is nonexistent.

The pattern is all too plain. Russia will fight us in Korea to the last Korean, then to the last Chinaman, then to the last Russian if necessary. The pattern is set. Any fool can see it and we are fools if we fail to see it.

Yes, we in America love peace. We will do anything for peace. Will we commit national suicide in the vain pursuit of peace? It is later than you think.

Will we go merrily to hell as Rome went or will we finally wake up and fight with the desperation of men facing doom.

What can we do? We can—

1. Notify Red China that, unless her "volunteers" are recalled from Korea within 24 hours we shall consider that a state of war exists and that our first act will be the atomic bombing of her largest cities.

2. Notify Russia of our action and inform her that we shall consider the appearance of the first Russian "volunteer" or advisor inside China as a declaration of war calling for the atomic bombing of Moscow and Leningrad.

3. Notify our "allies" in the United Nations that we do not consider votes of confidence, a willingness to accept our money and the sending of a few small vessels to cruise in Korean waters as sufficient aid in the first united effort to enforce peace on earth.

4. Notify the member nations of the United Nations that unless they immediately proceed to give all-out aid to the Korean war in soldiers, aircraft, guns, and their own carefully guarded treasure, we shall withdraw our armies not only from Korea but from Europe as well.

We can inform the world that we love peace but not at the expense of trying to save a world too decadent to save. We can make one more supreme effort to save those who seemingly will not save themselves, then we can, if necessary, withdraw within our own shores and prepare for the coming onslaught without first having exhausted our blood and gold by cooperating with Russia's plans as if they were our own.

Of course Russia will use the atomic bomb on New York and Chicago if she decides it is worth more than having Moscow bombed. Of course we shall find ourselves in the most terrible war in history if Russia wants to go to war. Of course we may suffer defeat in the end and wind up dead or slaves of an oriental despotism that is heir to the ideals of Genkhis Khan. But by taking the decisive stand now, and by this means only, do we have a chance to escape with our civilization intact. Any other course is suicide.

We have tried cooperation; we have tried reason; we have tried to buy peace; we have tried appeasement. Everything has failed except calling the Russian bluff. We must accept the supreme gamble or the barbarians will soon be at the gates of Rome.

Address of Charles H. Silver

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FREDERIC R. COUDERT, JR.
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, December 5, 1950

Mr. COUDERT. Mr. Speaker, the Alfred E. Smith Memorial Foundation dinner, of which His Eminence Francis Cardinal Spellman was chairman, was held in New York City at the Waldorf Astoria Hotel on October 19, 1950. The opening address on that momentous occasion was delivered by one of New York's distinguished sons, Charles H. Silver. Under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I wish to include Mr. Silver's address. Mr. Silver's address follows:

My friends, we are gathered here this evening to pay our annual tribute to one of the most beloved Americans of our time. Our dinner this year takes on unusual significance. It is being held at a time when the freedom of men is threatened by the dark forces of those states which would engulf all mankind.

Yet we need not despair. We honor the memory of a man who poured out his very life and fine abilities for the men, women, and children of a great democracy. And tonight we know that on the blood-soaked battlefields of Korea, together with our sister democracies in the United Nations, we are driving back the cruel Red hordes and saying to them in effect: "We shall not permit you to pierce the heart of democracy with the poisoned spear of your godless philosophy."

What are we fighting to preserve? Is it an economic theory, a system of government, a way of living, human dignity? I would say that it was all of these and even more; but above all we are engaged in a struggle to preserve the freedom of the individual and to keep him from being thrown into a pit of terror and slavery.

Millions of words have been written on communism and the misery and bloodshed which it has already caused in various parts of the world. Commentators in the press and on the radio, not only in this country but in other democratic nations, have described with great clarity and intelligence the aims and objectives of communism. That is all to the good.

But it seems to me, my friends, that the reason for our dislike of communism has been compressed in a few simple and stirring words by one who gave his life for democracy.

He understood thoroughly what we are fighting for and he spoke his mind, not to a large audience or through the medium of a newspaper, but in a poignant and eloquent letter which he wrote to his two little daughters in Philadelphia. He was Pvt. John J. McCormick and his letter came from Korea. It reached Mary McCormick, his wife, 3 days after a telegram from the Defense Department advised her that he had been killed in action on August 10. This is what he said in his heartbreaking letter which Mrs. McCormick read to the little girls:

"I want you both to know that I would be with you if I could; but there are a lot of bad men in the world and if they were allowed to do what they wanted to do, little girls like you wouldn't be allowed to go to church on Sunday or be able to go to the school you wanted to.

"So I have to help fight these men to keep them from coming where you and I live. It might take a long while and Daddy will have to go to help God in Heaven, and if I do I always want you to be good to Mummie because she is the best Mummie in the whole world."

My friends, there you have the answer. It is the answer, I imagine, that Al Smith would have given, that Lincoln would have given that every American leader and statesman would have given. And if you are asked what we are doing in Korea or in any other part of the world where freedom is being threatened just quote the words of that young man who gave his life for democracy. None can give a better answer, none can speak with greater sincerity. In that final letter to his children this young man told with simple honesty and conviction what is meant by the American way of life; and his words came from his heart.

And so in opening the proceedings at this dinner, I should like to leave with you one other thought before presenting the distinguished and eloquent speakers from whom we are to hear presently.

We who are gathered in this great banquet hall, men and women in all walks, of all faiths and creeds, are united, I am sure, in our loyalty to our country. Loyalty was one of the strong qualities of Al Smith—loyalty to America and its institutions and his friends. We are blessed with great natural resources; our standard of life is of the highest in all the world; we have food and clothing in great abundance.

We who cannot actively participate in the military phases of our defense program must accept the challenge that faces us in the area of moral and financial support. We know that we have no alternative but to be prepared to meet any threat that may be hurled against us. Building an adequate armed defense will call for heavy financial burdens on us. Each of us will have to pay his share.

I have heard some speak of sacrifices. But have we a right to use the word "sacrifice"? What we are asked to give are mere dollars and cents; how puny, how insignificant that is compared with what that young man who wrote to his children and the thousands like him that have given their last measure of devotion to the sacred cause of liberty. It is they who are making the sacrifices—the supreme sacrifices—with their bodies and their souls; it is they who carry the torch of freedom on the field of battle; it is they who have died and shall die so that democracy may remain on the face of the earth.

As I said a few moments ago our dinner has unusual significance because of the world situation this year. It is significant for another and very important reason. We have opened the Alfred E. Smith Memorial Wing to St. Vincent's Hospital, an institution sponsored by Catholics whose doors are always open to the sick and ailing and helpless of the Protestant and Jewish faiths.

That is also one of the symbols of democracy. There are no barriers of race or creed in our beloved country; those who seek aid in St. Vincent's Hospital are not asked to what political party they belong or in what church they worship.

Democracy in this country and indeed through many parts of the world is now on the march. The path which it travels can have no turning. It leads straight to human decency and love of fellow men. We Americans will not falter for we know in our hearts that democracy will live so long as men cherish the ideals of our founding fathers; Communists and communism have challenged us and we have given our answer. They cannot mistake it.

And when the forces of democracy have triumphed we shall stretch out our hands in friendly greeting to the peoples throughout the world who have thrown off the yoke of their masters. We shall not speak of military victories nor will we gloat over our triumph. For it will be a victory of truth and justice; instead of being written in letters of blood it will be written in lofty and inspiring words and phrases from the hearts and minds of peace-loving men.

Land Reform and Farm Development

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LISTER HILL

OF ALABAMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, December 5 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, on October 31, 1950, my colleague the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN], United States delegate to the Assembly of the United Nations, made an address in Committee No. 2 regarding United States proposals for land reform and farm development. It is a most excellent address, one which received much favorable comment throughout the country, and I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Chairman, first, speaking for the United States of American delegation, let me express our great pleasure in the interest that has been manifested in this whole subject as indicated by the original resolution and by the various amendments that have been presented by the respective delegations.

Land reform is a matter in which the United States of America has long been interested as has been demonstrated by the programs that it has initiated within our own boundaries.

In one of the opening speeches of the General Assembly, our Secretary of State, Mr. Dean Acheson, made this statement, which I should like to quote: "As an example of the kind of need to which we must put our efforts, I would like to speak of the problem of the use and ownership of land, a source of misery and suffering to millions. In many parts of the world, especially in Asia, nations have been seeking to achieve a better distribution of land ownership. Leaders in India and Pakistan, for example, are keenly aware of this problem and are taking steps to deal with it effectively. In Japan, as the result of land reform programs, 3,000,000 farmers—well over half of all the farmers in Japan—have acquired land. In the Republic of Korea, where previously there had been twice as many tenants as owners of land, a redistribution of farmlands had, by the time of the invasion, changed this ratio so that those who owned land outnumbered those who held their land in tenancy. Plans scheduled for this summer would have made farm owners of 90 percent of the farm families."

Still later, President Truman in his speech at San Francisco called attention to this same problem and stated in his speech as follows: "We know that the peoples have problems of social injustice to solve. They want their farmers to own their lands and enjoy the fruits of their toil. That is one of great national principles. We believe in the family-sized farm. That is the basis of our agriculture and has strongly influenced our form of government."

More recently, a member of our delegation, speaking before Committee 4 of this General Assembly regarding land problems in trust territories called attention to this same problem and emphasized our desire to see an adequate program of land reform worked out. I should like to quote briefly from the statement made by the Honorable John Sherman Cooper, a member of our delegation, formerly a member of the United States Senate: "Control of soil erosion, proper methods of soil conservation, water control, improved seeds and tools, the the use of modern techniques to halt the depletion of soils, the establishment when feasible of forestry reserves, are practical and reasonably speedy measures to make the land fruitful in production and able to satisfy the needs of the inhabitants."

I make those quotations in order to show that this matter of land reform is not a matter of new thought with the Government of the United States and with the people of the United States.

I should like to make just one other quotation from the recently released recommendation made by Daniel W. Bell, with reference to the economy of the Philippines as set out in the New York Times of Sunday, October 29. I should like to quote just one paragraph from that report dealing with this land problem and the agricultural problem generally in the Philippines: "That agricultural production be improved by applying known methods of increasing the yield from all basic crops; that the Department of Agriculture and Natural Resources be adequately supplied with funds and the Agricultural Extension Service be expanded; that the Agricultural College at Los Banos be rehabilitated and the central experiment station located there, with other stations at appropriate places throughout the country; that rural banks be established to provide production credit for small farmers; that the opening of new lands for settlement and homesteads be expedited and the clearance of land titles promptly assured; that a program of land redistribution be undertaken through the purchase of large estates for resale to small farmers and that measures be undertaken to provide tenants with reasonable security on their land and an equitable share of the crops they produce."

Mr. Chairman, when this resolution was first presented to this committee, the United States delegation proposed certain recommendations, certain amendments. Those amendments are included in the draft proposal that is before us. I should like to call your attention to them individually.

First, we ask that a study be made in cooperation with the Food and Agriculture Organization. We ask that the report not be required for the thirteenth session of the council, but that it be made at the fourteenth session instead. We simply feel that there is not adequate time for a worthwhile study and report to be made by the time the thirtenth session will be held, but that an adequate study could be made and a very worth while report be given by the time of the fourteenth session.

Then we propose some amendments to the substance of the resolution by adding in subparagraph (b) the words "and to promote rural cooperatives for the benefit of the small farmers."

In subparagraph (c) to add the words "and the development of small-scale indigenous enterprises for the processing of agricultural products."

In subparagraph (e) by adding at the beginning of it "the promotion of family owned and operated farms and of * * *."

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to make a few remarks about each of those amendments going to the substance of this proposal. And again, Mr. Chairman, I want to draw rather heavily upon the experience that we have had in the United States of America relating to the very things that we are seeking to bring out in this proposal.

First, let me take up our proposal to promote rural cooperatives for the benefit of small farmers.

Mr. Chairman, I can speak with a degree of experience and self-interest on this matter because it happens that I myself am a farmer and have been all of my life, and I know something from first-hand experience of the problems of the farmer and of the small farmer. I am a small farmer.

I have been a Member of the United States Congress for the last 14 years, 10 years of that time having been spent in the House of Representatives and the last 4 years in the United States Senate. I have had a part in the enactment of much of the legislation that has brought about, or has initiated at least, those programs of land and agricultural reforms in the United States.

If I may be pardoned for another personal reference, I may say that the first speech that I ever had the privilege of making as a Member of the United States Congress was in favor of the Bankhead-Jones Farm Tenant Purchase Act, which set up for the first time a program in the United States making it possible for governmental help to farm tenants to become farm owners.

Mr. Chairman, may I interpolate here that something has been said in connection with the discussion of this resolution about the use of the term "peasant"? "Peasant" is a term that is not used in the United States. I suppose that the meaning which is generally accepted where the term "peasant" is used, might correspond in the United States to the term "farm tenant" or small individual farmer. They probably mean the same thing.

The purpose of this Bankhead-Jones Farm Tenant Purchase Act was to make it possible for more people to become owners of their own individual family-sized, family-operated, family-supporting farms.

Mr. Chairman, I think it will be of interest to this committee that that bill passed the Congress of the United States by a rather narrow margin. Many people were doubtful as to the efficacy of such a program. Many people, many Members of Congress opposed it because of the littleness with which it was proposed to initiate the program.

Under the plan, as it came before us, it was proposed to appropriate $10,000,000 a year to be used in long-term, low-rate-of-interest loans to worthy farm tenants to purchase farms. There are 3,000 farm counties in the United States. Someone quickly pointed out that the sum of $10,000,000 would permit the purchase of only one farm per rural county and that there was little hope of getting anywhere on such a meager beginning and therefore it was not worth starting.

Mr. Chairman, I have often thought of that experience in connection with programs that are proposed before this committee. I know oftentimes we would prefer to go into a program on a much bigger scale than we feel able to start at the time, and so it was with the farm-tenant-purchase program in the United States. Many of us would have preferred to go into it on a much bigger scale, and some, as I say, opposed our going into it at all because we were going into it on such a small scale.

However, Mr. Chairman, that program proved itself by its own operation. The appropriations were increased until during certain years we would lend out as much as $50,000,000 a year for the purchase of farms.

I should like to call the attention of this committee to what has happened in the United States with reference to landownership during the nearly 14 years that that act has been in operation.

According to the 1935 census, 42 percent of the land operators of the United States were tenants. They did not own their own farms. They were tenants paying rent. They were sharecroppers or they were working for a part of the crop. In my own State of Alabama the percentage of tenants was much higher—64½ percent; in other words, only 1 out of 3 of the farm operators in my State of Alabama in 1935 actually owned the land that he tilled.

The distinguished delegate from Poland, a few days ago, in talking about this, made some reference to landownership and he referred to the States of Alabama and South Carolina. Because he mentioned South Carolina, I think you may be interested to know that the tenancy there in 1935 was 62.2 percent.

The last complete agricultural census that we had of the United States—the 1950 census not being ready—was in 1946. At that time the national percentage of farm tenancy had been reduced to 31.7 percent. In the State of Alabama it had been reduced to 49 percent. In the State of South Carolina it had been reduced to 54 percent. We believe and estimates have been made that during the last 5 years that have ensued there has been a still further reduction of some 5 percent, and that today the farm tenancy in the United States will be about 26 percent, Alabama about 44 percent, and South Carolina about 49 percent.

I do not claim that all of that reduction in farm tenancy has been brought about by reason of the Farm Tenant Purchase Act, which I described to you, but I do mean that it gave the impetus to the program that has made it possible for us to have that substantial reduction in farm tenancy and a similar increase in farm ownership in the United States during the past 14 years.

In the United States we believe strongly in farm ownership, individual farm ownership. We believe that the land that a man and his family works and on which they make a living ought to belong to him and to his family. It is that objective toward which we have been working during the last many years, and it is that same kind of a program or a similar program that we envisage may very well be encouraged by this General Assembly and by this committee, and might very well be undertaken in many parts of the world. That is the reason, Mr. Chairman, that we wholeheartedly support this kind of a program, and that is the reason we ask for the amendment that would particularly provide for helping small farmers, individual farmers, to own and operate the land out of which they and their family make a living.

Mr. Chairman, there are many facts and figures that I should like to give you in regard to this program and many other programs, but I will not transgress on the time of the committee.

However, I do want to mention the rural cooperatives for the benefit of small farmers. We have a rural cooperative program in the United States that has been in existence now for a good many years.

Before I go to that subject and away from the farm ownership I would like to bring in just one other item, because I think this may very well apply to some of the other countries of the world. The United States, of course, is of vast domain, and up until comparatively recent years a great part of it belonged to the public Government. Our Government started as early as 1862 a homesteading program whereby our people were encouraged to settle on the land that belonged to the public domain and for a nominal fee to be able to convert that land into a farm for their own ownership.

Now, Mr. Chairman, turning to the question of rural cooperatives, with Government assistance in their organizing there are today some 10,000 purchasing and marketing farm cooperatives with a membership of 6,384,000 members. Some of these, of course, represent duplications, because we actually do not have that many farmer owners or farmers in the United States. Some of them belong to several different cooperatives. We have 1,850 farmer-mutual fire-insurance groups with 3,500,000 members and $18,000,000,000 in insurance policies. Twenty different cooperative groups have founded hospitals for their membership.

We have a large number of cooperative telephone organizations. And just during this past Congress the United States Government provided an assistance program for all rural cooperatives that would organize for the purpose of installing and operating their own telephone systems.

Back some 15 years ago, the United States Government, through its Congress, wrote into law a provision to lend assistance to farmers who would organize themselves into cooperative groups for the purpose of extending the benefits of electric power to their communities. That has been one of the most successful programs that we have had. And it never would have been started, Mr. Chairman, certainly not on any such scale as it has been carried forward, had it not been for this kind of a program being underwritten by the Government itself. Today, 96 percent of all of the farms in the United States are electrified. It started out, Mr. Chairman, usually with a line being run into a community, individual homes tying into the line and giving electric lights to their homes. Then there came the electric range and the electric refrigerator, electric washing machine. Lights went into the barns and into the outbuildings of the farmers and then there came various farm machinery.

By the way, Mr. Chairman, the statement has often been made that through encouraging an agricultural program an industrial program is stymied or certainly is discouraged. I think the very figures that I have cited with reference to the progress of the rural electric cooperative program in the United States belies that statement, because when the farmer gets electric power into his farm, he buys this equipment. He buys the radio. He buys the electric iron. He buys the electric range. He buys the electric refrigerator and the washing machine. He buys the various farm machinery that he uses about his barn and throughout his farm. It has proven one of the greatest stimuli that there could possibly be for further industrial development in this country.

These are programs that go hand in hand. We in the United States have seen the truth of that statement and when we lay the emphasis that we do upon the development of agricultural programs and upon the development of assistance to farm cooperatives such as this, we recognize that it is not something to displace industrial development but it is something to add to and to encourage industrial development.

Mr. Chairman, in my own State of Alabama, when the rural cooperative program was started, some 5 percent of the farms were electrified. Today that figure is 85 percent. In the United States as a whole only about 10 percent of the farms were electrified. Today that figure is more than 86 percent. And with the blessings that have come to the farm family in extending electrification to their homes, there has also come one of the greatest boons to industry in the production of the various machinery and equipment and attachments that electrification has called for.

Mr. Chairman, we have sponsored many other cooperatives in the United States, cooperatives to enable farmers to do their own marketing, cooperatives that would enable farmers to produce their own crops—farmers that perhaps were not able through no fault of their own to finance the operation of their crops—through a bank, or through some merchant, or through some other lending agency.

Mr. Chairman, I grew up on a farm. I have seen these changes take place in the United States. My father was not a farm owner. He was a farm tenant and I grew up as a farm tenant. I later became a farm owner, a small farm owner. I can well recall the days when farmers in order to be able to get advances with which to make their crops would have to pay an enormous rate of interest—10, 12, 15 percent. They had to take all of the hazards of agriculture without any assurance that when the harvest season came around there would be an adequate price for what they produced.

Our Government over the last several years—well, within my memory—has taken steps to give to the farmers of this country assurance, protection, support, the means to help themselves through the organization of these various cooperatives. The Government subscribed originally to all of the stock in these cooperatives but provided for a gradual retirement of that stock and in many sections of the country today and in many of the various cooperatives that have been organized, all of that stock has been retired so that the farmers themselves now own their cooperatives outright.

The program has worked here. We believe that it can be made to work elsewhere.

We have also proposed an amendment for the development of small indigenous enterprises for the processing of agricultural products. I do not know what the conditions may be in other countries, but I do know that in the United States of America one of the greatest difficulties that a farmer used to run up against, and to a great extent even today it is a problem, was the processing of products, making them ready for market, making it possible to hold them until a market is ready to receive the products. Left to his own resources, he was helpless. The banking structure of our country was not set up in such a way as to provide adequately for him. The Government, through its various programs, through the cooperatives, and through loans and through methods of financing has given every encouragement to the development of these small farm factories, if you may call them such, indigenous to that particular area, for use in helping the farmer to process his own agricultural products and to make them ready to market and to enable him to hold them until a suitable time came for marketing.

Mr. Chairman, we believe that this program can be made to work. We have seen it work here. I would not leave the impression for anything that we have reached a point of perfection in this country. That is not so—far from it. We still have a long way to go. But we have been pleased with the start that has been made. We have been pleased with the progress that has been made and we believe that the sooner a similar start is made by the UN working in concert, the greater, the faster will be the economic development of many parts of the world from which all of us will profit.

I should like to say just a word about the various amendments—not in criticism of any of them. As I said in the beginning, our delegation is pleased that so great an interest has been manifested as is shown by the introduction of these various amendments. It may very well be that there is good in all of them. It may very well be that a better resolution could be obtained by trying to work out a combination of all of them.

It is not my purpose to propose it now, but I should like to offer the suggestion for the consideration of the committee as we proceed in this debate that at the proper time all of the proposals be referred to a drafting committee for the purpose of working out the very best resolution that we could possibly work out here for doing the job that we all want done.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Sesquicentennial of the Establishment of the Territorial Government of Indiana

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HOMER E. CAPEHART

OF INDIANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, December 5 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD the address delivered by Mr. Elmer Davis on the occasion of the opening of the Library of Congress exhibition commemorating the sesquicentennial of the establishment of the territorial government of Indiana, on November 30, 1950, in the Coolidge auditorium in the Library of Congress.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I have no doubt that some of you feel that there was something a little inappropriate in the selection of a speaker for this evening who left Indiana 40 years ago, and has had only infrequent and casual contacts with the State since then; and also one who did not come from the region which has become generally known as the classical and typical Indiana, the up-State flat lands. I came from the river counties, which for many years past have been incorporated in the life and culture of the State—thanks to the automobile; but which had not been so incorporated in my day, when the automobile was still a rich man's toy, and there were no roads for it to run on anyway.

In those days the river counties were something separate and peculiar; they had little contact with the classic Hoosier culture upState, they belonged rather to the river culture, which from Pittsburgh and St. Paul down to New Orleans was pretty much all one piece, a culture which even in the days of the railroad was long dominated by the steamboat. The flavor of life in the river counties in those days was much more the flavor of Kentucky than of Indiana; and in my corner of the State we were still further denationalized; we were part of the tri-State metropolitan complex of Cincinnati; and to everybody but the politicians Cincinnati, not Indianapolis, was the center of interest.

Yet when you survey the history of Indiana, as State and as Territory, for the past century and a half, it is clear that the river counties were an essential and typical part of it, however they differed from what later became the stereotype. We were after all the first of Indiana, since the first settlers either came across the river from Kentucky or down the river from Pennsylvania; we were building stately homes and reading the classics when up-State Indiana still consisted mostly of swamps, inhabited chiefly by water moccasins and malarial mosquitos. That up-State life—at least as far up-State as Decatur County—was later depicted by a river-county novelist, Edward Eggleston, in a book which was never popular among his fellow citizens. And for some reason; for while the Hoosier Schoolmaster was true as of the time he remembered, it was no longer true as of the time the book was published. By that time upState had caught up with the river counties; and was presently to go far beyond them, in wealth, self-advertisement, and self-satisfaction.

Yet in those earliest days the river counties had established some traditions to which the whole State has been loyal. In politics, for instance. The Congressman from my district, in Andrew Jackson's day, was Amos Lane—a violent anti-Jacksonian; and it has been reported by those who heard him that when he was denouncing his enemies on the stump, the gritting and grinding of his teeth could be heard 50 yards away. I doubt if that record has been improved on by any of our present congressional delegation. The river counties set the Hoosier literary tradition; and it goes back beyond Edgar Eggleston or even Julia Dumont. My home town, Aurora, was founded by the first Indiana novelist, Jesse Lynch Holman. It is true that his novel, The Errors of Education, was not the first Indiana novel; he wrote it while he was still living in Lexington or Frankfort, Ky., before he came across the river. But Aurora, if it was not the place where The Errors of Education was written, has a more melancholy distinction; it was the place where the first Indiana novel was destroyed. In later life Judge Holman became convinced that his youthful work might have a deleterious effect on the morals of young people, so he tried to buy up the whole edition, and very nearly succeeded. It was probably not too difficult a task, since the book, like the stock of certain family corporations, seems to have been closely held. At any rate he seems to have got hold of all but two copies and according to tradition he burned them in the public square of Aurora—now Mary Stratton Park, named for his daughter. It was the first and so far the only book-burning in Indiana; I hope it will be the last.

Well, up-State eventually passed the river counties; yet we went on leading our own lives until the automobile finally reunited the State. What that life was like down on the river, 50 years ago, has lately been set down in a novel called Ring In the New, by Laura Buchanan Harris, who came from Rising Sun; it is river-bank stuff but a great deal of it is thoroughly recognizable as a picture of small-town life anywhere in Indiana, or indeed in the Middle West, at the turn of the century. It is incidentally about the best picture that has ever been done of life in the river counties; since our ablest novelist, David Graham Phillips, while he was an accurate and perspicacious reporter of Fifth Avenue and Wall Street, fell down badly in his one attempt to give a picture of life in Madison and at DePauw. So much for the river counties up till the time I left; but since then, with good roads and the cars that ride on them making the State all one piece, we have been incorporated into the general picture that Indiana presents to the world.

That is a remarkable picture—such a clear and familiar picture as perhaps no other State in the Union has ever presented. The picture written down in some of Tarkington's novels, some of Nicholson's essays, some of McCutcheon's cartoons, some of Ade's fables; and above all in practically all of Riley's poems—that is Indiana as it has shown itself to the world. It is an attractive picture; what is more, it is a coherent and credible picture. It was substantially true, for its time and place; but it dealt with only a part of Indiana—though the larger and wealthier part, the up-State flatlands; and more important, it covers hardly more than a quarter of the commonwealth's existence as State and territory—roughly, the 40 years following the Civil War. A picture of an essentially rural culture, though punctuated by and focused on the county seats; a world of stovepipe hats and base-burner stoves, where people got around by horse and buggy and by spring wagon, unless they had to go so far that they took the accommodation train. A centripetal, introspective culture; pretty well satisfied with itself, but with better reason for self-satisfaction than most, a world with no aspiration to the loftier heights—except in such very irregular products as Theodore Dreiser and Eugene Debs, both of them men whose reach exceeded their grasp; but which also, in those days, managed to avoid the depths as well. A culture which was satisfied to turn out, as perhaps its most typical product put it, more first-rate second-rate men than any other State in the country.

But that was only a part of Indiana, in place and time; and the great merit of this exhibition which is opened here tonight is to remind us of the immense variety that has actually existed, over a century and a half, in a State whose stereotype is so familiar. You see here more of old Vincennes, and of the earlier French explorations, than Maurice Thompson ever told you. You see more of the early Utopian pioneers at New Harmony—men whom every Hoosier is taught to reverence but whom no present-day Hoosier would ever dream of imitating. Father Rapp's utopia was celibate; and the taste for celibacy had disappeared from Indiana long before Dr. Kinsey's day. Robert Dale Owen is a hero because he has been dead a long time; if he lived in Indiana today he would probably be ridden out of town on a rail as a Communist agitator. Yet you see here records of those men and of many others, men of the river counties and of the lake counties as well as of the great interior; and you realize that in a State whose typical picture is so familiar, and so attractive, there were nevertheless at sundry times and in divers places many other things that were also Indiana.

That stereotyped picture drawn from Riley's poems and the Gentleman from Indiana and McCutcheon's Indian-summer cartoon—that picture was already beginning to be out of date in my day; and you can perhaps date its decline and fall by one of the best things George Ade ever wrote—I Knew Him When. Many of you perhaps know it; originally a speech at the dinner of the Indiana Society of Chicago in 1910, it was later republished as a booklet. What makes it a classic is that it is the complete history of every small-town boy, in any age, who made good in the big city; but over and beyond that you can read in it that Indiana was already changing. The brief age of the interurbans marked the beginning of the change; Indiana was ceasing to the rural, it was becoming industrialized. Not only Indianapolis—which my father could remember as a clean white city, heated by the gas from Muncie, but which is clean and white no longer—but even the county seats, most of them, have become industrial towns with industrial problems, to which the old Hoosier credo offered no answer. I pass over the brief reign of the Klan, though I should like to believe that the spirit that made the Klan possible is as dead as the paraphernalia of hoods and sheets; but other problems came up with the new age and Indiana, like the rest of the country, is still trying to find the answer.

What that change has meant—one of the things it has meant—I saw dramatized on election night of 1938, when I dropped in on some of my friends at the Democratic State headquarters. The fall of 1938, to anybody who lived in the East, was chiefly memorable for two events—the Connecticut hurricane, which my family and I had survived by the skin of our teeth; and the Munich crisis, which the world survived by the skin of its teeth, but with a pretty clear indication that it would not survive the next one. But Indiana in November was pretty much concentrated on one thing—would or would not Fred Van Nuys be reelected to the Senate. At Democratic headquarters that night they thought he was safely in, till strange and incredible news came from Lake County; instead of the 18,000 majority that had been expected out of the steel mills and oil refineries they had got only 6,000. Nobody could figure that one out, that night; not till some days later did they find the answer. The Democratic leaders in Lake County were all Poles; but a large percentage of the voters were Czechs; and they had voted Republican in Indiana because they disapproved of the attitude of the Polish Government in the Munich crisis. That was the sort of thing Tom Taggart never had to worry about.

Yet even that night, there was proof that Indiana had not entirely changed. Men were going around Democratic headquarters with downcast eyes and darkened facts, till all at once everybody brightened up. Word had come that the returns from Vigo County would be delayed. They were delayed for 2 or 3 days; and when they came in, by happy coincidence, they were just enough to put Fred Van Nuys over. So I went away feeling that even in this world which had so vastly changed, and not for the better, Indiana in some ways was still itself.

Indeed there had been proof of that 18 months before—in the spring of 1937, when the great wave of strikes—organizing strikes, steel strikes in particular—spread through the Middle West. There was bitterness and violence on both sides; plants were occupied by sit-down strikers; other strikers were shot down—retail shootings in Ohio and Michigan, wholesale shootings in Chicago. There were steel strikes in Indiana too; and Cliff Townsend who was then Governor settled them peaceably within 3 days—without violence, without bloodshed; and unfortunately without national publicity. The metropolitan newspapers in those days were not interested in the peaceful settlement of industrial disputes; all they cared about was brickbats and blood. But it was a demonstration that even in the new industrial age, the Hoosier temperament was disinclined to go to extremes.

Whether that temperament is a virtue or a fault has been much debated—the cult of the first-rate second-rate man, the avoidance of extremes, whether of virtue and wisdom or of vice and folly. The argument has perhaps little point any more since it has come loose at one end; Indiana may still produce no saints and heroes, but the recent return to the news of Mr. D. C. Stephenson is a reminder that we no longer avoid the other extreme. Yet we did produce one man—the late Wendell Willkie—who was not afraid to go out on a limb for the things he believed in; who was not afraid even of that thing which Hoosiers of his generation and mine, and of the generation before us, were taught to fear above everything else; he was not afraid of being laughed at. He was a prophet not without honor, save in his own country; but it is still to be seen whether he will have a successor. Hoosiers no longer laugh as much as they used to; and they seldom laugh at the right people.

The old tight, introspective, satisfied Hoosier culture, which never aspired to the heights but never descended to the depths—which cultivated, about as well as any society has ever cultivated it, the doctrine of moderation in all things, of the golden mean—that is gone. It had no answer to the problems of a new age—an age in which not only Indianapolis and Fort Wayne, but Newcastle and Clinton, are industrial cities; in which at one time almost the largest city south of Indianapolis was Camp Atterbury, with half its population consisting of soldiers from other States, and the other half of Italian prisoners of war. An age in which Madison could be selected as the subject of a motion picture to be shown all over the world, illustrating not the homogeneity of middle western culture, but the harmony in which a population could live though its ancestors were of many nationalities. Not Gary, not South Bend; but Madison. For better or worse, the world had broken into Indiana; and Indiana had broken out into the world. An age in which I saw the Paris Opera House, which I had known well in other circumstances and in earlier years, filled with American soldiers, listening to other American soldiers performing the works of Hoagy Carmichael from Bloomington and Cole Porter from Peru.

The Indiana of tradition could handle the simpler problems of its day; but the problems of this new age take more thinking. We older people, who grew up in the harmonious, satisfied, and satisfying Hoosier tradition of the past—I grew up in it, too, when I went to college up-State—we who must now do the best we can with the vast and amorphous problems of a new age—we were perhaps better prepared for that ordeal than we knew. Some of you are old enough to have been raised, as I was, on the Cook and Cropsey arithmetic; which we used to regard as about the most exasperating textbook ever compiled. Its problems were of a tricky complexity never met with in the real life of those days; though I suppose income-tax consultants and Treasury accountants would find nothing unusual in them now. At any rate, it was some consolation to the pupil who struggled with them to know that the answers were written down in the back of the book; and over 50 years I can still remember the cold horror that came over me, the feeling that I had been cheated, betrayed, sold down the river, when I discovered that many of those answers were wrong.

But time brings reappraisals; as the years passed I gradually recognized that this was actually perhaps the most valuable textbook that I ever studied; that Mr. Cook and Miss Cropsey had been educating us, far more profoundly than we could have realized at the time. For what they were teaching us was that there are no answers in the back of the book—no trustworthy answers, anyway; that a man who tells you he knows the answer may be right, by lucky guess—or may be horribly and catastrophically wrong, either by mischance or by intention; that you have got to work out the problem and get the answer by yourself. You may get the wrong one, but it is your business to check it—to prove it, as we used to say, by working the problem backwards; you may find the answer beyond you for the moment but you have got to reach the best approximation that you can. In that search, and in the skepticism about any offer of a guaranteed short cut to the answer—in that is the beginning of wisdom.

Federal Judgeships

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT C. HENDRICKSON
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, December 5 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. HENDRICKSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have incorporated in the Appendix of the RECORD a thought-provoking editorial entitled "Federal Judgeships," from the Newark Evening News of yesterday. This editorial has great bearing upon pending and future judicial appointments and comes to us as sound advice and counsel.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FEDERAL JUDGESHIPS

On senior Judge Fake's retirement soon, President Truman will have the filling of another vacancy on the Federal district court bench in New Jersey in addition to the one to which he has just nominated United States District Attorney Modarelli. The latter's confirmation would, with Judge Fake's retirement, leave the New Jersey Federal bench composed of four Democrats and one Republican.

Taking his previous district-court appointments as a criterion, the chances are that President Truman will name a Democrat to the sixth judgeship. But on the plea for a more bipartisan judiciary, Republican leaders in the State will seek to have a Republican named, with their choice centered on County Judge Hartshorne, who has a long and honorable record as a member of the New Jersey judiciary.

It is noteworthy that in the last 17 years only 8 or 10 out of 200 Federal judges appointed are Republicans. Recently President Gallagher of the American Bar Association charged that a virtual spoils system controls these appointments. Yet the regrettable development is not peculiar to the Roosevelt-Truman administrations. Republican Presidents back to the days of Benjamin Harrison have been as partisan as Democratic Presidents in naming Federal judges.

The likelihood, therefore, of Judge Hartshorne or any Republican being named is remote, regardless of qualifications, unless Republicans in the next Congress, with their stronger bargaining position, are able to force the administration to modify its position. In any event, the argument for a better political balance in the Federal judiciary is sound in principle and never more important than in these times as the Federal courts are called upon to adjudicate complex social and economic problems arising from the extension of Federal powers.

Get Out of Korea or Fight China—These Are the Two Bitter Alternatives America Must Face in the Next Few Days With the Rest of the United Nations

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CARL D. PERKINS
OF KENTUCKY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, December 5, 1950

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent, I include in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial from the Courier-Journal, Louisville, Ky., November 30, 1950, entitled "Get Out of Korea or Fight China," which I think will be worth the time of all the membership of this body to read, inasmuch as the issue is clearly stated. The abovementioned article follows:

Let's take a good, hard look at our position in Korea. We suddenly find ourselves face to face with a fateful decision. It is worth while to ask what course the Soviets would prefer to have us take at this turning point, and the answer is quite obvious. The Soviets would like to see us launch an all-out war against Communist China.

Nothing would fit so well into the Russian pattern of world conquest. They know we could send bombers over Chinese cities and destroy hundreds of thousands of lives. They know we would probably be forced to use the atom bomb. They know as well that we would have to tie up our major resources in the Far East for an indefinite period to fight a war against a people who have been our traditional friends, and against the greatest mass of manpower in the world. They know it would be almost impossible to attain decisive victory against such a foe. In striving for it we would be bound to alienate the other teeming millions of Asiatics. Best of all from the Kremlin point of view, we would leave western Europe open to a Soviet sweep to the Atlantic.

How can we avoid delighting the Kremlin by fighting China? Certainly we cannot let Chinese Communists continue to slaughter our troops in Korea, mounting their fierce offensive from what General MacArthur calls the "privileged sanctuary" of Manchuria. If this fight goes on, we will have to attack the sanctuary. That can only lead to an all-out conflict with China, while Stalin laughs up his sleeve.

How can we escape from this terrible dilemma? The only chance seems to lie, as MacArthur has indicated, in a political settlement quickly negotiated at Lake Success. We must look carefuly to see what such a solution would require. The Chinese Red delegates have indicated, in an insulting and unreasonable fashion as possible, the terms on which they would be willing to settle. They are following: admission of Communist China to the UN; withdrawal of "American Forces" from Formosa, and our Seventh Fleet from the neighboring waters; and withdrawal of all American and other foreign troops from Korea.

Here is where we Americans need to take a tight grip on our blood pressure. We are not used to being blackmailed or pushed around or presented with an ultimatum. Our impulse is to spit in the eye of the fellow who tries these tactics. The point we must remember, however, is that if we let ourselves go and indulge in the luxury of a fight with the Communist stooges from Peiping, we leave the real Communist enemies from Moscow free to cut the world out from under us.

So let's take as calm a look as possible at the Chinese terms. This newspaper has already advocated the eventual recognition of Red China and its admission to the UN, though not under the ugly pressure of today.

The Red government, much as we dislike it, apparently represents the will of the great majority of China's population. As to Formosa, our UN representatives have already stated that we have no forces there except for 44 military attachés at our Embassy, President Truman declared months ago that the Seventh Fleet would be withdrawn as soon as the Korean conflict was settled. This brings the issue squarely back to Korea.

It is unthinkable for us to pull out of Korea and abandon the other UN forces there. We would have to act according to a program adopted by the UN, providing for evacuation of all UN troops, presumably including the South Korean Army. Korea would be left to the mercy of the Communists. Our effort there would have to be written off as a sacrifice play, like the British landing in Greece during World War II, which was doomed to military failure, but which competent authorities agree was a necessary evil.

The thought of getting out of Korea is terribly bitter medicine to Americans. But look at the alternatives. If we stay on and fight the sort of "limited" war now in progress, allowing the Chinese Communists to slug us with impunity from behind the Manchurian border, we are in the gravest danger of being driven into the sea. General MacArthur, recently so optimistic, has virtually admitted that probability. If we strike back against the Chinese in Manchuria, we are involved in a full war with China, the perfect situation for Stalin. If we move out of Korea, we risk a serious loss of prestige in the Orient and over the world, something America has never had to accept.

These are the bitter alternatives. The last is made a little more acceptable by the fact that we may operate as part of a force which the UN decides to remove from Korea, for the plain purpose of avoiding a much larger and more deadly war. Perhaps our diplomats at Lake Success can win some better terms for a Korean compromise. But we had better prepare ourselves for a settlement that may hurt American pride worse than anything since the burning of the Capitol in 1814. We cannot conduct our foreign affairs in a moment of such danger on considerations of national pride. National safety, national survival are the only issues worth considering.

Those considerations call for an immediate all-out effort to prepare for war. If we pocket our pride in Asia, it should only be for the purpose of throwing all the strength we can muster into western Europe. If we must fight, we had better fight the real enemy on his home grounds in Russia, not a straw man in the endless wastes of China. We may still avoid the really hot war, if we move with enough swiftness and determination. America has no lack of fighting hearts. We must have cool heads to chart the hardest course in our history.

Shipment of War Materials to Red China

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LESLIE C. ARENDS
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, December 5, 1950

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to revise and extend my remarks, I am inserting in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a resolution unanimously adopted by the Rotary Club of Atlanta, Ill., on November 29, whereby the members express their resentment over the shipments of materials to Red China. They ask that this be immediately stopped, and they also ask that those who have been responsible for permitting such shipments to be made be publicly called to accountability.

It is my information that the Rotary Club of Lincoln, Ill., unanimously adopted an identical resolution, as has the Kiwanis Club of Lincoln, Ill.

I am inserting this resolution in the RECORD as it demonstrates the extent to which the American people are justly aroused over this situation. They are alarmed and shocked. They have every reason to be. I share their feeling of resentment, and I personally intend to do everything within my power as an individual Member of Congress to correct this appalling practice of allowing those who are killing our boys to have materials from us.

It is a sad commentary on our national leadership to have allowed, over the past 2 years or more, materials from the United States to help build up the Communist China war machine. During these last 2 years many Members of Congress, including myself, have called attention to the fact that Communist China constituted an enemy to our way of life and a military threat to our security. Many of us urged, time and again, that these shipments of materials to Communist China be stopped. But little or nothing has been done about it.

I wish the record to show that I join with the people of my district in expressing our resentment over these shipments and in insisting that this be stopped, not next month, or next week, but immediately. The resolution follows:

Whereas press reports and radio announcers have publicized the fact that war materials have been shipped from United States ports to Red China in recent weeks and after it became apparent that Red China's troops were assisting North Koreans in fighting against our American troops; and

Whereas boys from our neighborhood are now fighting with the South Korean Army and the United States Government is drafting more boys from our neighborhood and county to become part of the Nation's army and possibly to be victims of the war weapons or ammunition to be made from the war materials being shipped from the United States to Red China or other Russian-dominated countries: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the members of the Atlanta Rotary Club, located at Atlanta, Ill., That we resent the fact that the Government permits such shipments to be made; that we resent that the President of the United States and the Congress of the United States have not yet publicly called to accountability those responsible for permitting such shipments to be made; that we feel that the lives and welfare of our sturdy American boys are of far more value than the profits any merchant may make upon such shipments of war materials, and we feel that the President and Congress should act without delay better to protect our American boys; and that a copy of this resolution shall be sent immediately by the secretary of this organization to our President and to each Senator from this State and to our Congressman and to our Senator-elect.

Passed and unanimously adopted, November 29, 1950.

Our Questionable Foreign Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. L. MENDEL RIVERS
OF SOUTH CAROLINA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, December 5, 1950

Mr. RIVERS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include herewith three editorials which appeared in the Press and Standard, one of the distinguished weekly newspapers of this Nation, printed in Walterboro, S. C.

I consider the contents of these editorials to be the most accurate reflections of what the man on the street is thinking today. I believe that the American people are far ahead of the Administration on our present, questionable foreign policy. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that the time will come when this country will awaken to the need of a reappraisal of our present, unprofitable program in our dealings with our so-called friends. Events of this very day demonstrate beyond the peradventure of a doubt that neither the so-called United Nations nor the prospective beneficiaries of the arms-aid program are willing to lend us effective assistance in Korea. Today America is bearing her cross practically alone despite the astronomically staggering contributions we have made to world peace in human misery and American dollars.

Mr. Speaker, the enclosed editorials are true, they are timely, and they reflect the thinking of a majority of our patriotic Americans. The above-mentioned editorials follow:

WILL THE UN LIVE UP TO ITS RESPONSIBILITY?

If the United Nations, a body whose concept is based on the belief that civilized mankind had reached the stage of development where he saw the wisdom of settling his differences by reason rather than by brute strength, does not within the next 48 hours take immediate steps to require the withdrawal of Chinese Communist forces from North Korea, then that body will go the way of the old League of Nations.

This is the test.

We feel that our country has been foolish in the way in which it has poured money into other European nations in the belief that that would buy friendship, would secure for us the cooperation and freely given military aid which we might need in any trouble.

We say that our present trouble in Korea can be traced back to pre-World War II days when England refused to aid us in our efforts to drive from Manchuria the Japanese when they first invaded this country.

England's recent recognition of the Chinese communistic government has also aided in giving this Nation the added feeling that she could do as she pleased in Korea.

American soldiers are dying in Korea while Nero fiddles and Rome burns.

Our people have lost confidence in their President, in the present Secretary of State; it has been through their lack of grasp of world conditions; of their inability to bargain, rather than give outright—money, goods—from this country to others, that we find ourselves carrying the major portion of the war in Korea, a war which is foolishly believed by many to be a United Nations conflict.

Where are the fighting troops of other nations (members of the UN) in this war? Why are we forced to carry the major part of the fighting?

Why didn't the UN already have completed a policy of what could, and would, be sanctioned if matters turned out as they have?

Why should these questions have to be decided after things happen?

TAKE CARE OF OUR OWN FIRST

We urge that our Government do at least two things. One is to reduce drastically the free flow of money being spent on countries of Europe.

The other is to take this money and spend it in our country to make us as strong as possible to defend our shores from attack, and to mount an attack anywhere at any time, if necessary.

Our school teachers are underpaid; our school buildings to take care of our students is causing many not to have the opportunity of equal education. Let's spend our people's money here. Not in foreign lands.

Why recognize Spain, or lend money to this government which is a dictatorship, and in which freedom of religion does not exist? Why lend money and send food to Yugoslavia?

Can't our political leaders see that we are wasting our strength? That we are depleting our resources? That our present policy is lacking in common sense?

Why isn't the proven fact taken under consideration that other nations are using us, and will not aid us unless it will be to their advantage to do so?

YOU CAN'T BUY IT

When will our Government learn the hard, but true fact, that we can't buy friendship? That we can't force our democratic form of government on any other nation? We at one time were very noble. We aided Japan. She used much we sent her to fight us. We aided Russia in World War II to fight Germany by lend-lease.

She is now at odds with us, instigating the Chinese Communists to fight us; we sent aid to China, her Government is now fighting us; we aided Germany after World War I, rebuilt her, loaned her money, the same for Italy, they fought us.

When will we learn to keep our powder dry, and place our trust in God, not in bought friendship?

Why must we have a mania for "do-good-ing" over the world?

The FBI and a Critic

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DONALD L. O'TOOLE
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, December 5, 1950

Mr. O'TOOLE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Raymond Moley, from Newsweek of December 4, 1950. It follows:

THE FBI AND A CRITIC

(By Raymond Moley)

I begin this piece on a personal note for no purpose of self-praise but because it will help to make a point which involves a grave matter of national security. Seventeen years ago when I left active Government service, President Roosevelt asked me to make for him a study of Federal laws and their administration relating to racketeering and kidnapping. He placed this responsibility upon me because prior to 1932 I had devoted 12 years to the observation and study of the administration of the criminal law in various States, including New York, while he and his predecessor, Alfred E. Smith, were in the office of governor. Those studies are recorded in three of my books and in 20 or more extensive surveys and reports.

In pursuing the investigation directed by the President, I not only acquainted myself intimately with the Federal Bureau of Investigation, but at the request of Hatton Sumners, then the distinguished chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, sorted out from a batch of bills, prepared by the Department of Justice and dealing with Federal criminal-law administration, the ones which seemed appropriate for action by Congress. In making these selections, Mr. Sumners and I were keenly actuated not only by a desire to prevent any unsafe encroachment of Federal police powers upon the rights and responsibilities of the States and local governments but upon the rights of individuals under the law.

Mr. Max Lowenthal, on the flyleaf of his currently controversial book on the FBI, has overgenerously offered me a certain distinction, by saying that I was the first of the Americans to look deeply into the problems of police and criminal-law administration. This is a great overstatement, for I was neither the first, nor the best, nor the last. However, in the light of this friendly gesture, I find it embarrassing to record reluctantly that I regret the general tone and inadequacies of Mr. Lowenthal's book. It is an indictment rather than a survey, a lawyer's brief rather than a judicious summing up of the history, services, and value of the FBI.

With respect to the current controversy concerning Mr. Lowenthal himself, his motives in writing this book, his past associations, and his influence with President Truman, I am not here concerned. Nor am I concerned with doing a detailed review of the book. That is adequately done elsewhere in this magazine (see p. 84).

What is really important is the status of the FBI itself, the confidence of the public in its efficiency and integrity, and the importance that anyone who can speak with some authority, as I can, should say, as I do, that it is by all odds the most competent police and investigative agency that this country has ever seen.

To blame, even by implication, J. Edgar Hoover or the present Bureau for the Palmer excesses of 1920 is no more fair than it would be to accuse President Truman of the sins of Tom Pendergast. In the one case Mr. Hoover was a clerk in the FBI, Mr. Truman a minor machine member.

What is important is that during and after the recent war, despite vastly greater internal dangers and responsibilities, there has been no repetition of the Palmer activities. Also important is the fact that for 26 years Mr. Hoover has served under and had the support of a long series of Attorneys General, some of whom had as great a passion for justice and fairness as has Mr. Lowenthal. Also greatly important are unmentioned achievements such as the virtual elimination of kidnaping, the suppression of espionage and sabotage in the war, the successful prosecution of the 11 Communists, Coplon, and Hiss.

When Roosevelt became President there were powerful political forces which were determined to oust Mr. Hoover and put in his place a chief more amenable to political influences. I happened to be in the middle of that fight, and I heard all of the criticisms, most of which, incidentally, are repeated by Mr. Lowenthal. The President and Attorney General Cummings decided for Mr. Hoover, and for that decision every American should be thankful.

Excess-Profits-Tax Bill of 1950

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LEONARD W. HALL
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, December 5, 1950

Mr. LEONARD W. HALL. Mr. Speaker, when Congress recessed in October, Republican leaders in the House took the position that an excess-profits-tax bill should be adopted before final adjournment of the Eighty-first Congress. I hold to that view and believe that it is the duty of the Congress to adopt such legislation at this time.

Some action must be taken to halt inflation, some action must be taken to bring in additional revenue, and certainly action must be taken to remove excess profits from the war effort.

Our boys are fighting a terrible war in Korea. We must back them with our moral and our financial might to insure that the final victory will be ours.

One step in this direction is the enactment of an excess-profits tax. But I maintain that the bill before the House today is not the bill to do the job.

The administration forces have rammed through a bill which is unsound, discriminatory, and in fact one that will increase inflation. The majority of the witnesses who appeared before the Ways and Means Committee, in the brief time they were allowed to testify, were highly critical of this excess-profits bill, and most of them held that it was a confiscatory measure.

The Secretary of the Treasury is cool toward this bill, and that is understandable, because it is indicated that the measure was drawn up by the CIO, and the President rammed it through in the face of opposition from his Treasury Secretary and his Internal Revenue Commissioner.

The administration's excess-profits bill is unfair, and unjust because it does not allow sufficient or proper relief or protection for small and new corporations. Our experiences of the recent global war prove that the small and newborn companies are essential to full and all-out production. Furthermore, the administration's bill will retard and hold back the expansion of industry. It is another example of the Truman tax program and follows out the President's gospel of advocating tax legislation which is not based on sound or equitable foundations.

The Republicans offer the House an excess-profits-tax bill based on common sense, fairness, and sound judgment which will siphon off excess profits resulting from stimulated war production which will not be inflationary and will be fair to all.

In addition to this, the Republican tax measure would raise hundreds of millions of dollars more than the administration's bill. It would gather in the definite war profits and would treat all production, big and small, on a more fair and equitable basis.

Congress must be vigilant to see that there are no undue profits developing from war production.

The Real Case Against Ilse Koch

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ISIDORE DOLLINGER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, December 5, 1950

Mr. DOLLINGER. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent, I include in the Appendix of the RECORD a feature story by Victor Lasky, staff writer of the New York World-Telegram and Sun, which appeared in this newspaper on November 25, 1950. This article gives us the true case against Ilse Koch, whose proven depravities as the wife of the Nazi commandant of the notorious Buchenwald concentration camp shocked the world. The above-mentioned story follows:

TWO HUNDRED TO LINK ILSE KOCH, TATTOO COLLECTOR, TO MURDER AND LUST—RETRIAL OF SADISTIC WIFE OF BUCHENWALD CAMP BOSS WILL CITE TORTURES, KILLINGS

(By Victor Lasky)

Ilse Koch, whose proven depravities as the wife of the Nazi commandant of the notorious Buchenwald concentration camp shocked the world, goes on trial again Monday in a German court.

And the World-Telegram and Sun can disclose exclusively today the gist of what the German Government intends to prove against the once arrogant, now humble, woman whose case has become an international cause célèbre.

MURDER, LUST, LOOT

More than 200 witnesses will be called by the Bavarian prosecutor, Dr. Johann Ilkow, in an effort to prove conclusively that the notorious Ilse had dedicated her life to murder, lust, and loot.

More than 70 of these witnesses will be called to testify that she actually had ordered tattooed men killed and skinned. Evidence will be produced to show how she used the tattooed skin—as well as dried shrunken heads—to make lampshades and ash trays.

If Dr. Ilkow succeeds in proving that she had a sadistic penchant for geegaws made of human skin, he will have accomplished what United States war crimes prosecutors failed to do.

CLAY'S ROLE RECALLED

For Gen. Lucius D. Clay, then American military governor in Germany, commuted her life sentence to 4 years when he decided that the charges were not satisfactorily proved.

Frau Koch had insisted that none of the charges was true. She testified that she was a good SS wife whose sole interest was her home and children. She said she knew nothing of her husband's business.

General Clay disputed her version of her 7-year reign at Buchenwald. Making clear he had no sympathy whatsoever for that vile woman, he declared that the major charges against her were based on hearsay, not factual evidence.

NO CONVINCING EVIDENCE

"There was no convincing evidence," General Clay stated, "that she selected inmates for extermination in order to secure tattooed skin or that she possessed any articles made of human skin."

News of the commutation aroused Nationwide protests. The Veterans of Foreign Wars, terming it arbitrary and unwarranted, called for a full and complete investigation.

Dr. Robert S. Marcus, New York director of the World Jewish Congress, an organization which led the fight for a new trial, declared:

"Failure to implement the sentence will weaken the hands of our democratic friends and those who believe that a democratic Germany is essential for the preservation of world peace."

SENATE INVESTIGATION

"We must show the Germans that we are determined to punish those who are guilty of crimes against humanity, if we are ever to stop the rising tide of nationalism, militarism, and anti-Semitism now rampant in their country."

The Congress, representing Jewish organizations in 56 countries, finally succeeded in spurring a Senate investigation.

The Senate subcommittee headed by Senator HOMER FERGUSON, Republican, of Michigan, described Frau Koch as a person of widespread infamy for whom 4 years was not just punishment. The Ferguson group demanded a new trial.

FORMER PRISONERS TESTIFY

General Clay thereupon requested German authorities to determine whether the evidence called for a new trial. Dr. Ilkow conducted an 18-month investigation which took him to the United States where he obtained numerous depositions from former Buchenwald inmates.

On the basis of Dr. Ilkow's findings, Frau Koch was arrested by German police as soon as she was freed from an American military prison in October 1949. Last May, she was indicted on charges of having incited to murder on 45 occasions and of having attempted to incite 135 killings.

The question of double jeopardy is bound to come up in the early stages of the trial. Dr. Alfred Seidl, the defense counsel who has represented Rudolf Hess and other Nazi war criminals, will argue that no person may be tried twice for the same crime.

But Dr. Ilkow will argue that she is not being tried for the same crime. Under the new indictment Frau Koch has been accused of crimes against German nationals, he will state. She originally was charged with crimes against non-Germans.

"Crimes and offenses which Germans committed against Germans are no violation of the laws of war; they do not violate international law but the German penal law," Dr. Ilkow will claim.

If the court upholds Dr. Ilkow he will call numerous witnesses to establish anew Frau Koch's complete depravity.

Born in Dresden 44 years ago, Frau Koch met her husband, Karl Koch, in 1934, when he was an SS officer in that city. Their marriage, a Wagnerian spectacle, took place at night in the open. The light was provided by torches carried by SS officers. Her husband, a friend of Adolf Hitler, was given command of Buchenwald in 1937.

THE REAL COMMANDANT

Before long she established herself as the real commandant in the eyes of not only the terrified inmates but the SS guards, Dr. Ilkow will charge.

Her presence was feared by the guards, who knew she would report the slightest infraction to her husband.

"The SS guards, knowing she was the real commandant, eagerly complied with her every whim," Dr. Ilkow will state. "The slightest hint on her part was sufficient to make any SS officer commit any crime."

SEX-CRAZED WOMAN

Dr. Ilkow will picture Frau Koch as a "sex-crazed" woman who liked to strut around Buchenwald in riding clothes, snapping a whip and shouting obscenities constantly.

She would take particular delight in permitting inmates to gaze at her buxom sweatered figure and then having them whipped as the price for having looked.

In all, 201 witnesses will be called. They will include writers, professors, Catholic priests, Protestant ministers, German parliamentary and police officials, and others who had the misfortune of having made her acquaintance at Buchenwald.

INSTITUTZ PROCEDURE

The highlight of the trial will come, however, when Dr. Ilkow begins presenting the tattoo-skin evidence. He will describe the operations of the pathological institute founded at Buchenwald in 1941.

"The names of all tattooed inmates were reported to the institute," Dr. Ilkow will say. "They then were photographed and examined by doctors.

"Those whose tattoos were found usable were murdered by injections. The bodies were then prepared for skinning. The skins were tanned and made transparent. There is no doubt on the basis of the evidence that the skins were used to make lampshades and other objects."

CHOOSY ABOUT DESIGNS

Frau Koch's participation in this macabre work will be detailed by witnesses, five of whom will testify that she visited the institute regularly to examine the photographs of tattooed inmates. Those whose designs she liked would disappear quickly.

"When it became known that Ilse Koch was interested in tattooed inmates, they were warned by the 'illegal' camp leaders to be fully clothed in their presence," Dr. Ilkow will state.

The former inmates will testify that one summer day Frau Koch, passing a laborers' unit, noticed two inmates with attractive tattoos on their chests. She asked them for their numbers, which she marked down in the big red book she always carried. The next day they disappeared.

SIMILAR INCIDENTS

Dozens of similar incidents will be cited, Dr. Ilkow will say.

Dr. Ilkow will charge that the murders were carried out by Dr. Waldeman Hoven who "did everything Ilse Koch wanted him to do." Dr. Hoven, who has since been executed as a war criminal, was one of Ilse's many lovers.

SHE USED THE WHIP

Her dalliances, even with inmates, will also be spread on the record.

Another accusation against her will be that she personally whipped inmates. Witnesses will testify that she beat them with a riding whip. Several will show scars they still carry from the dreadful whippings, performed under the eyes of SS guards.

Her denials that she had even been an onlooker at the beatings of prisoners will be contested by other witnesses who will swear that either they or other inmates had been beaten unmercifully in her presence as they lay naked on a "whipping table."

"Witnesses will also testify that when inmates were beaten into unconsciousness she would hysterically goad the SS men on into finishing them off," Dr. Ilkow will charge.

But even if Frau Koch is found guilty of all the new charges, the worst punishment she can receive is life imprisonment. Under a new German law, the death penalty is outlawed.

Even in prison she has managed to gratify her lust. While in the American prison she told astonished officials: "I am pregnant." An investigation led to the discovery that a fellow prisoner had tunneled his way to her cell.

Excess-Profits-Tax Bill of 1950

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HUGH B. MITCHELL
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, December 5, 1950

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Speaker, in this period of national emergency everyone must do his share. American soldiers today are laying down their lives in Korea. By this excess-profits-tax legislation we insist that others lay down their dollars to help defray cost of military preparedness.

The ordinary peacetime objections to excess-profits-tax legislation have no place in this debate. These are no ordinary times. We are in a war situation. Let us face up to it. It is called a cold war, but it is getting hotter every day with the Chinese Communists' intervention in North Korea.

The President has called upon the Congress for new huge expenditures. Outlays for military and atomic-energy programs for the present fiscal year will approach $50,000,000,000, more than the total national budget for all Government expenditures in the postwar years. The gross national product of the economy is being turned out at a rate approaching $300,000,000,000 a year. With so large a portion of this output going for military purposes, dangers of inflation are self-evident. The excess-profits tax will not only remove some of this inflationary pressure, but it will yield a portion of the revenues necessary to pay for the defense program. The tax is based upon this principle of equity: Those who receive the greatest profits from the defense boom should pay back to the Government a portion of those profits above an average for the past few years.

Corporation profits are running high and running ahead of everything else. During 1950 corporate profits will reach the unprecedented level of $37,000,000,000 before taxes, or $3,000,000,000 above the peak year of 1948. The present excess-profits-tax bill will be collected from less than a quarter of all corporations. Those are the corporations that get the defense business. Small corporations for the most part will come within the credit exemptions provided in the bill.

During my campaign for reelection I told people in my district that excess-profits legislation was one of the first issues to be dealt with when the Congress reconvened. I wish to commend the Committee on Ways and Means for its diligence in reporting out H. R. 9827. This bill will not provide all the taxes we need. It is not easy to administer. Like all tax bills, it will create some inequities, but in view of less desirable alternatives and in the face of national emergency, it should be enacted without delay.

The people of this country are prepared to sacrifice. They insist, rightly, that the burdens be distributed fairly. It is our responsibility in Congress to do what must be done to make America strong and to ready our defenses against communism.

The Korean War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ARTHUR V. WATKINS
OF UTAH
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, December 5 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address by Hon. Herbert Hoover on the Korean war, broadcast on October 19, 1950, as published in the Washington Post this morning.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

This is a good time briefly to appraise our international situation and our foreign policies. After that appraisal I shall offer some suggestions.

If we take a broad retrospective view of American foreign policies over the years after 1933, we will find one outstanding feature. All that time American statesmanship became lost when it came to the borders of communism. And the consequences of our wanderings still crowd in upon us.

We first entered this swamp of lost statesmanship when we recognized the Communist government in 1933. Four Presidents and five Secretaries of State—Democrats and Republicans alike—had refused to invite Communist representatives into this American home of free men.

Those Americans knew that all Communists carried germs of conspiracy intended to turn America into a police state, to destroy all religious faiths, to overthrow the freedom of men and the independence of nations.

If you need any reminders of what they did to our hospitality, read again the repentant Communist confessions, the congressional exposure, the pleas of self-incrimination and the conviction of traitors in our courts.

These carriers of evil germs penetrated into high places of Government. They influenced national policies at the highest levels.

RESULTS OF RUSSIAN PACTS

I will not dwell at length upon our successive wanderings into these sinister borders of communism. However, I may mention our tacit alliance with Soviet Russia in June 1941, while Dictator Stalin and Hitler engaged in war of mutual exhaustion.

Many of us protested that such an alliance would spread communism over the earth. Beyond this, in the words of a profound student, Hanson Baldwin, "The great opportunity of the democracies for establishing a stable peace came on June 22, 1941, when Germany invaded Russia, but we muffed it."

I could recall the step-by-step acquiescences and appeasements of Soviet Russia after we entered the war. They were punctuated by agreements made in Moscow in October 1943; Tehran, 1 month later; Yalta, in February 1945; and Potsdam, in August that same year.

In net result we abandoned the principles of the Atlantic Charter and the freedoms of men. In the end, we acquiesced in actual Russian annexation of about 40,000,000 free people in northern Europe.

We acquiesced in her development of the governments of over 500,000,000 people of 13 nations behind the iron curtain in Europe and in Asia. Every stage of our relations saw compromises and defeats of American ideals and purposes.

LEGACY FROM LENIN

Due to the valor of our soldiers and the energies of our industries, we won military victory in the war.

But we lost the peace trying to appease the Communists.

We have constantly ignored Lenin's teachings which have been publicly known for 30 years. He said:

"As long as capitalism and socialism remain we cannot live in peace. In the end one or the other will triumph—a funeral requiem will be sung either over the Soviet Republic or over world capitalism.

"We have to use any ruse, dodges, tricks, concealment and veiling of the truth."

Every year Stalin vows his loyalties to Lenin's teachings. All these 17 years have confirmed these malignant policies.

If you want more evidence that these are the principles of Soviet Russia, just remember that within 12 years they have violated 36 solemn agreements with other nations.

They have vetoed efforts toward peace in the United Nations 45 times. They engineered the attack on Korea. And every day they engage in defamation of the American people.

There is a stern lesson for the American people from these 17 years of experience.

Every American who has tried to deal with them has come away with his face and hands smeared with red tar.

Every time our Government has attempted to cooperate with them, we become involved in a morass of lost statesmanship.

APPRAISALS OF SITUATION

The immediate problem which now confronts us is: How can we reorganize our instrumentalities for peace so as to give the world renewed hope? How can we secure peace—even an uneasy peace?

Before I make some suggestions, we must coldly appraise the world situation in which we find ourselves.

1. Our great hope is the United Nations. For 5 years with the one exception of the Korean action when the Russians were away on a blackmail strike, they have paralyzed that organization.

2. Nothing will stop Communist military aggression except an effective organized phalanx of the non-Communist world which will freeze the ambitions of the Kremlin.

3. We are told by many military authorities that Stalin could put 175 mobilized combat divisions on the European front within 90 days. We are told they have 30,000 tanks, thousands of planes, and the atom bomb.

We are told they have large reserve forces. We are told that the iron-curtain states have large armies poised for action. We are told they have huge forces in north Asia equipped by Russia.

In contrast we are told that the European nations now in the North Atlantic alliance do not have available to Europe more than 30 active combat divisions with some air and naval power, with which to meet this horde from behind the iron curtain. We are told that south Asia has but little military strength to oppose the Communists.

COMPARISON OF RESOURCES

4. The industrial potential of the United States can be overpowering in the long run. But Stalin, now having also the industrial power of the iron curtain states, can arbitrarily concentrate it on preparedness.

Western Europe with a larger population than the United States has as large or greater industrial power than that of Stalin. It is being little occupied in preparedness. It could be quickly mobilized and could constitute a doubly overwhelming balance of industrial power.

5. We must realize, and the world must realize, that 160,000,000 Americans cannot alone maintain the safety of the world against 800,000,000 Communists on the fronts of both Europe and Asia.

Nor can we out of our resources and manpower, contribute more than a minority part in such a phalanx of force.

6. We are told by the civilians and military leaders of our Government that we stand in the greatest of perils. We have inaugurated an immense military program.

The consequences of this program to our economic life are already evident. Under it taxes will take a greater portion of our national income than that taken by most non-Communist countries in Europe.

Already we are in the midst of a disastrous wave of inflation from its pressures. We must defer many needed improvements.

We can stand this for possibly 2 or 3 years pending a genuine rally by the non-Communist world to their full part in defense. But we must in time have relief from a large part of that burden.

We cannot carry the load for long without fulfilling Stalin's hopes of bleeding us economically to impotence.

KEYS TO MILITARY DEFENSE

7. There are three sources from which real military defense must come.

First. The European nations in the North American Alliance.

Second. The other non-Communist nations who are members of the United Nations, such as Canada, Latin America, the Middle East, South Africa, Australia, New Zealand, and some of the smaller South Asian countries.

Third. And there is the United States.

We will successfully clean up the Korean aggression under General MacArthur's brilliant generalship and teach a lesson.

However, our greatest danger point to all western civilization is Western Europe. It is obvious, with the threats in Asia, that the United States can supply only a minor part of this huge European deficiency even with our present program.

The time has come, therefore, to speak frankly what is in the mind of many Americans today. And I speak not only as one who has witnessed two world wars, but with substantial military advice.

We know that the European nations now in the North Atlantic Pact—with American aid—have reached a greater industrial productivity than they had before either World War I or World War II.

They have larger populations and more manpower than in those wars. In both those two wars, these peoples put in the field in 90 days more than 140 equipped and trained combat divisions in addition to naval and air forces.

BILLIONS FOR RESISTANCE

When the fabulous expenditures of various loans, together with the Marshall plan and the North Atlantic Pact were laid before the American people, certain results were promised.

It was emphasized that besides economic and social objectives these gigantic sums would build the European nations into a united military defense against aggression upon western civilization. It was represented as the American first line of defense.

We consented to these sacrifices primarily on this promise. It has been costly. Outside of lend-lease during the war, we have spent since the war ended in gifts and loans (which are also bound to be gifts) almost $20,000,000,000 in Europe on this faith.

We have not begrudged these huge sacrifices. But the result has been deeply disappointing to a growing body of Americans.

Competent observers are daily raising the serious question as to whether these nations, outside of Britain, have the will to fight, or even the will to preparedness. The actions and statements of their own leaders give little evidence of any real determination.

MOBILIZING OF FREE NATIONS

Chapter VII of the United Nations Charter is a specific agreement as to mobilization of effective military and economic forces from every member to stop aggression. It provides in detail for its organization and command.

For 5 years the Russians have thwarted any practical realization of that agreement.

I am glad to see the recent proposals for the better mobilization of military strength by the members of the United Nations to stop aggression. That was also a step in the right direction.

However, we must face reality. The United States ultimately must have relief from a considerable part of our present burdens. No patrols or token forces will present so grim a visage to Moscow as would choke their military ambitions.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

We need strong medicine in the shape of large and definite armies both from European members of the North Atlantic Pact and from the other non-Communist members of the United Nations.

METHOD OF ACTION PROPOSED

To get action, either the potency and organization of the United Nations under chapter VII should be so restored, notwithstanding Russian obstruction, as to take over a real job, or, alternatively, we should enlarge the North Atlantic Alliance into a world alliance which could in this fashion execute chapter VII of the Charter.

We should, in either case, ask all nations who want to stop Russian aggression once and for all to join and to specify what they will join with and when.

We should say at once that the United States, with all its resources, cannot long endure the present drain on our economy. And if that fails, the world goes into night.

But if we do not find real military action of powerful strength in Western Europe; if there is no definite and effective mobilization of the other members of the United Nations so as to take up the major burden of their own defenses, then we had better reconsider our whole relation to the problem.

In that event, we had better quit talking and paying, and consider holding the Atlantic Ocean with Britain (if they wish) as one frontier, and the Pacific Ocean with an armed Japan and other islands as the other frontier.

LOOKING FOR PEACE

Let there be no misunderstandings.

I am conveying no military secrets to the Kremlin. They are able to read the open books of the democracies from our congressional debates and our press, even if they have no other intelligence service.

I am giving no aid to Stalin by stimulating defense against him.

I am not talking of any such thing as attack or a preventive war. I abhor the thought of it.

What I propose is such defense as prevents attack upon us.

I advise no retreat from the Communist front. I vastly prefer a consolidated front in full strength rather than being forced to reform our lines by failure of other nations.

What we want is real peace. But if we cannot have that, at least we want an uneasy peace within the economic burdens which the United States can bear.

Our hope must be that the Russian people will sometime in perhaps the long future, throw off this evil regime as they did that of the czars.

Then real peace could come, because the mass of the Russian people themselves are a peaceful people. With faith in God that, I believe, will sometime be the outcome.

CHURCHILL'S VIEWS QUOTED

In confirmation, I need only to quote Winston Churchill who stated, in a public address, a few weeks ago:

"Imposing conferences have been held between military chiefs and experts, and a pretentious facade has been displayed by the governments responsible for our safety.

"In fact, however, apart from the establishment of an American bomber base in England, nothing has been done to give any effective protection to our people from being subjugated or destroyed by the Russian Communist Armies with their masses of armor and aircraft.

"I and others have given what warnings we could, but, as in the past, they fell on unheeding ears, or were used to sustain the false accusation of warmongering."

Mr. Churchill seemed to think Europe had only 2 years in which to arm.

Our American officials in the recent Conference of Foreign Ministers again urged the necessity of a unified European defense army embracing German components. That proposal has again been defeated or delayed.

AN ANSWER TO EUROPE

All this situation has come as a great shock to thinking Americans. These failures raise serious questions.

Are we being misled as to the seriousness of this situation? Have these nations such convincing evidence of the Kremlin's good intentions that they are not interested in defense?

Has Karl Marx paralyzed the will of nations for independence? Do they expect the United States and Britain to carry the whole load in case of attack?

The time has come when the American people should speak out in much stronger tones than the diplomatic phrases of conference halls.

We should be willing to aid, but if Western Europe wants defense from the Communist tide they must do most of it themselves, and do it fast.

Someone proposed that we at once increase our forces in Europe to 10 combat divisions. That would be only a slaughter of American boys unless many times that number were standing by their sides.

We should say, and at once, that we shall provide no more money until a definitely unified and sufficient European army is in sight. And, further, that 10 American divisions will not be landed until then.

Nor is such an army in Europe, even with American forces, alone sufficient to dull Kremlin ambitions in both Europe and Asia.

RESHAPING UNITED NATIONS

Five months ago, and again three months ago, I urged that the United Nations be so reorganized as to permit the mobilization of the non-Communist world on military, economic, and moral bases to meet these aggressions.

I suggested this could never happen with the Communist constantly making the United Nations impotent. I gave ample reasons.

The official reception of that idea was hostile. The press reception was sympathetic or favorable.

Every day since that statement was made has proved its validity. And the validity of that proposal was doubly proved 3 months ago, when, for the first time in all its history, due to the absence of the Communist, the United Nations has shown what real leadership could accomplish.

I have been gratified by the recognition of the validity of my suggestion by the proposals of a change in the rules of the United Nations by which Russian obstruction within that organization might be defeated.

People Will Respond to Need if Given Truth, Strong Leaders

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRED L. CRAWFORD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 5, 1950

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, the good people of the Eighth Congressional District of Michigan, like others throughout the country, are terribly disturbed about our involvments in the affairs of other countries. A very fine editorial, in the form of a letter to Senator HOMER FERGUSON, of Michigan, has been published in the Saginaw News, Saginaw, Mich.

The facts and questions presented in the letter are so much to the point in the light of current developments I submit the statement for the Appendix of the RECORD so that many more people of Michigan may have the opportunity to study the observations which the editor has presented:

PEOPLE WILL RESPOND TO NEED IF GIVEN TRUTH, STRONG LEADERS

UNITED STATES SENATOR HOMER FERGUSON,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: The people of the Saginaw Valley (and the same probably is true all over the country) are deeply and sorely troubled. They don't want war. They don't want to see any more of their young men sent off to meet death on a foreign battlefield. Yet they recognize that tragedy more overwhelming than war will result if America fails to meet the challenge.

One great fear dominates the people in this vital industrial area. It is a fear that America will too long be denied the leadership that is needed to guide us through the valley of the shadow of death to the sunshine of peace that can be ours if the forces of communism are confronted with a unified America working and ready to fight if necessary under leaders in whom the people can have confidence.

Can you not launch a petition calling upon Mr. Truman to place the responsibility for our foreign program—diplomatic and military—on the shoulders of Gen. Dwight D. Eisenhower or some other national figure equal to him in stature?

This newspaper, soon after the Korean War broke out June 25, urged that such action be taken. But all that Mr. Truman did was to remove Defense Secretary Johnson and replace him with Gen. George C. Marshall, whom all America respects but whose health does not make it possible for him to perform now for his country the glorious service he contributed during World War II. He will do all that he can but he needs effective help—and he can't get that from the men in whose hands this Nation's destiny now rests.

The blunders in judgment, the reversals of position and the unforgivable disregard of public opinion of which Secretary of State Acheson and others of Mr. Truman's coterie have been guilty would long ago have removed these men from command in any private industry.

With the Nation's very survival at stake, a housecleaning and establishment of responsible and capable leadership can no longer be delayed. We must have at the helm a man whose patriotism is so great that he will move ahead without regard for personal or political consequences.

There is evidence that Secretary Acheson was keenly aware of the dangers mounting in the Far East. But in the face of Mr. Truman's "everything is going to be fine" utterances, Mr. Acheson held his tongue and permitted the Nation to drift into the near catastrophe which now confronts us. That failure to speak out, frankly and publicly, when he was convinced personally of the President's ill-founded optimism was, in our opinion, grave weakness and a disservice to the Nation.

America has come to another crossroads. The challenge being offered by Moscow through the Chinese Communists finds us still thoroughly unprepared—even though we have had warning after warning.

The outbreak of war in Korea should have been recognized by the administration—as it was recognized by so many of us here at home—as a signal for all-out preparedness.

It was not so recognized, and the people were not given all the facts. Complacency and bungling went right on.

The Pentagon is currently planning and working toward a military force of no less than 5,000,000 men—perhaps two or three times that number—but the administration tells the people the goal is only 2 or 3 million. It is afraid the people would not understand.

Mr. Truman orders our Navy to neutralize Formosa and Chiang Kai-shek to refrain from attacking the Chinese mainland, but he does not tell the American people that this makes it possible for the Chinese Communists to move their armies away from that sector and up into Korea.

The administration places some pilot orders for naval torpedoes with an Ohio firm that makes automobile radiator cores—despite protests from that firm, which has had no experience with torpedoes, and from the firm which produced huge volumes of torpedoes during World War II and still has the know-how and much of the necessary equipment.

The administration, having seen heroic American forces win against great odds in South Korea, orders General MacArthur to move his men north across the thirty-eighth parallel in the full knowledge that this may precipitate a counterattack by the Chinese Communists—but has made no effective preparation for meeting that assault which now is upon us.

The administration pins much of its strategy on the hope that military assistance in the Far East will be given us by other members of the United Nations—but without getting advance assurances of the amount and timing of such assistance, which in most instances has now failed to materialize in anything but token degree.

The administration has permitted a hostile government (Red China) to commit an unquestionable act of war against us but refuses to recognize the act for what it is and to retaliate with all the weapons at our disposal.

The administration's record from Potsdam to the Yalu River has been one of unceasing errors in judgment. No wonder that the Communist world considers us weak and ready for conquest.

Unless all is to be lost the time for drastic action is here.

First, the American people must be given the full truth—by a man who they will know is speaking the full truth when he talks to them.

Then, and only then, will the people be ready to respond to such an appeal to prepare for the worst, as that which Secretary Acheson voiced so belatedly Wednesday night.

Whether the atomic bomb should now be used against the Red Chinese this newspaper does not profess to know. But we are convinced that no time should be lost in developing our military power to its greatest possible efficiency.

Events of the recent months have demonstrated that we can expect little actual help from any allies other than possibly Canada and Australasia.

This Nation must develop a fighting potential at least as great as that which it tossed aside when World War II subsided. Our need may even be much greater.

We believe the American people can be convinced that a fighting force of perhaps 15,000,000 men and women is needed to effectively put down the forces of anti-God which are creeping across the earth.

We believe the people who are not called for military service can be convinced that they will need to work 12 or more hours a day to produce the materials the fighting forces will need.

We believe the people can be convinced that the economic as well as military disaster which threatens is so great that taxes should be heavy enough to take from everyone on the home front—whether he works on an assembly line or in the front office—all the extra pay which he would receive for his extra war effort.

We believe the people can be convinced of all these things—but only when the helm of our ship of state has been placed in capable hands.

We hope you and like-minded men in Congress can do something quickly to bring about the changes that are needed.

God and the Welfare State

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. EUGENE D. O'SULLIVAN

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 4, 1950

Mr. O'SULLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, last Sunday, December 3, 1950, I received a letter postmarked Memphis, Tenn., from Rev. Charles Granville Hamilton, rector of St. Paul's Church in Corinth, Miss., containing a newspaper review of a speech which he made to the congregation of the Collegeside Congregational Church, Memphis State College, Memphis, Tenn., and a copy of the speech itself, both of which I believe are well worth reading.

The review of the speech published in the Trades and Labor News was as follows:

EPISCOPAL RECTOR DENOUNCES THE "ECONOMIC ROYALISTS" IN A SERMON AT COLLEGESIDE CHURCH

It was rather refreshing to hear that an Episcopal pastor last Sunday denounced from the pulpit of the Collegeside Congregational Church those whom he designated as the very evident group of "reactionary, economic royalists in the United States who are willing to betray their own country for the profit motive."

The Reverend Charles Granville Hamilton, rector of St. Paul's Church in Corinth, Miss., attacked the false religious leaders, the John T. Flynns and Edward Rumelys and Merwin Harts who tremble before progress, who shiver at the thought of better living conditions for all.

The subject of his sermon was God and the welfare state and based on the parable of Solomon and Rehoboam in the Bible. The Collegeside Congregational Church borders the campus of Peabody College and in past years has been noted for the down-to-earth sermons that have been delivered there by both the pastor, and visiting ministers.

He made it clear that his attack was aimed at the conservative element of the Republican Party. The men he called by name—Flynn, Rumely, and Hart—are affiliated with GOP policymakers and campaign strategists.

"We still have with us the Rehoboams and their ilk," Hamilton said. Like Rehoboam "after the New Deal of Solomon," "second rate self-starters, demagogues political and ecclesiastical, have come to the front with foolish dreams of turning back the clock of history.

"They are those who brought about, in their greed and stupidity, the tragic Hoover depression; they are those who helped finance the rise of the Nazi terror in their insane hatred of democracy; they are those who fought a war on labor while most of us were fighting the Nazi and the Japanese.

"We also have false religious leaders among us," Hamilton said.

"Hitler was helped into power by some men in pulpits who called the peaceful democratic Germany of the 1920's socialistic."

Referring to Flynn's book, Hamilton quoted "what his (Flynn's) own church says about the book."

" 'This is the most emotional, illogical, inaccurate, and probably even libelous book, which we have ever been foolish enough to purchase. He (Flynn) does a great disservice by indiscriminately fastening the label "socialistic" on a lot of organizations and programs which have yet to become "radical"—as the social encyclicals, for example. He concentrates his fire on the Federal Council and never so much as mentions the word Catholic. Perhaps he realized that it would be difficult, if not impossible, to persuade his readers that Pope Pius XI was a Socialist.' "

The quotation was taken from a statement by the National Catholic Welfare Conference.

Turning to the Welfare State, Hamilton said, "Our Government is meant as a welfare state. It exists for the welfare of the people. God created a welfare state in Eden. He recreated it in the wilderness and He projected it into the promised land. Read the laws of Exodus, Leviticus, Deuteronomy, with their concern for the the labor, the learning, the security, and the welfare of all people.

Hamilton said the forces of reaction, represented by Flynn and others, oppose all that Jesus taught. He said these forces have been denounced by members of their own political party—Republicans like Charles Taft, Henry Luce, Eric Johnston, John Foster Dulles, Mrs. Thomas Lamont, and Robert Patterson.

"Rehoboam's modern disciples also have their shields of brass to substitute for shields of gold. They talk about 'economy,' but the 'wasteful spending' they yodel about is spending for homes and health, on schools and highways, and against totalitarian enemies. They speak of the 'American way,' by which they mean, not the path the American people have chosen for 20 years, but the long-gone days of reaction and hunger. They speak of 'free enterprise' when they mean the right of great monopolies to destroy the free enterprise of the small-business man. Those who yell loudest for 'States' rights' are well oiled from beyond State lines, and not with Confederate money."

"The trick of all totalitarianism is to oppose democracy and to confuse it with socialism. The Communist technique today is to divide and conquer by such charges. All who try to undermine confidence in our Government are aiding Stalin. There is nothing Moscow loves to publish more than the words of our Rehoboams and Jeroboams."

Reverend Hamilton is a former religious radio commentator and taught political science at Vanderbilt University last year.

He is the author of several books of sermons and history and is now working on his doctor of philosphy degree at Vanderbilt. He has four degrees and has studied in 14 colleges and universities.

The speech itself was as follows:

GOD AND THE WELFARE STATE: THE AMERICAN ROAD TO THE LIFE ABUNDANT

(By Charles Granville Hamilton)

"So the king did not listen to the people." (II Chronicles 10: 15.)

There are still economic royalists who refuse to listen to the voice of the people, and to the voice of God.

After the wisdom of Solomon came the foolishness of Rehoboam. After the prosperity of Solomon came the disaster of Rehoboam. After the New Deal of Solomon came the reaction of Rehoboam. Second-rate self-starters, demagogs political and ecclesiastical, came to the front with foolish dreams of turning back the clock of history. They were foolish leaders, like the grafters of free-booting free enterprise of the days of Grant and of Harding, like the isolationists of the 1920's and the 1940's, like the 1930 American admirers of Hitler, like the French 200 families who preferred Hitler to social reform enough to betray their own country for the profit motive, like the Japanese who thought they could win a war by treachery, like some of the self-styled leaders who today offer us their services at a price—to save us from our Government and way of life.

Rehoboam was a spoiled and stupid half-wit, and he surrounded himself with his own type. Reared in the lap of luxury, a spoiled brat who had never done a lick of work, he felt that the laboring people were means ordained by God that his small set of snobs might enjoy life. When labor leaders asked for more rights and less hours, he put them off while he asked advice.

The old advisers of Solomon, who had led in the New Deal which had made Israel a major nation, warned Rehoboam that labor was the strength of his government, and they urged him to grant these reasonable requests. But not so the middle-aged morons with whom Rehoboam lounged in well-stocked clubs. These were no bright young men; the Scripture says that Rehoboam was 41 years old, and his fellow bourbons were of his age. They wanted to get tough with labor. They urged him to put labor in its place. Their language betrays evidence of alcoholic exhilaration. So Rehoboam proposed the first Taft-Hartley law. He rejected the New Deal advisers of his father who had brought prosperity and peace. He sneared in the best bourbon accents, "My father used whips on you, but I will whip you with scorpions."

This stupid hate-labor policy brought its usual results. He lost eleven-twelfths of his people. Of course, in almost any society, labor constitutes 90 percent of the public. Rehoboam tried to break their strike with force, but it did not work. So ended the united nation for which Saul, David, and Solomon had labored, fought, and planned—all because one mediocre mentality wanted to return to the days of labor exploitation.

Rehoboam also weakened his country in the international realm. God abandoned him, because he had abandoned God when he tried to oppress the people of God. Out of the pillared pagan temples of Egyptian enterprise came a Pharaoh and an army, and Rehoboam went under the iron curtain of Egypt. The shields of gold which symbolized the strength of Solomon were taken down to the gaudy temples of Egypt. Rehoboam replaced them with shields of brass, a pretense which fooled few.

We still have with us the Rehoboams and their ilk. They are those who brought about, in their greed and stupidity, the tragic Hoover depression; they are those who helped finance the rise of the Nazi terror in their insane hatred of democracy; they are those who fought a war on labor while most of us were fighting the Nazis and the Japanese. The descendants of Rehoboam are those who tremble before progress, who shiver at the thought of better living conditions for all, who faint at the mention of the name of the President whom Americans chose more often than any other, who shout "socialism" when they hear of anything their grandfather did not know, whose guilty consciences lead them to get tough with others, because they are weak in themselves.

Rehoboam was surrounded by John T. Flynns and Edward Rumeleys and Merwin Harts. We still have archisolationists, psychopaths frustrated in their desires for Federal appointments, smearers of all whom the American people have found nobler than those who scorn them, ignoramuses who think that Tennessee, which has been under the banner of democracy since it began as the State of Franklin, was "bribed by TVA to support democracy," and who have the insanity to shriek that "we attacked the peaceful Japanese at Pearl Harbor," at the moment when such were writing for Japanese money. Like the sadistic pals of Rehoboam, they play Simon Legree, whipping the American people with scorpions of falsehood. They are not above smearing the churches of America with their poisoned pens. They take the word of a Presbyterian parson who was expelled from the church for good reason and use it to libel most of the Protestants in the country. Among 50 leading laymen who accused them of deliberately lying about the Federal Council are such "radicals" as Charles Taft, Henry Luce, Eric Johnston, Mrs. Dwight Morrow, Mrs. Thomas Lamont, Harper Sibley, Robert Patterson, Cleveland Dodge, John Foster Dulles. This is not a partisan matter, for every name in this list is a leading Republican who cannot stay silent while irresponsible smears are spread. Listen to what his own church, in the words of the National Catholic Welfare Conference, says about the book which has taken the place of the Bible for these rabble rousers of the rich:

"This is the most emotional, illogical, inaccurate, and probably even libelous book which we have ever been foolish enough to purchase. He does a great disservice by indiscriminately fastening the label 'socialistic' on a lot of organizations and programs which have yet to become radical—as the social encyclicals, for example. He concentrates his fire on the Federal council and never so much as mentions the word 'Catholic.' Perhaps he realized that it would be difficult, if not impossible, to persuade his readers that Pope Pius XI was a Socialist."

Other Rehoboam pals include men who have been declared to be Fascists by the American Legion and others who accepted millions of dollars of German money to use against us even while we were at war, and who went to the penitentiary for this treason. These are the men who prate about the Constitution and the American way and who delude lesser minds into smearing their intellectual betters who believe in democracy.

Rehoboam's modern disciples also have their shields of brass to substitute for shields of gold. They talk of economy, but the wasteful spending they yodel about is spending for homes and health, on schools and highways, and against totalitarian enemies. They speak of the American way, by which they mean not the path the American people have chosen for 20 years but the the long-gone days of reaction and hunger. They speak of free enterprise when they mean the right of great monopolies to destroy the free enterprise of the small-business man. Those who yell the loudest for States' rights are often well-oiled from beyond State lines, and not with Confederate money. Frank Owsley, one of the South's great historians, pointed out that the tombstone of the Confederate South should have on it "Died of States' rights," because it was traitors hiding behind that phrase who sabotaged their people's cause. Some of those who howl longest about States' rights manage consistently to take the side of the distilleries in other States over the laws of their own States. They take the sides of alien corporations against their own citizens; they accept retainers from foreign corporations to raise taxes on their own citizens; and they surrender the natural resources of their States to contemporary carpetbaggers while they sob ostentatiously over States' rights. Rehoboam's friends pour out propaganda by the carload—with sometimes not a fact in a carload—while they lament the propaganda of the Government which has not one administration weekly magazine in the Nation and not many daily papers. All these shields of gold have become sounding brass.

There is another evil character in this Bible story. His name is Jeroboam. He was a false religious leader. He substituted the worship of the golden calf for the worship of God. He just added the little letter "l" to turn God into gold. He is one of those men who regarded the ministry of God as a way of profit and prestige. He bore false witness against his neighbors and against his own people. He sought to arouse latent isolationism and he slandered opponents at home and abroad. Our contemporary Jeroboams also lash with scorpions of falsehood, the second-hand snakes they borrow from books, and, though they sanctimoniously swear that they do not profit from it, it is obvious that they do not get poorer by so doing.

Our Jeroboams can solemnly mouth ignorance and error about our British neighbors, even though they may post on their churches that they are British rather than American. They call compensation for injured workers, the 8-hour day, and Government payment of election expenses socialism, in their ignorance that these came into the United States under Andrew Jackson. They smear the Liberal Party, which has the support of most Baptists, Congregationalists, Methodists, and Presbyterians in that land. They ignore the forged Zinoviev letter by which the Tories won an election on charges of communism. They blame the Labor Party, which was not in power, for the Tory policy of Baldwin and Chamberlain which appeased Hitler and which failed to prepare for war. They rant that the English people are worse off than they were during the war, which is palpably untrue. They forget that Britain still has rich men left, that 80 percent of industry, including such business as ships, planes, autos, chemicals, textiles, and all trade is still in private hands. They fail to note that the Tory Party in its recent campaign promised not to change any of these social gains, or that Britain has made more gains in recovery than any other nation in Europe.

The Jeroboams have no scruples against slandering our own country and our own people. It is deliberate and malicious misrepresentation to say that the Government, the American people have chosen for two decades is a Socialist government which decided to change the American system, to tax and spend, to browbeat and bludgeon men into doing the will of the Government. It is appealing to avarice and vindictiveness to charge that class consciousness has been aroused by avarice and vindictiveness. The Jeroboams prey on appeals to snobbery, class feeling, spite and avarice, and any student of psychology can understand why they attack in others what their consciences condemn in themselves. They are so sure these bad qualities are confined to the masses—by which they mean those common people who heard Jesus gladly. They disclose their political naïveté by imagining that a political party could be bought for $500,000; they should learn that some corporations spend that much in one senatorial race. They are also naive enough to state that in our early days as a Government each community built and controlled its own schools and churches They demonstrate that they feel wiser than Jesus by serving both God and mammon. They denounced any taxation based on ability to pay, even though endorsed by all great Americans of the past regardless of party. They sneer at do-gooders, because they know that they are doing good. They have cut out of their Bibles that love of money is the root of all evil. They can look unmoved at drab and dingy slums and congratulate the greed that prevents their rebuilding.

The combined ignorance and falsehood of our Jeroboams is shown in their charges against Americans for Democratic Action. To call it as American as Stalin is to talk like Stalin. Walter Reuther has been shot twice, because of his opposition to communism—which will never be true of our Jeroboams; David Dubinsky and Justice Felix Frankfurter, long-time fighters against totalitarianism, are smeared because of religious prejudice—a lovely spectacle for men preaching, presumably, from a Jewish volume; while the people of Illinois, a literate wealthy State, are insulted, because they have an intelligent leader in university and in government like PAUL DOUGLAS. A $64 prize for ignorance should be awarded to anyone who would include John L. Lewis in the ADA, with which he has never been connected, and who would identify him with the party which he has opposed in 9 out of 10 elections. When the Jeroboams rave of "increasing race and class consciousness" and of "setting section against section," it might be interesting to ask: "Who paid for the literature of racial hatred in the last election, and in previous elections? What groups have played on religious hatred for a generation? Who financed the efforts to arouse sectionalism in an insanity of fear, to stop democracy? Are these the men to whom we are to turn, the apostles of blind bigotry and of pseudo-sectionalism? Have our Jeroboams never read St. John: 'If any man say, I love God and hateth his brother, he is a liar?'"

Our Jeroboams show their ignorance of American government when they prate of the millions spent by Presidents. Under the American system, no President spends a penny of our money; Congress must appropriate every cent that is spent; and we have certainly not had "socialist" Congresses. No man who has spent most of his life in the South would be likely to sneer at the present government which is led by southerners—as Vice President, President of the Senate, Speaker of the House, Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, to say nothing of a President of Confederate ancestry, Secretary of the Treasury—these are our neighbors, and have lived in the South all their lives, unlike some of their critics. And three-fourths of the money these southerners have led Congress in spending has been spent to stop Nazis and Communists. Would our Jeroboams prefer totalitarianism?

Our Jeroboams fail to understand that when we buy our autos from Michigan, our plows from Illinois, and our dresses from New York, only a national system of taxation can fairly return some of our money that has strayed from home. They are also ignorant enough not to know that Maine potatoes are subsidized by their friends, and they fail to realize that the farmer is just beginning to get the aid from the Government which business has had for 160 years. The Jeroboams do not stop from blasphemy, parodying the beloved Twenty-third Psalm with cheap partisan claptrap. They wish for an H-bomb, because they have managed to miss all bombs. They can self-righteously thank God that they are not like other men and can ask God to save America through them—it should be "from them." The old temptation of Satan in the garden is repeated by the Jeroboams, "You shall be as Gods." Hitler was helped into power by some men in pulpits who called the peaceful democratic Germany of the 1920's socialistic. They got their reward.

Listen to what my good friend Hodding Carter, another Mississippi Episcopalian, has to say about such preaching—and you might recall that Hodding Carter supported Governor Dewey in the last election:

"By unhappy coincidence I have read during Easter week a widely publicized sermon which in a good many ways strays as far from the philosophy of the Man whose resurrection the Christian world celebrates as it does from the political and economic realities of our world. If he means that these long-ago English achievements were dangerous and undemocratic, he is talking poppycock. What he is saying is that the freemen of the Socialist countries of Europe who live defiantly under the very guns of Soviet Russia are no better than the Red enemy against whom they stand allied with us. Were the Socialist Norwegian enemies of the liberties of men, those Scandinavian fighters who died while we in America prattled? Are the Socialist Swedes such enemies? Are social planners, as such, enemies of the people—Jefferson, Lincoln, Wilson? The H-bomb statement may make a big hit in some quarters, but not among those who have seen nations almost die under bombs, not among those who have seen war-crushed nations rise again in the only way they could, through government-directed action for which no private alternative existed. It is sad that such words should be spoken on a sabbath or any other day. It is sadder and more dangerous to American solidarity that its divisive message should gain such wide distribution. And it is saddest of all to recall how long ago it was that a Man moaned a broken-hearted prayer from a cross, asking His Father to forgive those who knew not what they did."

The American way is not the way of Rehoboam and Jeroboam; it is neither the road to ruin proposed by those who hateth the men who do the work of the world, not the road to the idolatry of the golden calf set up by the proselyters of privilege and plunder. The American way is the way of the God-fearing men and women who came to Jamestown and Plymouth and St. Augustine and New Amsterdam and Biloxi. It is the cry of that immortal human document which proclaims that all men are created equal and are entitled to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. The Jeroboams who do not believe in any kind of equality are obviously not American in spirit; they should be investigated for un-American activities. Those who did not grow up in the American way of life do not always understand it, and anyone who engraves on a public building that he is not from the United States may not know enough to criticize the United States.

We choose our own officials, and we change them when they do not suit us. We are the Government. In seven of the last 10 presidential elections, in most of the past 40 years, we have chosen the way which critics call socialistic. The American people know better. Our Government is meant as a welfare state. It exists for the welfare of the people. The Confederation, our first free Government, used the word and purpose of welfare. The Constitution repeats the word and the purpose. It was Gov. Thomas E. Dewey who said that.

"Anyone who thinks that an attack on the fundamental idea of security and welfare appeals to the people generally is living in the Middle Ages. Everybody wants welfare and security in one form or another. I have never met anyone who did not want welfare and security."

In the past decade not one further phase of American life has been socialized. We have had socialized public schools since the days of Andrew Jackson. We have had a socialized Army and Navy since we rejected mercenary Hessians in 1776. We have had a socialized postoffice since the time of Benjamin Franklin. TVA is not new; those not brought up in the American way of life may fail to realize that 40 years ago most towns owned their own electric power. We have more free enterprise than we have ever had, right now. We have more private businesses, more successful businesses, more income for all, more corporation profits, even more rich people, more crops, more jobs, more buildings, more roads, better health, more education.

The American people are not afraid of words. Just because Chicken-Little felt an acorn fall on his head, we do not believe the sky is falling. The American people chose Thomas Jefferson though he was charged with being a "Red, atheist, Socialist, French radical," and though the Rev. Timothy Dwight warned his upper-crust congregation that the election of Jefferson would close all churches and dissolve all marriages. But the sage of Monticello gave us enlarged lands, honest government, social welfare, and liberty. Rev. Horace Binney told Philadelphians that the Constitution and free elections would disappear if Andrew Jackson was elected. Jackson was accused of wanting "to share all property, to enslave free labor, and to destroy churches." Instead there came wider democracy and more education through the hero who sleeps at the Hermitage. Some clergymen accused Woodrow Wilson of socialism and dictatorship. Yet through that scholar in politics, that Christian in government, came Federal aid for schools and roads, and farms, protection for labor and banks and honest businessmen, and a vision of world peace we still cherish. Socialism, communism, dictatorship, and grass growing in city streets were charges as to what Franklin D. Roosevelt would bring. It was openly charged in 1936 that that was the last election we would have. Instead we not only have more income for labor and farmer and business, but even more profits for railroads, power companies, insurance companies, banks, and great corporations. We also got social security, more rights for those who work on farm or in factory, and the strength to win the worst of wars. Today the words have not even changed; the same charges made against Jefferson, Jackson, Wilson, and Roosevelt are parrotted by the Rehoboams and the Jeroboams. The trick of all totalitarians is to oppose democracy and confuse it with socialism. The Communist technique today is to divide and conquer by such charges. All who try to undermine confidence in our Government are aiding Stalin. There is nothing Moscow loves to publish more than the words of our Rehoboams and Jeroboams.

The biblical way, like the American way, is not the way of labor-baiting Rehoboams or profit-seeking Jeroboams. God has no other purpose in human government than that it is for the welfare of all. "The earth hath He given to mankind. The profit of the earth is for all." This is the purpose of creation.

God created a welfare state in Eden. He recreated in the wilderness, and He projected it into the Promised Land. Read the laws of Exodus, Leviticus, Deuteronomy, with their concern for the labor, the learning, the security, the welfare of all the people. The democracy in the desert and in the land of promise was for the welfare of all. The revolution of David against the economic royalists brought in a welfare state, which the wisdom of Solomon continued. The divided nation only flourished when it was for the welfare of the people. The last line in the historical books of the Old Testament praises one who sought the welfare of his people in government.

Psalmist and proverb writer extolled the state where there was abundance for all. Isaiah insists that God is primarily interested in justice to the poor and needy, and he pictures the welfare state that is to come. Jeremiah defines faith in these terms: "He defended the cause of the poor and needy; was not this to know Me, saith the Lord?" Amos saw justice as a mighty torrent sweeping away human exploitation, and Micah foresaw the time when every man should sit under his own vine and fig tree, with none to disturb his social security. Zechariah saw holiness in all the life of a welfare state, from the pensions of the old to the playgrounds of the children. Malachi reminded men of their common brotherhood under one Father of justice.

The Jesus who drove the money changers out of the temple was not in the ministry for prestige and profit. He came preaching good news to the poor. Blessed were the poor, and lost was Dives for ignoring the need of social justice. Jesus' final test of judgment was, "Inasmuch as ye did it unto the least of these my brethren." Christ came to bring the more abundant life and He included in that realm the daily bread as well as the food of the spirit.

Naturally, the early church narrated in Acts was a complete welfare state in itself. St. Paul urged the Corinthians that there be an equality. St. James announced that the poor were God's chosen people. In the pages of the New Testament there are only two bitter opponents of the welfare state—Judas and Ananias. And the Bible closes with a picture of a world welfare state, a redeemed city in which men will bring all the wealth and glory of the nations, and God Himself will dwell among them. Dare we be wiser than God?

Almost 20 years ago Franz Werfel was booed off a lecture platform in East Prussia, because he told students that their real problem lay in a choice, not between right and left, but between above and below. He had to leave the hall under the protection of the police because of this. Today most of those students are dead soldiers of the swastika; for them he was correct. The choice for us, also, is not between right and left. It is between above and below. The choice is between good and evil, unselfishness and selfishness, character or littleness, welfare or ill fare. It is what goes on in our hearts and minds which makes our decision for below, or for above, in the fateful future which faces us. Shall we follow Rehoboam and Jeroboam, or Jeremiah and Jesus?

"O God of earth and altar,
Bow down and hear our cry,
Our earthly rulers falter,
Our people drift and die;
The walls of gold entomb us,
The swords of scorn divide,
Take not Thy thunder from us,
But take away our pride.

"From all that terror teaches,
From lies of tongue and pen,
From all the easy speeches
That comfort cruel men,
From sale and profanation
Of honor and the sword,
From sleep and from damnation,
Deliver us, good Lord.

"Tie in a living tether
The priest and prince and thrall,
Bind all our lives together,
Smite us and save us all;
In ire and exultation,
Aflame with faith and free,
Lift up a living nation,
A single sword to Thee."

Support the President

REMARKS
HON. ALBERT THOMAS
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, December 5, 1950

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, during these days of terrible stress and strain, when the whole country is upside down, so to speak, and we are all worried sick, I want to commend to the House an editorial that was written by Hon. Jesse Jones, of Houston, Tex., appearing in the Houston Chronicle of yesterday. It is the finest thing I have ever read. The title of it is "Support the President." Read it. Every man, woman, and child in this Nation ought to read this editorial. It is filled with good common horse sense. We are all in this horrible thing alike.

The editorial is as follows:

SUPPORT THE PRESIDENT

The people of the United States must accept the fact that the danger to our freedom and our safety is as great today as ever in our history.

We have not been shocked by any such overt act as the blowing up of the Maine, the sinking of the Lusitania, the bombing of Pearl Harbor.

Yet there is today more reason for united patriotism than any of those happenings brought forth. There is no visible line at this moment between peace and war. We can avoid the horrors of a third world-wide conflict only by some circumstance, as yet not known, which we may live to call miraculous.

In this grave crisis Americans must close ranks and rally around the President.

It is easy to criticize and bring recriminations against those who in one way or another may have permitted the situation to deteriorate to the dangerous point it has reached.

But now is not the time for assessing blame. That can wait until we have worked out of the mess in which we find ourselves. Unless we can find a way, ruin faces us and generations to come.

Our problem is to find a course midway between appeasement and total war, if possible.

No one is willing to continue appeasement of the Communists because it is realized only too well that appeasement, once started, will never end until everything has been turned over to them or we turn in desperation with our backs to the wall. Then we would have war and have it under less favorable conditions than if it came today.

No one is willing to advocate action which will bring immediate war on a global scale. We remember the horrors of the recent war too vividly. The fighting in Korea, which has already cost us 31,000 casualties, is a small sample of what would come with a world-wide conflict.

To find a middle course and steer it steadily calls for the combined intelligence of the whole country.

President Truman must depend on the advisers that surround him. Admittedly, some of them are far from what the situation demands. But a negative position of criticizing what they do gets us nowhere. If the citizens in whom the country has confidence come forward and offer their advice in a constructive manner, we believe the President will accept it and accept it gratefully.

The President is the executive head of the Nation. He is also something of a national symbol, around which the Nation must rally in time of danger.

The man in the White House no longer represents either the majority or the minority of the people in the United States. He speaks for each and every one of the 150,000,000 inhabitants of this country.

His words and his deeds will influence the future course of the world, for he must make the decisions now which will cast their sunshine or shadow upon us all for generations.

No one has the authority to supplant the President of the United States in such a crisis. None but he can advocate a course of action to meet the present dangers. What would you do if you were the President of the United States?

It is not sufficient to recommended one step. What would you do to meet the countless considerations which the President of the United States has to take into account?

Would you discard all hope of peace while there existed even the slightest glimmer of hope for such an eventuality?

Would you commit all your forces in Asia to let Europe shift for itself?

Would you abandon the effort to maintain the solidarity of world opinion which flamed against the agressors in Korea on June 25?

Would you limit the money needed for more active preparations to meet the threat of war in order to keep the tax rates down?

Would you restrict the use of critical materials or let business as usual absorb these commodities as it sees fit?

Would you do nothing to halt inflation through credit curbs?

Would you call for an army of 2,000,000, of 3,000,000 or 4,000,000 men?

If you can answer a single one of these questions without inner qualification and without shuddering at the responsibility which your action would entail, you may have a right to do something other than fall in step behind the Commander in Chief.

Since no one can, it is the universal duty of every loyal American to close ranks, abandon partisanship and embrace as his or her patriotic duty, all-out defense of the country and all-out support of the President of the United States.

It is Harry S. Truman whom fate has chosen to head this country in this time of extreme crisis.

We all should give him every help. And we should pray for divine guidance as he makes decisions affecting all Americans and all the world.

The best that is in us all, spirtually and intellectually, is called for.

We cannot do less than offer all. We must show as much patriotism at home as our sons are showing on the bloody fields of Korea. And we must show it today. Tomorrow may be too late.

Resolutions to Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, December 5, 1950

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Speaker, I am presenting herewith resolutions adopted at the annual meeting of the United Farmers of Minnesota, which was held at Wanamingo, Minn., on November 25, 1950:

To the Congress of the United States of America and to the Executive Department:

We, the United Farmers of Minnesota, Inc., assembled in the third State convention at Wanamingo, Minn., November 25, 1950, submit the following resolutions:

"We resolve that—

"1. There shall be no trade barriers between areas within the United States for quality farm products produced in any section of this country, when such products meet the requirements of Federal law.

"Such action is vital to the future welfare of Midwest dairy farmers who are now stopped from selling milk and cream in 36 large consuming areas under the Milk Marketing Agreement Act of 1937, and because of local and State regulations.

"We propose the adoption of a national sanitary standard for milk and other dairy products as established by the United States Public Health Service to supersede local and State regulations.

"2. Prices on competitive imports of farm products shall be established at a cost of production of those same products raised domestically. The present program under the reciprocal trade agreements can break the domestic price structure, destroy support programs, and work great injury to American agriculture, labor, and industry.

"3. Cost of production floor prices in the market place for agricultural products shall be determined by Federal statute and enforced under a two-price system, the farmer to take a loss on any surplus domestically produced that is exported and not needed for American consumption.

"4. Section 117 (j) of the Internal Revenue Code shall be interpreted by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to abide by the decisions of the courts as in the case of R. W. Albright, of Kenyon, Minn., wherein the Eighth Circuit Court of Appeals held that the Commissioner's interpretation of section 117 (j) was 'contrary to the plain language of 117 (j) and to the intent that Congress expressed in it.' We propose that Congress adopt the Thye amendment under the Revenue Act of 1950 to clarify this situation.

"We claim that farm animals kept for draft, dairy, or breeding purposes are long-term capital assets and income from the sale of such assets shall be only 50 percent taxable, just as other long-term capital gains are 50 percent taxable.

"5. Proposals for socialized medicine, socialized Federal housing, and socialized education be rejected.

"6. The Department of Agriculture be made entirely independent from any organization representing farmers.

"7. The Brannan farm plan be rejected.

"8. Congress appoint a special committee to study the health and economic phases of present methods of fertilizer manufacture, investigate the monopolistic control of the phosphate market, and explore the possibilities of using surplus organic materials as fertilizers, thus adding new humus to the soil and aiding the work of soil bacteria.

"We claim that continued use of certain chemical fertilizers are harming the soil as well as impairing the health of the Nation.

"9. Highly skilled, irreplaceable farm laborers shall be given more consideration to prevent them from being called into the draft. Farm labor shortages are already serious and floaters and poor farm hands cannot be used under present-day highly skilled farming methods."

Political Post Mortem—Series I

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. EUGENE D. O'SULLIVAN

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 5, 1950

Mr. O'SULLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, ordinarily speaking political as well as other post mortems are not only disagreeable but are very uninteresting except to those who have a primary interest in the belated operation.

In the present instance however, I feel that I am justified in calling attention to the type of a campaign which I made in my unsuccessful attempt to be reelected, because of the misinformation going the rounds in Nebraska to the effect that it was not a constructive one but was a sort of a knock-down and drag-out affair.

In any event doctors sometimes find post mortems necessary and informative and I see no reason why legislators cannot profit from same, particularly when it might disclose the pernicious influences which are now and have been stalking the land.

The following speech was delivered over radio station WOW on October 6, 1950:

Good evening ladies and gentlemen of the radio audience. I come to you tonight by transcription to open my radio campaign for reelection to the House of Representatives, a position to which you so generously elected me 2 years ago.

I need your help very badly again because frenzied greed and selfishness is hot on my political trail. As your Congressman, I worked for my salary alone. I worked diligently in the interests of the people and the question now is, Will the people in return support me? I hope so.

I come to you tonight without apologies for my doings or my record for the past 2 years in Congress. I believe that record is as good as that of any other Congressman who was a member of the Eighty-first Congress. I kept my promises to the people as all of you well know.

You are my bosses—the only bosses I recognize, because it was through your votes that I was elected.

The record shows that I have tried in every way possible to benefit all of the people of the Second Congressional District. I attended sessions of Congress faithfully. I received more than 12,000 letters from constituents during my nearly 2 years in office. The requests were varied.

I believe I can safely say that very few of these people failed to have their requests granted. I secured positions, some of them rather high positions in the Government, for a number of persons. I aided business institutions of my district in securing loans from the RFC and in other ways, including the getting of Government contracts for the sale of their products. Altogether I would say that more than a thousand citizens of the Second District were benefited financially by my aid in these matters. And never once did I ask the politics of those making these requests. You can readily see that this sort of a course of action entails a lot of hard work—work efficiently performed by my entirely Nebraska staff of workers, all of whom worked in my Washington office.

I was delighted when Speaker SAM RAYBURN and the Democratic leadership named me as a member of the Committee on Agriculture, which is so important to our midwestern territory.

In passing may I remind you that I am the only Democratic Congressman elected to the Eighty-first Congress in the House of Representatives from six States—Iowa, North Dakota, South Dakota, Wyoming, Kansas, and Nebraska—and I have tried during the past 2 years to carry out the wishes of persons in those States who felt that they could not rely upon their Republican Members to accomplish their objectives.

On the floor of the House, I devoted all of my energies on behalf of the people, big and little. I fought for the interests of labor, of the farmer, of the veterans, of decent business, and of the common people generally. For this I have been rather severely criticized by certain cliques in the higher stratas of business and society, but, as I said in the beginning, I have no apologies to make for my record. I will not change my stand in one iota if I am returned to Washington for the Eighty-second Congress.

I want to talk to you now about some of the things which I think are issues during the coming campaign and which I will talk at length about in future broadcasts.

1. The winning of the present Korean conflict with neatness and dispatch.

2. The complete preparedness for the perhaps dark days to come including aid, within our means, to other countries combatting communism or any other subversivism.

3. The crushing and stamping out in this country and in all of her possessions, after proper proof has been made, of all un-American left and right winger organizations, whether they be Communist or Fascist, or any other kindred conspiracies to commit treason, all of which groups equally intend to overthrow or materially alter or change and eventually destroy our country and its splendid form of government.

4. In proper cases after due proof has been made, the deportation of all foreign-born Communists, Fascists and other subversives, and the speedy imprisonment of native-born Communists, Fascists and other subversives, with a view to rehabilitating them, mentally and morally.

5. The practicing of the most rigid economy in national, State, county and city government, consistent with the apparent or seeming necessity and needs of the times.

6. The repeal of the odious, slave labor, Taft-Hartley law and all other unjust, oppressive and labor-enslaving national, State and municipal legislation.

7. The same fair and just laws for labor as well as for capital, both of whom make up our country's great and proper two-horse hitch. This team must pull the burdensome load together, and not seesaw back and forth. They can and will make our great country greater if both are treated with dignity, fairness and equality, legislatively and otherwise.

8. Fair and adequate national minimum wage, social security and voluntary insurance, and other health programs.

9. The upbuilding and protecting in the United States of a just and proper free enterprise system, instead of the outlaw Jesse James, Jack Dalton, Billy the Kid, Doc Middleton, Dillinger, and other desperado types of free enterprise systems, sponsored by certain reactionary Republicans and Democrats who have crawled and crept with their greedy and selfish ideas intact, into the managerial chairs of business executives. This type has no real voice or any control in the Democratic Party but seems presently as for the past many years, to have a strangle hold, a headlock, a body scissors, a toehold, and a tramp-hitch on the once great party of Abraham Lincoln. My friends, we must shake these antisocial minds loose from business, big and little, and from the medical, and every other profession.

10. The phony 21-year-old scare word campaign, which seems to have flourished instead of fizzled out, during the most prosperous and productive years our Nation and its people have ever known: That equality age when the citizen was able to leap from the alley to the boulevard in almost one financial bound, and if he so willed it, and many did, he could bring along with him all of the tastes, manners, and instincts of the alley.

11. The phantom socialized-medicine scare conceived by certain reactionary, greedy, and selfish groups and persons and spearheaded into action by certain of the Don Quixote and Squire Sancho Panza types of bad-medicine men who in this enlightened day and age, as unsolicited interlopers, are out to fight nonexistent legislative enemies and are out to avenge nonexistent wrongs. The old genuine Don and his hapless Squire, as I recall, at least, did fight realities, to wit: A windmill and two clouds of dust stirred up by passing flocks of sheep, but these poor benighted medicos are phantom fighters. There is no socialized medicine bill pending in Congress. Compulsory health insurance—I favor voluntary health insurance—is not socialized medicine. I am against socialized medicine and have said so on all occasions, yet they say I am for it. These men surely appear to me to be pathological or psychopathic falsifiers. They surely could not do what they are doing and realize what they are doing—or could they?

12. Civil-rights legislation should be passed. Our Constitution contemplates, along with a government of freedom, equality to all persons, regardless of race, color, or creed, reactionary Republicans and Democrats to the contrary notwithstanding.

13. The United States Constitution guarantees freedom of speech and press, and it must be preserved, but freedom should not be interpreted to mean license. We need not only a free press but also a fair press and, if necessary, Congress should pass legislation to insure a fair press to the people of our Nation.

14. Our whole economy is geared to agriculture and an adequate farm-price-support program and other helpful protective legislation relating to agriculture should be passed and maintained by the Congress. Never again should farmers be imposed upon and pillaged by scheming fellows who live and wax fat by farming the farmers.

15. An adequate public-housing program should be fostered and maintained in the interests of the less fortunate people of the community.

16. Price- and rent-control laws should be on the statute books for immediate use against upward-creeping or run-away prices.

17. The aged and the helpless must receive better care or higher contributions.

18. The veteran who has carried the burdens of the war should not be a forgotten man. We cannot permit a hero to be degenerated into an itinerant merchant or a beggar. No skimping economy should apply to a veteran.

19. Congressmen should work for their salaries alone and not be permitted to make side money, which in some instances is interpreted by the citizenry as a bribe in disguise.

20. Congressman should not be permitted to farm out their franking privileges to any individual or concern, as has been done previously.

21. Congressmen should not be permitted to have sleepers on their payroll. In this connection I will briefly say that my present opponent carried Attorney Victor Spittler on his payroll for years as a clerk at a handsome salary, and Mr. Spittler drew pay right up to the time I took office, which included the first few days of January 1949, and all the while Attorney Spittler practiced law actively in Omaha, Nebr., without let or hindrance.

22. When Congressmen are beaten for office they should not give away all of their Government's farm books and bulletins allotted to the congressional district and leave the new Congressman high and dry. Constituents, my opponent did this to you and to me. He sent all of the Government publications on hand to two House Members and one Member of the other body. One of these House Members was from Iowa. He left the book and bulletin shelves as bare for me as old Mother Hubbard's proverbial cupboard. I had to borrow and beg publications to fill your orders from big-city Congressmen until July 1, 1949, when I received a new fiscal-year allotment.

On next Friday at this hour I will again appear over WOW and discuss some of the foregoing matters and particularly the issue of the health of America. I will tell you something of the operations of the American Medical Association, which has built up the biggest slush fund in all history to fight those who favor more medical colleges for America, more hospitals, more doctors, lower doctor bills, and a means of bringing the health of this country up to a point so that never again will 50 percent of your youth be rejected for military service because of health and disabilities.

Thanks, ladies and gentlemen, for listening.

Why Not Try to Save Asia and the Pacific?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RALPH W. GWINN
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, December 5, 1950

Mr. GWINN. Mr. Speaker, some distinguished citizens think we should keep the only friends of liberty we have in China to help us. They cannot understand either why proffered help is refused. They write to the editor of the New York Times as follows:

NEW YORK, December 3, 1950.

There is no longer even a vestige of excuse for not permitting American planes to bomb Chinese Communist concentrations and supply sources in the privileged sanctuary of Manchuria. Every day, every hour, every minute in which this prohibition is kept in effect means the loss of American lives.

Nor is there any longer a vestige of excuse for refusing the proffered help of Chiang Kai-shek, who could land thousands of trained Chinese troops in Korea, while we could help him to supply his guerrilla forces in Communist China and bomb whatever concentrations of Chinese Communists remain opposite Formosa. Thus we could get relief immediately in Korea and open a second front in China.

No Congressman or Senator of either party ought to discuss any other issue or Presidential recommendation whatever until he has first demanded that either these two steps be taken or that the administration officials who refuse to take them resign immediately.

Jurors Unshaken in Verdict Sacco and Vanzetti Guilty

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DONALD W. NICHOLSON
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, December 5, 1950

Mr. NICHOLSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Sunday Standard-Times, New Bedford, Mass, for November 12, 1950:

JURORS UNSHAKEN IN VERDICT SACCO AND VANZETTI GUILTY—FAIR'S POLITICAL BELIEFS HAD NO BEARING ON DECISION, SAY SEVEN, UNSWAYED 29-YEAR FROPAGANDA BARRAGE

(By Edward B. Simmons)

One day, 29 years ago this fall, Walter H. Ripley, of Quincy, former chief of police and fire departments of that city, left his home for work. Two days past his seventieth birthday, he was foreman of Quincy's water meter repair division.

Mr. Ripley seemed thoughtful that morning. Halfway down the path from his front door to the sidewalk, he stopped suddenly. A big, solid man, with drooping handlebar mustaches like those of William Howard Taft, then Chief Justice of the United States Supreme Court, Mr. Ripley put down his lunch box and coffee bottle and returned to the house.

"Snip, oh, Snip," he called. "I forgot to say good-by. I can't leave without a kiss good-by. You know that." He was addressing his wife, to whom he had been married 47 years, and the mother of their three children.

Surprised, for her husband was not usually so demonstrative, Mrs. Ripley embraced him before he went out again, an interlude which she never was to regret.

WORKERS FIND BODY

That afternoon, investigating because he had not made his usual inspection tour, fellow workers of Walter Ripley found his body near his workbench. He was dead, the victim of what apparently was a heart attack.

Unusual police activity immediately got under way. The Norfolk County district attorney's office was contacted. The Ripley lunch box and coffee bottle were impounded for chemical analysis, and the body was given to the custody of the medical examiner for a postmortem. A police guard was established around the Ripley home.

Such precaution in the death of an ordinary citizen would seem unusual now. They were considered routine in the case of Walter Ripley. For, 3 months earlier, as foreman of the Sacco-Vanzetti jury, he had announced to a waiting world that the defendants had been found guilty of murder.

Thus it was, on October 10, 1921, a few weeks later, the most famous murder trial in United States history and one that echoed and re-echoed around the world, exacted its first toll. Investigation disclosed Mr. Ripley had not been poisoned, as suspected, and that he had died of natural causes. But the strain of serving on the jury at an advanced age was held almost certainly a contributing factor.

In spite of the finding in Mr. Ripley's death, authorities had no reason to criticize themselves. In October 1921, 6 years before the two defendants expiated the crime for which they were convicted, turbulence over Sacco and Vanzetti was such that common sense assumed violence had caused the jury foreman's death so soon after the trial.

Ripley was the first member of that famous tribunal to die. He did not, of course, experience the full tempest of propaganda that has swept this Nation, and other continents, intermittently since the tremendous drama in which he was a participant. He escaped also most of the calumny that has been heaped upon those who had anything to do with the conviction of the two men.

TRIAL CAUSED FUROR

"The Sacco-Vanzetti case? Why bring that up?" some may ask. "Everybody has heard of that case," they say. "Two persons by those names were accused of something, there was considerable furor over their trial and they finally died for something. Was it for liberty of speech, or was it murder, can't remember which?"

That vague, and mistaken, impression is one good reason for looking again at the case. Another is that the brochures, books, radio addresses, plays, poems, magazine and newspaper articles and manifestos in their behalf never have waited for the excuse of an anniversary. With glacial imponderability, this outpouring has swept aside fact, constantly creating a more false foundation for later commentaries to start.

Thus, it is almost impossible for today's reader to find out what was perhaps the most significant—in the jury's mind—piece of evidence against Sacco and Vanzetti. The two best-known books on the case, both sympathetic to the defendants, ignore or do not mention this evidence, though a Supreme Court Justice wrote one and a Harvard Law School professor the other.

Most important reason for discussing anew the Sacco-Vanzetti case, however, is that the most authentic and qualified source of information never has been tapped—until now. That source is the one into which time made its first inroad with the death of Walter Ripley—the jury.

Where better to find an answer to the claim that Sacco and Vanzetti were convicted in a hysterically anti-radical period of United States history of a crime they did not commit? Who else survives who heard every syllable of evidence, sized up every witness and can say what evidence counted most in reaching the verdict?

The answer would seem to be obvious. Yet in all the years since the trial, none of the so-called experts, be they columnists, authors, or rostrum "liberals," none ever took the trouble to inquire into the jury. Until the Standard-Times traced down these jurors and recorded their opinion, they never had been consulted since Sacco and Vanzetti were executed.

SEVEN JURORS INTERVIEWED

There was no way of knowing how many jurors had followed Ripley in death in the 29 years. It was necessary to begin with the actual court records of names and addresses as listed in 1921. But within 2 weeks an almost complete check of the jury had been obtained. Three others were found to have died, and seven of the eight remaining were interviewed. The twelfth member could not be located.

Here is what the seven known survivors of the Sacco-Vanzetti jury told the Standard-Times about their memorable verdict:

The verdict of guilty was in accordance with the evidence, was a just verdict, and they would vote the same way today.

The trial judge was eminently fair, indicated no inkling of prejudice, if he had any, to the jury, and his memory has been inexcusably sullied by defenders of Sacco and Vanzetti.

The so-called radicalism of the defendants played absolutely no part in the verdict. In fact, the jury is astounded still at the charge to the contrary, and amazed the trial ever became a world-wide cause celebre on that basis.

From children of the four jurors known to be dead, it was learned that their juror-parents shared the sentiments of the survivors.

It can be stated, then, that at least 10 jurors, having heard the evidence, seen the witnesses and lived through fanfare since the trial, had no reason to regret their decision and encountered no evidence that would persuade them the trial and verdict of Sacco and Vanzetti was anything but just. Ripley died too soon after the trial to be included in this category and, as pointed out, the other juror, if he is living, cannot be located.

KILLING RECALLED

This fall marked the thirtieth anniversary of the indictment of Nicolo Sacco and Bartolomeo Vanzetti for double murder. They were accused of killing two shoe company personnel in a South Braintree Street the afternoon of April 15, 1920. The victims, Frederick A. Parmenter, paymaster, and Allessandro Berardelli, his guard, were shot down while walking the short distance between two factories of the Slater & Morrill Shoe Co.

The office from which they had departed was on the west side of the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad tracks, near the South Braintree Depot and Pearl Street grade crossing. Their destination was on the east side of the grade crossing.

Near the second factory, two men who had been leaning against a fence in front of Rice & Hutchins Co., a factory which once had employed Sacco, sprang into action. A fusillade downed Berardelli, and Parmenter, who began to run across the street, was shot twice in the back. The guard died almost instantly, while Parmenter lingered a few hours unconscious in a hospital.

The two bandits grabbed pay boxes containing $15,776 and climbed into a curtained auto which drew up. The car, containing, it is generally believed, five men, then made off toward West Bridgewater, pausing at a crossing to force the watchman by pistol threat to raise the crossing gate. Two days later the auto was recovered in a section known as Manley Woods, Bridgewater.

On the night of May 5, 1920, Sacco and Vanzetti were arrested in a streetcar bound from West Bridgewater to Brockton. Both carried loaded revolvers. Sacco had a Colt 0.32 caliber, containing 9 cartridges, and had 23 spare bullets in his hip pocket. Vanzetti had a loaded 0.38-caliber revolver and had four shotgun shells in a pocket.

Circumstances of the arrest assumed great importance in the trial. A West Bridgewater garage owner, Simon Johnson, of Elm Square, had been directed by police to report any foreigners calling for an auto stored in Johnson's garage April 19 by an Italian named Boda. Police suspected the car may have had a connection with the South Braintree shootings.

POLICE NOTIFIED

The evening of May 5, Boda, another Italian, Sacco and Vanzetti, called for the car. Johnson engaged the men in conversation, advising them not to take the auto because its 1919 license plates were out of date. Meanwhile, his wife slipped next door and telephoned police. While returning, she testified at the trial, Sacco and Vanzetti, then apart from the others, observed her. They conferred with Boda and the other Italian, and all four left quickly, Boda and the fourth man going on a motorcycle.

Police arrived shortly afterward and one patrolman boarded the streetcar nearer Brockton from West Bridgewater and made the arrests. At police headquarters both Sacco and Vanzetti lied about why they were in Bridgewater, where they had obtained the guns, acquaintance with Boda, acquaintance with each other, and in several other respects. There was no disputing both men lied on arrest; defense conceded this at the trial but said they were afraid of becoming involved with the law as radicals.

The pair were held in jail until their trial began a little more than a year later. Meanwhile, Vanzetti was tried for an earlier attempted holdup in Plymouth and convicted, but serving of sentence was deferred until the outcome of the trial on the South Braintree murders. They were indicted Sept. 23, 1920, for the murder of Parmenter and Berardelli; trial began May 31, 1921; they were found guilty July 14, 1921, sentenced April 9, 1927, and electrocuted August 23, 1927.

Within days after the arrest, their cause was espoused by radicals in New York, where Vanzetti had visited after the crime he was accused of committing and before his arrest. A defense committee headed by Italian workers was formed, magazine and newspaper articles began to appear, and biographies of the two men were printed. The campaign centered, at this point, in Plymouth and surrounding communities. Halls were hired and appeals were made for funds.

Sympathizers played up arrests being made by the United States Attorney General's Office in a campaign against radicals. Some were being deported. Though there had been no special drive in Massachusetts, the New York group pointed to the fact that the body of one arrested radical had been found on the street, 14 floors below where he had been questioned by Federal agents. Persecution, cruelty, and witch-hunting were alleged.

DEBATED IN ITALY

Worldwide repercussions had not yet boomed in full salvo before the trial, but Sacco and Vanzetti were publicized enough for the Italian Chamber of Deputies to make them the subject of debate in January 1921. Already it was a question not of their guilt but of their beliefs. Their Italian birth, broken English speech, and workingman status were stirred in a cauldron from which poured denunciation of the United States, its people, its judicial system, and its traditions.

Gradually there emerged a conception of Sacco and Vanzetti as two shining white knights being crucified for their views. As this monstrous distortion took shape, sympathizers became even sketchier with fact and more vehement on propaganda. By the time of the trial many sincere and earnest organizations had been persuaded to the opinion that Sacco and Vanzetti could not possibly receive fair treatment in the court.

As already pointed out, the worst of the propaganda mill and demonstrations did not come until after the trial. But there was sufficient beforehand to raise the question how much actually seeped into the residents of Norfolk County, from whom the jury would be drawn.

Examination of contemporary newspapers indicates most had the good sense to play down contemporary reaction until after the trial. At any rate, the United States of 1920 was not so radio and news-conscious as now, and there is no reason to doubt that propaganda for Sacco and Vanzetti seems much more formidable as summed up today, than it did 30 years ago.

Already, however, sympathizers had succeeded in one respect. The fanfare disturbed many Norfolk Countians and discouraged them from any desire to serve on the jury. From the first 500 talesmen questioned for jury service, only seven were selected. Judge Webster Thayer, presiding, ordered deputies to round up an additional 200 persons.

At the end of 4 days the jury was completed, its membership satisfactory to the District Attorney Frederick G. Katzmann, and the chief defense counsel, Fred R. Moore, of San Francisco.

JURY CHOSEN CAREFULLY

No jury in Massachusetts history was more carefully chosen. Moore was a veteran defender of known radicals, had participated in the trial of Mooney and Billings for the San Francisco Preparedness Day bombing a few years before. Judge Thayer was vigilant in his questioning of talesmen; neither Moore nor Katzmann had any protests over the final seating except the defense thought it should have had more time to study the background of the five jurors chosen from the extra list of 200.

Thus, Sacco and Vanzetti were tried by a jury which represented the winnowing of 642 residents of Norfolk County. Were they unprejudiced, capable, sound men, neither too high nor too low on the social scale for the task that was theirs? A sure method of finding out, is to talk to them, something no person writing about the Sacco-Vanzetti case ever took the trouble to do until the Standard Times traced them this fall.

The jury, and their occupations at the time of the trial, were, besides Ripley, Frank R. Waugh, of Quincy, machinist; John F. Dever, of Brookline, clothing salesman; John E. Ganley, of Avon, grocer; Wallace R. Hersey, of Weymouth, real-estate dealer; Frank D. Marden, of Weymouth, mason; Lewis McHardy, of Milton, mill operative; Seaward B. Parker, of Quincy, machinist; Harry E. King, of Millis, shoe worker; Alfred L. Atwood, of Norwood, real estate; George A. Gerard, of Stoughton, lastmaker and commercial photographer, and J. Frank McNamara, of Stoughton, farmer.

Ripley, who would be 99 were he alive, was the oldest, and Dever, then 28, was the youngest. Six earned a livelihood with their hands. None was wealthy. All but Waugh were accounted for in the Standard-Times survey. He moved from Quincy to Connecticut in 1922, a year after the trial, and his whereabouts could not be learned.

Besides Ripley, death has taken McHardy, Hersey, and McNamara. Of the seven others, five are living in the same communities, if not the same homes, in which they resided at the time of the trial. Dever now is residing in Worcester and Marden in Medfield. All but Dever have been or are husbands and parents.

There are then at least seven persons available to the Sacco-Vanzetti student who heard all the evidence, observed the reactions of the witnesses and defendants, and estimated their character, passed judgment on prosecution and defense methods, and for seven full weeks sat but a few feet from the controversial presiding jurist, Judge Thayer. In addition, the families of four other jurors can provide first-hand evidence on what those jurors thought of the celebrated trial.

Is it not remarkable that none of the so-called experts on the case has consulted this jury or sought to measure the qualifications of the members?

AUTHORS NEVER MET JURORS

In 1949 Author Philip Duffield Stong wrote in the Aspirin Age of the Sacco-Vanzetti case. His comment on the jury: "A dozen Yankees who had decided on the guilt of the accused before they took their seats."

According to the surviving jurors, Stong is a liar. Before making his incredibly sweeping statement did Stong take the trouble to meet any of the jurors? He did not.

Does the Sacco-Vanzetti jury fit the condemnation of it by Supreme Court Justice Felix Frankfurter? The latter, in 1921 a Harvard Law School professor, long was articulate in the Sacco-Vanzetti cause. He has written magazine articles alleging a miscarriage of justice by the jury, and also a book. In the Atlantic of March 1927 he had this to say:

"In view of the temper of the times, the nature of the accusation, the opinions of the accused, the tactics of the prosecution, and the conduct of the judge, no wonder the men of Norfolk convicted Sacco and Vanzetti."

In his book, Case of Sacco and Vanzetti, Frankfurter wrote there was no wonder the jury voted for conviction, with its "solidarity against the alien, the indignation against the two draft dodgers." They had been inflamed by a "riot of political passion and patriotic sentiment," he wrote.

Justice Frankfurter is, more than anybody else, responsible for the widely accepted belief Sacco and Vanzetti were convicted as radicals, not murderers. He never met or talked to the jurors he said were unfit. He has never tried to.

RECENT BOOK FOLLOWS LINE

Latest book published on the case, the Legacy of Sacco and Vanzetti, by Harvard Law School Prof. Edmund M. Morgan and G. Louis Joughin, teacher at New York's New School for Social Research, declares there was a "heavy accumulation of proof that the majority of Americans in 1921 were not well suited for service on a jury trying social undesirables."

Proof of the validity of such a statement would depend on the character of the Sacco-Vanzetti jury. Did the authors of the Legacy ever call upon any single member of the jury to see whether their blanket repudiation could be substantiated in the particular case they wrote so hotly about? No juror ever met either author or the Legacy.

The law-school professor and the sociology teacher refer to the jury as "weak," with it "inevitable that the quality of the verdict should be tainted. A sick society makes sick decisions. The men of Norfolk constituted a jury whose ideals were cognate with their verdict."

Strong words, which neither author, nor any of their predecessor-sympathizers ever made the slightest effort to check for authenticity. They damned the jurymen and let it go at that.

Let us turn to the jury, for evidence of whether they were weak, passion-inflamed, and mind-made up before and during the trial.

ASTOUNDING MEMORY

Most articulate survivor of the tribunal is Mr. Dever. His memory is astounding. Perhaps the fact he became a lawyer after the trial served to impress the details of the case in his mind. Nevertheless, his ability to carry on a narrative account of what transpired, never pausing over a name no matter how obscure, is extraordinary. Mr. Dever's recollections are so fluid, the listener is returned 29 years to the hot June days in the courtroom.

The only knowledge the interviewer had of juror Dever before meeting him was based on writer Upton Sinclair's reference to him as "a Beacon Street blue blood." Sinclair's book in behalf of Sacco and Vanzetti, need it be said, declared the jury was incapable of deciding the guilt of persons of such lowly estate as the defendants.

"Are you a Beacon Street blue blood?" Dever was asked. His broad mouth stretched into a smile, then to laughter until he was red-faced. His warm blue eyes melted. He was sitting on the edge of a bed in his lodging-house room. One foot was bandaged. He has been in and out of veterans' hospitals with traumatic arthritis caused by a World War I injury when a gun carriage ran over him. Barely able to hobble about, unmarried with no close relations in this area, his ability to practice law or otherwise gainfully employ himself has been greatly hindered by his foot injury.

He ran his left hand back through his brushed-back gray hair.

"You know, a friend told me about that description. I'm as blue-blooded a Beacon Street resident as anybody can be who was born in the Italian section of Barre, Vt., grew up in Dorchester, stopped schooling at the eighth grade, lost his father at 11, his mother at 5, and went to work at 15.

"That description of Sinclair's is typical, I suppose. He took one look at my address and decided the whole jury, me especially, was a bunch of stand-pat New Englanders out to convict a couple of foreigners.

"Actually my Beacon Street address was a boarding house. I was working in Filene's having just come back from Army service."

DEFENDANTS' MAN

"Funny thing, too. I was a defendants' man. I say that in all honesty and sincerity. I was a defendants' man all the way through the trial. I don't mean I was determined to vote for their innocence regardless, but I was going to find them not guilty unless the facts proved otherwise to my definite satisfaction.

"You are the first person formally to ask me anything about the trial. And I'll tell you something I don't think anybody knows.

"When we first left the courtroom for deliberations, I had the feeling that most everybody felt Sacco and Vanzetti were guilty. But I clung to the theory I began the trial with, that we should give them every opportunity. So I suggested, after a brief spell, that we have an informal ballot, nothing binding, just something to get a sample of opinion. My hope was that the ballot would inspire a thorough review of what we had heard and seen.

"Well, that informal ballot was 10-2 for conviction with me one of the two. And just what I hoped would transpire did. We started discussing things, reviewed the very important evidence about the bullets and everybody had a chance to speak his piece.

"There never was any argument, though. We just were convinced Sacco and Vanzetti had done what the prosecution had charged them with."

How about the enduring charge that the defendants' radicalism was the basis for the finding of guilt by the jury?

"That had nothing whatsoever to do with it," Mr. Dever replied. "Absolutely nothing. The question never came up. I think every juror will tell you that.

"The only thing we considered in the jury room was whether the defendants were guilty as charged by the prosecution in the indictments, or, as I would have expressed it before becoming a lawyer, whether Sacco and Vanzetti did what they were accused of or whether they did not."

RADICALISM TALK ABSURD

"I can repeat it over and over again. That talk of radicalism is absurd. Radicalism had nothing whatsoever to do with it."

As he talked memorable events of the trial fell into line under the powers of Mr. Dever's memory. He recalled outstanding examples of evidence presented against the two men, and described at length the remarkable testimony and evidence on the rarity of the bullets found in Sacco's loaded gun, matched only by a bullet taken from Berardelli's heart.

But before continuing with Mr. Dever, it may be well to look in other jurors' memories.

It took courage to be on the Sacco-Vanzetti jury and considering the way it has been abused since, it requires courage to admit now having been a member. Even Mr. Dever, though unmarried, with a sister in California his nearest blood relation, was inclined to be cautious, not because he was afraid to state his convictions, but because he has no desire for publicity or to stir anew the controversy.

For Juror Ganley, a small spry man, the memory of the discomfort attendant on that jury service are still fresh. He was willing to recall his opinion of the case, but, as to publishing his picture, that was something else.

"I'm sorry, young man," he said, stopping for a moment while helping Mrs. Ganley hang out the laundry behind their comfortable home in Avon. "I would like to help. I would not mind having my picture taken, myself."

TAKING NO CHANCES

"But I have to think of my children. I have two fine sons and a wonderful daughter. I would not want to hurt them or their families, or cause them any discomfort with their neighbors or their daily lives. Of course, I don't mean any harm could come of being connected with the case. That is not it. But you understand Mrs. Ganley's attitude, don't you? And I agree. Better to take no chances."

Mr. Ganley, these many years later, still recalls the armed guard established around his home while he was living in Dedham Courthouse as a member of the jury, and again in 1927, when execution date for the convicted men drew near.

"It was pretty hard on my wife. The children were young at the time."

Mr. Ganley was operating a grocery next door to his home when he was called. Now semiretired, he is no longer in business, though active as chief assessor of the town of Avon.

"I was impressed by one aspect of the trial especially," he recalled. "That was that Judge Thayer was absolutely fearless and absolutely on the level. He was trying to do his job thoroughly and not leaning either way.

"At the final showdown, when the jury was reaching its verdict, there were no objectors. It was 'guilty.' Nobody had to put up an argument at all. Every member of the jury thought they were guilty.

"The more I've seen and heard, even after the trial, the more I am convinced they were guilty."

Identification testimony made a strong impression on Mr. Ganley at the trial. He recalled that of Reed, the Medfield railroad-crossing tender, who, the juror said, "was given two bawlouts by somebody in the bandit auto for having the gates down," and got "two good looks" at some of the occupants. He identified Vanzetti as an occupant.

TESTIMONY STILL FRESH

Also comparatively fresh in Mr. Ganley's memory was the testimony of Bostock, a machinist, who said he passed two swarthy foreigners of Italian extraction leaning on the Rice and Hutchins fence a moment before the shooting, and the testimony of Mary Splaine, who was at work nearby, and identified Sacco as one of the killers. She saw the shooting from a window 60 feet from the scene.

"It was an entirely just verdict," summed up Mr. Ganley.

Juror King, very much alive at 64, had something in common with Sacco. Both were shoe workers.

Mr. King was setting a hen when the constable called on him and announced he was wanted for possible jury service at Dedham, the original venire panel of 500 having been exhausted. He was the eighth juror selected, first from the special roundup panel.

Testimony on the bullets stands out in Mr. King's recollection of the evidence. He remembers also his impression that Judge Thayer was "very fair. Every day he cautioned us to remember these men are innocent until proved guilty. He told us to keep our minds open. Repeatedly, repeatedly, he emphasized fairness.

"Anybody who says Sacco and Vanzetti were convicted because they were radicals and not on the evidence is all wet. Propaganda about their being radicals and being framed on the charges did not reach me before the trial. I was just a man in the street, minding my own business.

"As jurors, such talk did not concern us. We felt the defense put the radical element in the trial to hide the issue of murder. During the whole trial, the defense was conducted on the basis of the defendants' being persecuted radicals. It must have consumed at least half of the time.

"My associations with the jury were very fine. They were a bunch of fine men, none of them vindictive."

NOT ON CONSCIENCE

"My conscience never has troubled me. I had to come back to my job, working with other shoemakers in the factory. Most of them were Italians and knew Sacco when he lived in Milford. But my fellow workers never questioned the verdict or insinuated it was anything but justified.

"Sacco and Vanzetti were given every consideration."

Mr. King continued to work in the factory until July 1922, when he was appointed postmaster of Millis. When the Democratic Party took over the national administration, he lost that position and returned to the shoe factory. Today he is welfare agent for Millis. Mrs. King died in 1946, a married daughter died last spring and another married daughter and her family now reside with him.

All in all, Mr. King feels the Sacco-Vanzetti experience was costly for him. Diabetes caused the death of his daughter, but he has it on medical advice that worry and stress at home from the trial and 2 months of armed guards may have brought on the disease which eventually took her life.

More reticent about commenting on the trial than any of the other jurors, George A. Gerard of Stoughton says his memory is none too good. He thinks the verdict was entirely fair but that the "case is best forgotten.

"The outstanding thing about that trial was the judge. You can quote me on that. The fairest judge I ever saw or heard of.

"Who are these people who keep bringing up the case and complaining about the verdict? If they say the country was witch-hunting those days it must have escaped me. I don't remember all the radical talk. I always thought it was propaganda only."

NOT BITTER

"Am I bitter about it? Oh, no, not a bit of it. Such things happen every day, trials like that. Heavens no, I am not bitter. I just think the trial is best forgotten. Being on that jury did not affect my life, though it was a new experience for me. I suppose a murder trial is an everyday affair over the Nation, though. That's the way I look at it."

An unusual characteristic about the Sacco-Vanzetti jury, disclosed in the Standard-Times search, was that in almost 30 years only three have moved from their immediate communities. Waugh, of course, was last reported in Connecticut, Dever temporarily is residing in Worcester, and the other is Frank Marden. He waited until he was well over 70 before going from Weymouth to Medfield.

At 84, Mr. Marden and his wife are making their home with a married daughter on a farm. He still has the thick shock of white hair which he had, prematurely, at the time of the trial. A kindly man, he seeks no credit for the jury service he rendered when so many other citizens of Norfolk County were unwilling. Until he retired, he worked with his hands for a living, at masonry.

His clearest impression from the trial is "the outstanding fairness of Judge Thayer. He was fair to the other side, too, fair all around." He also recalls "the fairness of Mr. Katzmann. He didn't seem to be trying to put anything over on the defense."

Considering the evidence, Mr. Marden was impressed by identification witnesses, particularly Pelser (whose testimony is discussed by Juror Dever later), and the bullet testimony. He made the observation all trial witnesses were not in agreement, but added, "In the case of life and death of a man I think people will testify as best they can.

"I never have had a bit of reason to think the trial was anything but fair. I don't think we jurors thought of the defendants in any way except as two persons accused of murder."

JURY OF ONE MIND

"The jury got along fine. I remember that when we went out we had a smoke, talked about something else for a few minutes and gradually brought up the subject. Every one was of the same mind, the same opinion, that Sacco and Vanzetti were guilty."

Mr. and Mrs. Marden have been married 57 years. They never had been separated, before or since, as when he went to the courthouse, a jury venireman, and did not return for 7 weeks.

"Someone came back for his shaving mug and that was the last I saw of my husband for a long time, though one day I went to the trial," Mrs. Marden said. She was nervous then, what with the usual guard sitting in an auto every day outside their Weymouth home, but gradually Sacco and Vanzetti have paled into the distance. Of all the jurors' wives, she was the least apprehensive about having her husband finally heard on what he thought of the verdict.

At 73, Juror Seaward Parker, of Quincy, is still rarin' to go, and, in a good-natured way, somewhat miffed that his machine tool company thought his 38 years with the firm deserved him a pension.

"I'm tired and too old to work, retired at last," laughed Mr. Parker, who with his wife, had just returned from an active summer of outdoor work in Maine.

LAST JUROR PICKED

The last juror chosen, he thought it a "very fair trial by a good judge and heard by a good bunch of fellows. There never was a nicer crowd of men than that jury.

"I can't understand why the trial went around the world. They talk of Reds being involved in it, somehow. There never was a mention of Red in the courtroom or among the jury. I've been in hopes lots of times they would forget that trial, but it looks as if those so-called sympathizers will forever be bringing it up. I never could see where the idea of prejudice was picked up.

"Why should we want to pick up two Reds and try to convict them of murder? We did not know if they were Reds and we did not care.

"To my mind, and I really think this, the judge tried to help the defendants. He was square with us, too."

Recalling the evidence that impressed him most, Mr. Parker said, "The bullets, of course. That testimony and evidence on it sticks in your mind. You can't depend on the witnesses. But the bullets, there was no getting around that evidence."

The trial did not affect his life, said Mr. Parker. But, with Mrs. Parker, the most casual observer could see that Sacco and Vanzetti case turbulence had left its mark. She constantly cautioned her husband against too-free discussion and, in the end, prevailed upon him not to permit publication of his picture. Like Mrs. Ganley, she is not afraid—but. The couple have two married children with families.

POPULAR WITH COLLEAGUES

Alfred Atwood, of Norwood, must have been popular with his colleagues on the jury. Several made the query, "Have you seen Atwood yet?" or put in some other reference to the lean New Englander. At the time of the trial, Mr. Atwood just had returned from a Maine vacation, had not even unpacked, when a constable served a jury summons on him. He was among the extra panel of 175.

When interviewed, Mr. Atwood again had just returned from a Maine summer, at the same vacation place.

"I am absolutely satisfied no jury ever would find Sacco and Vanzetti innocent," he declared. "They might get a disagreement, but little possibility of that.

"I always thought it might have been a good idea to give them another trial in the years before sentence was carried out. The verdict of two juries would be more convincing, I believed. There was no doubt in my mind a second jury would have found them guilty like the first.

"I had no difficulty in my own mind arriving at a verdict."

Outstanding evidence in his mind was that of the old-fashioned type of Winchester bullets, one of which was found in Berardelli's body and duplicates which were found on Sacco when he was arrested. Sacco's manner also was recalled by Mr. Atwood, who at 64 is vigorous physically. He thought Sacco's attitude when asked to try on the cap found at the scene was peculiar, it being the juror's opinion the defendant was determined not to put on the cap in normal fashion, because he kept pulling it down virtually over his ears.

"Of course, both sides made a mess of some witnesses. To my mind it shows what was going on, the pressure I mean, for winning the case. But this we learned later. Never did there come to the knowledge or eyes of the jury any of the out-of-court pressure about the defendants being radicals."

MORE PRAISE FOR JUDGE

"I never saw things so well balanced as they were by that judge. If Katzmann made a point, Thayer would lean over backward to find something to balance it for the defense. If there was anything against those two fellows, he would do all in his power to compensate for their side.

"He never showed any bias to us. We never knew he had been the presiding judge at Bridgewater (when Vanzetti was tried for a holdup attempt in Plymouth). He never showed any favoritism. If I remember anything with absolute clarity, it was the judge's fairness."

Mr. Atwood recalled the jury was not too tense or over-concentrated on the trial when it was off duty. He recalled jury hijinks at the beach, while fishing and in the cramped quarters at Dedham, 12 men sleeping in cots in the same room. One night, he recounted, the jurors partly disassembled the sheriff's bed, so that when that august official retired there was a tremendous crash and much searching for a culprit.

Service on the jury, he feels, caused him later tribulations. Besides selling property, he felt responsible for helping some of those who purchased from him. He lent money freely and paid interest on mortgages for many. One man took advantage of him. Unwilling to go to court, fearing there would be hue and cry about a Sacco-Vanzetti juror's stony heart, Mr. Atwood settled for virtually nothing.

The 1929 depression, following closely execution of the defendants, found him saddled with many unpaid loans. Rather than collect, he went into debt by more than $50,000. Last year by saving earnings as a glove factory employee, he finished paying off that $50,000, which had been a moral obligation only.

"I am pretty proud of that," he said. He is now employed at the Whitinsville Machine Works, in Whitinsville, returning to his married daughter's home in Norwood on weekends.

"I still feel they had a fair trial," he said nostalgically. "The mistake was in letting litigations drag on so long afterward."

JUROR'S HOME BOMBED

Undoubtedly the heaviest burden for having taken on that jury service fell to the lot of Lewis McHardy, of East Milton. Mr. McHardy died May 1, 1947, aged 83, almost exactly 20 years after his home was demolished by a bomb by radical Sacco and Vanzetti sympathizers, none of whom was apprehended.

His son, John McHardy, who lives in a new home, built on the site by popular subscription of Milton residents, said his father never had any regrets about the verdict.

"My father was a straight shooter. He never liked to talk about the trial and avoided mentioning it. He had taken a juror's oath and felt it binding until his death. He was as honest as any man could be, and as good.

"He discussed few details with his children. He greatly admired Judge Thayer, though, and stood up for him whenever the occasion demanded. He always was fond of the other jurors and said he had had a happy time with them, despite being locked up so long.

"I never heard him express an opinion about any influence radicalism had in connection with the trial. There wasn't much talk about on that subject during the period. That came afterward. We didn't hear about radicals until those who wanted Sacco and Vanzetti to be martyrs went to work.

"It was always kind of hard for our family, that trial. We received notes and crank letters, and finally our house was blown up. After that trouble at home, father was even more determined to forget the trial.

"I don't know why they picked out our house. I suppose it was because at that time there was no other building within 200 yards and many trees and bushes afforded the perpetrators adequate concealment."

Charles H. McNamara, son of J. Frank McNamara, almost predicted a call from somebody about the Sacco and Vanzetti trial. Only 2 days before, while moving from the old homestead to a new house down the street in the farm country around Stoughton, the son's wife came across a photograph of the jury taken while on a fishing junket.

Mr. McNamara left seven children, five boys and two girls, of whom three are now dead. Like his son, Charles, after him and his father before, the Stoughton juror operated a dairy. He died September 23, 1931, aged 74, firm in his belief, the son said, that the verdict was called for by the evidence.

"I remember the period of the trial well," the son recalled. "I was filling silos with corn, just as I am these days. I remember thinking an army of persons wishing us harm could have hidden in the fields of corn around the house.

"The policeman on guard made so many tours of the barn he beat down a path around it. We were, however, not half as afraid as we should have been, realizing, as we do now, what a tempest was raised by the trial and all the excitement afterward."

Wallace Hersey was 81 when he died August 13, 1924. As with other Sacco-Vanzetti jurors who have passed on, the family was pleased no connection with the trial was mentioned in his obituary. The jury has been so neglected in discussion of the Sacco-Vanzetti verdict that most community records on its members have been lost, but the Herseys' children made no reference to their father's trial connection at his death.

"He thought they had a square deal," said Miss Mary E. Hersey, a daughter.

"He thought it was a civic duty to accept jury service, but he was glad to forget that case the last few years. Their sympathizers made it so hard for everybody."

That comment was all the daughter would make. Like nearly every woman directly or indirectly related to the jury members, she was loath to take even the slightest chance of incurring anew the wrath of sympathizers for the two murderers.

KIN DISTURBED

It is, indeed, remarkable how the jury service disturbed women kinfolk of the members. Surviving also in the Hersey family are the juror's widow and another daughter, married. The juror was worried over their safety and a police detail long patroled the home. Mrs. Hersey will not discuss the case, even to this day.

George W. Ripley, of Braintree, son of juror Walter Ripley, recalls how uneasy his mother was over having a police patrol at the family home. Younger members of the family tried to intercept threatening letters, but some reached Mrs. Ripley and heightened her distress.

"The judge told my father he did not have to serve, even after he had been accepted, because of his age," George Ripley, a retired machinist, said. "But he went ahead with it, and that was that."

Probably it was the apprehension of the womenfolk which prevented the Sacco-Vanzetti jury ever from meeting after the trial. They admired one another greatly; their friendliness was cemented by the long weeks together and the common abuse they suffered. But never since the trial have the jurors made any attempt to pick up the threads of the early acquaintanceship.

ONE GOOD END

Lamentable as it is that such conditions can be created in carrying out a civic duty, failure of the Sacco-Vanzetti jurors to meet in the three decades elapsing since their close association, served at least one good end. For their recollections of the trial are still strictly their own, free from any influence of a colleague's memory.

Of course, Juror Dever has no need of having his memory refreshed. He went down the list of evidence as if he had a memorandum on the bureau beside his bed—which he did not.

He was particularly emphatic that radicalism has no place in the jury's considerations.

"For that matter, as far as I know, the prosecution never offered any evidence they were Communists or slackers," he said. "But when Sacco and Vanzetti were arrested they lied as to what they were doing with loaded guns. They gave conflicting stories, afterward proved untrue. There was no argument abqut that. The defense admitted they lied.

"In Massachusetts, actions and behavior at the time of arrest may be used to indicate consciousness of guilt. When the prosecution sought to emphasize Sacco and Vanzetti's confusion on arrest as consciousness of guilt, the defense, not the prosecution, introduced the fact that they were radicals and slackers and feared arrest."

PERMITTED TO CROSS-EXAMINE

"Thereupon, Judge Thayer permitted Katzmann to cross-examine in an effort to show Sacco and Vanzetti were not real radicals or Communists as they stated in defense of the consciousness of guilt charge.

"All of which means, that if I say I could not have stolen a bicycle at Second and Elm Streets because I was stealing a bicycle at Sixth and Elm Streets, I have to be able to prove I was stealing that bike. If they used radicalism as evidence they were not guilty, they had to prove they were radicals."

And what about Judge Thayer, Mr. Dever? His conduct of the case has been the bullseye for every piece of literature ever printed condemning the trial.

"The judge was A-1. He never in any way, shape, or manner let us know what his views were. Thayer may have had an opinion. He may have expressed it outside of court. But he didn't indicate his preference to the jury. I say that quite frankly.

"I am amused that much of the criticism comes from domains where the judge can say to the jury, 'The evidence, I think, clearly shows guilt. Bring in a verdict of guilty.' The judge can make that kind of a charge in Britain's courts and in the Federal courts in this country, of which Justice Frankfurter is a member.

"You know I've got a good memory," went on Mr. Dever, obviously enjoying an opportunity to talk of the trial he remembered so well and about which he had so long been silent."

QUOTES JUDGE'S CHARGE

"I remember part of Judge Thayer's charge to us, before we went out." And he began to quote, without, as later checking disclosed, missing a word:

" 'I beseech you not to allow the fact that the defendants are Italians to influence or prejudice you in the least degree. They are entitled to the same rights and consideration as though their ancestors came over on the Mayflower.' "

(The next paragraph of the judge's charge continued that theme: "In the administration of our laws there is and should be no distinction between parties. Under our law, all classes of society, the poor and the rich, the learned and the ignorant, the most powerful citizen as well as the humblest, the believer as well as the unbeliever, the radical as well as the conservative, the foreign-born as well as the native-born, are entitled to and should receive the same rights, privileges, and consideration as the logic of law, reason, and sound judgment, justice, and common sense demand.")

"As I say, I was a defendants' man," Mr. Dever continued, "and if the judge was prejudiced against the men he did not give any indication to us.

"I remember in Barre, my birthplace, there was a wonderful statue to Robert Burns of pure marble from the quarries there. It was carved by an Italian. I was brought up near that statue and I acquired a respect for anyone who could create a marvelous work of art like that with his hands. I admired Italians then, I did during the trial and still do. It is nonsense to say we were prejudiced against Sacco and Vanzetti because they were Italian immigrants."

Mr. Dever, his bad foot paining him, lay down as he continued his narrative.

RECALLS SUMMONS

"I remember after receiving a summons for jury service that I went to Dedham on a Monday, returned to Filene's and worked Tuesday and finally went to Dedham to stay on Wednesday. While waiting in an anteroom to be called into court for questioning about jury service, I was told by a newspaperman, 'You'll never be selected for the Sacco-Vanzetti jury.'

"Well, I wasn't exactly sorry at his opinion, but I asked why."

"'Those buttons you are wearing,' he said."

"I had forgotten. I was wearing an American Legion button and a Knights of Columbus pin. Come to think of it, I thought, you won't get by with those, Dever. Of course I realized that with Sacco and Vanzetti reported to be draft-dodgers and radicals, their lawyers would not want a veteran and a Catholic on the jury.

"That wasn't the way it turned out. When I went in, Judge Thayer asked me five questions—whether I was related to the defendants, knew them, had read papers and preformed any opinions, and so on. I responded in the negative to each question, but I did not expect to be approved. I could see the defense counsel, the McInerney brothers, Jerry and Tommy, both of whom I knew well later, and Callahan (William J. Callahan) and Fred Moore looking at me and then examining a book, which, I suppose, contained my life history.

"Then Thayer said, 'The court stands indifferent,' which, of course, meant he did not care one way or the other whether I was acceptable. Katzmann said he would accept me and then Moore announced I was acceptable to both defendants.

"I was surprised."

PANEL EXHAUSTED

"Well, that was Wednesday, I remember. Thursday, they ran out of veniremen and Thayer sent the sheriffs out for more. Finally, while we who had been chosen were sleeping Friday night, the sheriff came in and roused us. It was 1:25 Saturday morning. We pulled on some clothes, went into the courtroom and were sworn in, the last man just having been selected. He was Seaward Parker of Weymouth, I think it was. (Wrong, Mr. Dever, Parker was indeed, twelfth juror but his home was in Quincy.)

"We got Saturday off, I believe. Monday we went for a tour of the scenes of the holdup, place where the getaway car was found—Manley Woods, the auto belonged to a man named Murphy, I recall—and then the trial got under way."

Mr. Dever was asked what evidence he considered to have been most important in the jury's vote of guilt.

"Just as I told Governor Fuller a few years later, there was no single piece of evidence that determined the verdict, I would say. Various pieces fitted into chains of evidence, which, to my mind, not having a weak link, were pretty strong.

"Let me give a couple of examples. For instance, the testimony about Sacco and Boda's car. We know that on May 5 Sacco and Vanzetti were at the Johnson's place. Mrs. Johnson testified she came downstairs in answer to a knock, found Boda and told him she would call her husband. She went upstairs and spoke to him, and while he came down to carry on the conversation she went next door, about 60 yards I think it was, to telephone from the home of people named Bartlett.

"I have a good memory. I haven't discussed this case for years, but all these names come back to me.

"While she was returning home, she said, she saw Sacco and Vanzetti observe her, and they went to where Boda and her husband still were talking, and drew Boda aside. Immediately, she testified, they left. And as you know, they were arrested on the trolley going toward Brockton."

SURE OF IDENTITY

"Now I'm getting to the point. The conductor of that streetcar was named Cox (wrong, Mr. Dever, it was Cole). He testified it was the second time that pair had been on his car at night within a short period. The other time was the night of April 14 or 15, he could not be positive which. He was sure of the identification, though. He was asked why he was so positive.

"'I operate a country trolley,' he answered. 'I know everybody who gets on and off in the country. I particularly remember the defendants because one of them I thought reminded me of a friend and the other was a total stranger. You know everybody on a country route, but I didn't know them.'

"Well, that was pretty reliable testimony, and it seemed reasonable. If you had listened to Cox (Cole) you would have believed him. After all, that is the jury's job, to size up a witness. And he made a good impression.

"The point is this: The prosecution was contending that Boda's car probably had been used to take the murderers from Manley Woods, where the getaway car was abandoned, to the area of Boda's Bridgewater home. And here were Sacco and Vanzetti positively identified by a reliable witness as boarding a trolley in the Bridgewater area either the night before or night after the crime, and a few days later they reappear in that area with Boda.

"Another example of related evidence was the testimony on rarity of the bullets. It was most unusual, in that it was the defense which introduced the evidence.

"Definitely established was the fact a .32-caliber Winchester bullet killed Berardelli. The prosecution's ballistics expert, Van Amburgh, said he thought the bullet had been fired from the Colt .32 found on Sacco when arrested. Another prosecution ballistics witness, Captain Proctor, said he thought it was 'consistent' with having been fired from the Sacco pistol. Both men had fired Winchester bullets from the Sacco pistol to compare markings."

EXPERTS DISAGREE

"Then the defense ballistics expert, Burns, testified he did not think the fatal bullet had been fired from Sacco's gun. He gave reasons. Burns made a good impression. He was a man of fine appearance, apparently reliable and sincere.

"District Attorney Katzmann asked Burns why he had not used Winchester bullets in his tests with Sacco's gun. Burns replied he had not been able to obtain any bullets like the fatal one because it was of a rare old-fashioned type.

"'The bullets I used were, however, more nearly approximate the fatal one than the newer Winchester bullets used by the prosecution's witnesses,' Burns told the court.

"'Did you make a thorough effort to find matching Winchester bullets for your test?' Burns was asked.

"'I tried all over New England with no success.'

"And then Burns looked down from the witness stand at a man sitting nearby," Dever continued, "and added, 'I even contacted my colleague, Mr. Fitzgerald here, of the Remington company, and he was unable to obtain any for me from the company's stocks. Mr. Fitzgerald will back up my statement.'

"Fitzgerald did support Burns' statement," said Dever. "Those old bullets were unobtainable on the market.

"But do you know who had some of them? When Sacco was arrested, he was carrying 23, I believe it was, extra bullets, and some were the identical, old-fashioned, unobtainable Winchester .32-caliber bullets, exact duplicates of the one which killed Berardelli.

"Call that circumstantial evidence, if you will. But in many cases, circumstantial evidence is better than direct evidence. More people are convicted of crimes they did not commit on the basis of so-called direct evidence than are by circumstantial."

CREDIBILITY QUESTIONED

Dever declared he, like others on the jury, was well aware some ballistics testimony, particularly that of Proctor, was open to question because of contradictions. Credibility of other witnesses, who claimed to have seen Sacco and Vanzetti at the scene of the murders, also was suspect because of their manner and personal background, he said.

"Trial post mortems make a great deal of these things. They assume the jury found for guilt on the basis of such weak testimony. In my opinion, we have juries in order that members can assess the true importance of such testimony and not give it the false weight it might assume if submitted in writing. We did not place much credence in poor witnesses. Just like any reasonable persons would, we tried to evaluate all aspects.

"You know I was just out of the Army and I was pretty familiar with a Colt pistol. I remember Proctor was asked if he could disassemble one and he replied he could not. As a juror, that made an impression on me. I suspected he did not know as much about guns as the prosecution claimed. If those who believe Sacco and Vanzetti did not have a fair trial are interested, I can tell them right now: Sacco and Vanzetti were not convicted on a basis of Proctor's evidence." Critics have assailed Proctor's testimony since the trial.

In Mr. Dever's opinion, pro-Sacco and Vanzetti literature often has distorted what the jury actually heard in attempting to try the case in newspapers and periodicals afterward. He cited the testimony of a witness for the prosecution.

"Remember Louis Pelser's testimony?" he asked, as usual reaching into memory instantly and correctly. "Pelser was wearing a blue serge suit, even though it was summer, and perspiring heavily, as he testified.

"He said he had been at work in a shoe factory overlooking the scene of the murders and heard a shot. He looked out the window. He remembered the window had been half open, and that they had not been able to free that particular window for some days."

TELLS OF SHOOTING

"Pelser said he saw a man with a gun bending over another man who was kneeling in the street. He saw the armed man shoot the other man. Then Pelser said the armed man looked up at him, flourished his gun. Pelser testified he ducked, but looked up again in time to see and jot down the robbers' auto license number as it sped away.

"Pelser was asked could he identify the man who did the shooting. He said yes. He was asked whether that man was in the courtroom. He said yes. He was asked if he could point him out. He said yes. And he pointed to Sacco.

"Then defense attorneys took over Pelser and the witness admitted that before the trial he had said, in the presence of his father and mother, a member of the prosecution staff, and a stenographer, while being questioned in his home, that he could not identify the man he saw doing the shooting.

"'How can you come in court now and testify completely to the opposite of what you said then? You are lying now, are you not?, a defense attorney shouted at him.

"'No,' said Pelser, and I am paraphrasing his testimony as I remember it," Dever continued. "'No, I am not lying. I did not want to be a witness in this case. I did not want to get involved. I did not tell the truth when I first was questioned in order to avoid being entangled. But they brought me in, anyway, and now that I am under oath and here on this witness stand I will tell the truth.

"'I have never told the actual story of what I saw before.'

"You know," continued the juror, easing his foot onto the bed, "it was obvious to me Pelser's identification testimony was a surprise to the prosecution. Katzmann was not even questioning him. His assistant, Harold Williams (now a Superior Court judge), was, I believe."

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

PROSECUTION SURPRISED

"Pelser's intended value to the prosecution, in their estimation, judging from the emphasis of their questions, had been to establish the time and to show how the license identification was obtained. When he went further and identified Sacco, the prosecution appeared to be very much surprised.

"In my estimation, Pelser seemed to be telling the truth.

"Of course, there has to be faulty evidence. If there were not, it would be impossible for one side to win. Faulty evidence is to be expected in any trial. The jury is there to pick it out. Our whole system of jurisprudence would be wasteful and wrong if the printed word was the basis alone for arriving at a verdict. Yet, that is what the post-trial writers expect to accomplish. And they select their evidence and what they will print of it, at that.

"The jury has been condemned by persons who point out Vanzetti had a lot of witnesses who testified he was in Plymouth selling eels the day of the murders.

"I remember one of those witnesses. Judged on appearance, he probably was the most effective. He seemed to be a pretty good fellow. Funny, I can't remember his name. Anyway he said he saw Vanzetti in Plymouth that day, and that he remembered the day especially because he, the witness, was fixing his boat.

"No matter how hard the prosecution tried, they could not shake his testimony. He was convinced it was April 15, he had seen Vanzetti and he had a memory-jogging factor, the boat repair, to make the impression strong in his mind.

"Katzmann had about given up. In fact, as I recall it, he was on his way back to his seat, when he turned to the witness, an Italian like the others who appeared for Vanzetti, and asked 'Are you sure, positively sure, it was April 15 that you saw the defendant in Plymouth?'

"'Well, I was not too positive myself,' replied the witness, 'but I remember coming up on the train with a defense lawyer and we agreed it ought to be April 15.'"

BOOKS OMIT STATEMENT

"It is irritating," said Dever, "but the books by Sacco and Vanzetti sympathizers leave out that last statement, when talking about this positive witness for Vanzetti.

"No wonder many people think the jury was daffy. How could they think anything else when they get only half the picture? The defense has tried the case in the newspapers. The prosecution, naturally, cannot. The result is, the public simply has been overwhelmed by the defense evidence and little of that which prompted the jury to reach a verdict of guilty ever is made known."

After the trial Mr. Dever resumed work at Filene's. At night he studied law, and in 1926 passed the bar exams. He remained with Filene's, however, until 1933, becoming head of their employees arbitration board. He then joined the State division of employment security, remaining there when it was taken over by the Federal Government in World War II.

The Sacco-Vanzetti jury's service was not closed with the trial. For the next 6 years its members and their families had to endure vilification in written comments and threat from the more radical of the condemned men's supporters. Agitation carried to every corner of the globe.

In Habana, an American General was threatened. Dutch radicals protested. Communist mass meetings in Brussels adopted resolutions. In Czechoslovakia new trial resolutions were approved. American Legations in Sofia, Buenos Aires, Lisbon, and Tokyo received bombing threats. The Paris Embassy was bombed. Algerians, Chinese, South Africans, and Russians demanded Sacco and Vanzetti be freed.

Milan was the scene of many demonstrations. The Swiss labor movement sent a petition signed by 156,000 persons. Governor Fuller, by 1927, had received 17,000 first-class-postage letters.

COMMUNIST TIRADES

In this maelstrom, the Communist press was the vortex. Its tirades knew no bounds. It advocated further legalities and probably was a leading contributor to the more than $360,000 fund that was raised by defense committees. What other sums were obtained in the name of Sacco and Vanzetti and put to purely radical use cannot be estimated, but fund-raising totals are obscure in the record.

In this period, the jury was dismissed as an incompetent, prejudiced, vindictive group of witch hunters. Judge Thayer received the worst of the epithets. His life history was explored; any chance remark he may have made, whether while playing golf in this State or paying the bellhop, in a hotel in Spain, that might be construed as anti-democratic and distorted and played up in "liberal" and left-wing brochures, articles and speeches.

By 1927, sympathizers of Sacco and Vanzetti attained an objective. So great had been the torrent of criticism that many level-headed persons who normally might have permitted the law to take its course were persuaded to doubt fairness of the trial. The crescendo clamoring for a new trial became immense.

Three times motions for a new trial were argued before Judge Thayer; each time they were denied. Twice the defense went to the State supreme court on complaints that Judge Thayer was not correct in denying admission of so-called new evidence. The high court upheld the jurist.

Sacco was in and out of the insane asylum, while Vanzetti's sanity was questioned. A convicted murderer from New Bedford, Celestine Medeiros, confessed in the death house to being involved in the East Braintree hold-up and killings and said Sacco and Vanzetti were not implicated. His account was checked and thrown out as false.

"For a year or more after the trial we were being called by the Governor or some other authority determining whether there was possibility of error," juror Parker said. "The Governor desired to give them every break he could."

ADVISORY BOARD NAMED

In 1927, Governor Fuller appointed an advisory board of President Lowell of Harvard, President Stratton of Massachusetts Institute of Technology, and Judge Robert A. Grant. This group called in the jury members separately.

"Is there anything about this whole case that bothers you?" Mr. Dever recalled he was asked after reviewing the trial with the group. "Is there anything that makes you doubt the verdict was not just, on thinking it over?"

Governor Fuller summoned jury members singly for his own review of the case. Mr. Dever said he was questioned, with his acquiescence, in the presence of a stenographer. Then the Governor took him aside, out of earshot of everybody else, the juror recalled, put his arm on his shoulder and asked if there was any matter Dever would like to get off his chest about the trial.

The Governor also asked what part of the evidence Dever thought the most conclusive. Mr. Dever said he replied there was no particular thing alone, but groups of related evidence, which taken in conjunction, made a verdict of guilty the only possible one and the just one.

The Governor's advisory board had three questions to answer:

Was the trial fairly conducted?

Was evidence discovered after the trial of such importance a new trial was warranted?

Are members of the board convinced beyond a reasonable doubt that Sacco and Vanzetti were guilty of the murders?

Having read 7,000 pages of testimony and talked to 102 witnesses and the jury, the board found in the affirmative on the first and third questions and in the negative on the second, all by unanimous votes. Their report was made public August 6.

APPEALS TO 14 JUSTICES

April 9, 1927, Sacco and Vanzetti were sentenced to die the week of July 10. In the next 17 days, appeals were taken to 14 justices in four courts. Judge Broadhurst in Suffolk County refused a stay; Chief Justice Walter P. Hall, of the Superior Court, refused to appoint a new judge to hear a new trial motion; Judge George A. Sanderson, of State supreme court, refused a habeas corpus writ; Judge Oliver Wendell Holmes, of State supreme court, refused a habeas corpus, and Judge George W. Anderson, of the United States district court, refused a habeas corpus.

The full bench of the State supreme court heard exceptions to Judge Thayer's denial of a new trial, and denied the exceptions. Then Judge Hall refused a stay of exceution. Judge James M. Morton, Jr., of United States district court, refused a habeas corpus. Judge Holmes refused a stay and an order of notice on a writ of certiorari.

Then the defendants' counsel went to the United States Supreme Court. First Justice Brandeis refused a stay, then Justice Stone, and finally, Chief Justice Taft declined to return to the United States from Canada to take any action.

Final appeal was to Judge James A. Lowell of the United States district court and, again, to Judge Anderson on August 22. The next day Sacco and Vanzetti were electrocuted, while 800 police armed with machineguns, gas bombs, and high-pressure hoses stood guard around the prison.

The controversy has continued, however, in book, poem, play, magazine, and occasional newspaper article. Justice Frankfurter remains silent, but his lead is being followed by a group including Philip Murray of the CIO, Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt, Walter Reuther, of the CIO Auto Workers, Senator HERBERT H. LEHMAN, of New York, and Professor Arthur M. Schlesinger, of Harvard. They sponsored a "manifesto" in 1947 and are attempting to have a memorial bas-relief to Sacco and Vanzetti set up in Boston Common.

NEW BOOK TYPICAL

Typical of the literature is "The Legacy of Sacco and Vanzetti," previously mentioned. In 595 pages, packed with legal references, Professor Morgan and Mr. Joughin present what Arthur M. Schlesinger, Jr., also a Harvard professor, calls a cogent evaluation of the legal and sociological aspects.

As demonstrated in the interviews, a majority of the Sacco-Vanzetti jury survivors consider the rarity of the bullets found on Sacco and in Berardelli's body extremely significant. Perhaps this was the most damning of all factors involved.

The cogent evaluation of Professor Morgan and Mr. Joughin does not even mention this extraordinary evidence in its lengthy examination of the data presented against Sacco and Vanzetti.

Justice Frankfurter, who orated loudest and longest against the verdict, does not allude to the bullet evidence in the Case of Sacco and Vanzetti, his book on the trial.

By such omission is strength given the allegation that Sacco and Vanzetti were not convicted on the murder evidence. By such omissions is the jury's fitness placed in a false light.

A later era recognized the grave threat to democratic processes that the fact distorted, or omitted, can be. It is no compliment to American justice and fair play that for these many years the Sacco-Vanzetti jury has been damned in books written without even knowledge of whether its members were alive or dead to respond.

Time continues, of course, its inexorable inroad on the small band of courageous citizens who fulfilled a basic responsibility of citizenship—jury service.

The years have not brought any member riches, but they have brought strengthened conviction that the verdict was in complete accord with the consciences and the evidence—and that it was just.

NO COMMENT

"I have never commented publicy on the Sacco-Vanzetti case and have no intention of doing so now," said Frederick G. Katzmann, of Hyde Park, who as Norfolk County District Attorney in 1921, headed the prosecution staff in the celebrated murder trial. Mr. Katzmann is president of a savings bank and still practices law.

"GUILTY!" SAYS ELWIN HAUVER, COURT STENOGRAPHER AT TRIAL

There was no doubt in the mind of a New Bedford resident who heard every word of testimony in the Sacco-Vanzetti trial that the two defendants were guilty of murder. Elwin H. Hauver, of 427 Bedford Street, has had nearly a half-century's experience in listening to murder trials and recording the proceedings. He was one of two official court stenographers at the Dedham trial in June and July 1921.

"You can't put it too strongly, my belief in the justice of the verdict and guilt of the men and the fairness of the trial," said Mr. Hauver, who retired this year as official stenographer for the Bristol County Superior Court.

"Of course, I've seen a lot of murder trials, and other trials in forty-odd years and I think I'm in a position to be a pretty good judge. At the time of the Sacco-Venzetti trial there was not a single person I ran across in the courtroom who thought they were innocent. With one exception," he added smiling, "a newspaperman."

Of Judge Webster Thayer, who has been accused of prejudice by Sacco-Vanzetti sympathizers, Mr. Hauver declared, "There was no question about his fairness. There was no question about his courage, either. He was not afraid of man or the devil."

In his opinion the so-called radicalism of the defendants played no part in influencing the verdict of guilty. Most of the sensational emphasis on this came after the trial, he believes. Encouragement for later generations to think the pair were not convicted on the evidence has come from books like Supreme Court Justice Felix Frankfurter's, Mr. Hauver said.

Frankfurter's book condemning the verdict, The Case of Sacco and Vanzetti, "distorted the facts," the New Bedford man feels.

"We, the other stenographer and I, heard every word said, we heard every consultation between judge and counsel and prosecution. There was not a single word relating to that trial involving the court we did not hear. And in my mind there was no question that Sacco and Vanzetti were guilty as charged."

Mr. Hauver's experience with murder cases began in 1903 when he was attached to the Boston Police Department.

Manhattanville Center

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JACOB K. JAVITS
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, November 27, 1950

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, the Mid-Century White House Conference on Children and Youth being held here in Washington this week focusses attention on the Manhattanville Center, located in my district, described by the New York Times as a potent force for combating juvenile delinquency and encouraging good citizenship in an overcrowded section of Manhattan. Members will be interested in the appended editorial from the November 29 New York Times which deals with the outstanding work of this center. It follows:

MANHATTANVILLE CENTER

A potent force for combating juvenile delinquency and encouraging good citizenship in a tragically underpivileged area of the city is the Manhattanville Neighborhood Center, at 514 West One Hundred and Twenty-sixth Street. Here 45,000 persons are living in badly overcrowded housing. Roughly one-third of the residents of the region are Negroes, one-third are Puerto Ricans, and the remaining third comprises 22 nationalities. All of these human beings are squeezed into an area of about 50 city blocks.

Like all enterprises of its kind, the center requires generous contributions from its friends to enable it to carry on. If adequate funds are received, the center hopes to develop a leisure-time program for aged persons, to cultivate more constructive and more social attitudes among juvenile gangs, to keep younger children from being attracted by gangs, to formulate an effective adult-education program, and to carry out extensive physical repairs to the center itself.

Last summer, with the cooperation of Columbia University Teachers College, representatives of the center visited 3,679 dwelling units in the area in a laudable project to redesign and redevelop the community. The results of the study are now being tabulated. Donations from friends will make more constructive surveys of this kind possible. Checks should be sent to the Manhattanville Center Business Office, at 2852 Broadway, New York 27.

A Clean Fulfillment

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, December 5, 1950

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Manila Bulletin of Saturday, October 14, 1950:

A 'CLEAN FULFILLMENT

The 5-year task of the War Damage Commission is drawing to a close. The commissioners have completed and sent to President Truman their final report on the public property rehabilitation phase of their work, which is the most visible and tangible of all the things that have been done for the people of the Philippines under the Rehabilitation Act of 1946.

The full scope of restoration is impressive. It often escapes the notice of people who live here because the process has been necessarily gradual. The impact of surprise is apparent in the faces and the remarks of people who leave the country and return to note the progress made in removing the horrible scars of war.

The payment of war damage money to individuals and private entities used up most of the sums allotted to the Philippines for rehabilitation. The sum available for restoring public buildings and properties of the government was ₱110,500,000. Schools got most of it, with national government buildings, hospitals, and dispensaries, provincial and municipal buildings, irrigation projects and waterworks and government corporations sharing in that order.

The Philippine Government at the same time has spent since 1945 an estimated ₱80,000,000 of its money on rehabilitation of public properties. Much of this has gone into construction of roads and bridges, the cost of which was shared half and half between the United States and Philippine Governments. This has led to the erroneous impression that all public restoration work was so shared. Except in a few cases where work on necessary projects had already been started, or under other special arrangements, the cost of restoring public buildings was wholly paid for out of war damage funds from the United States.

The commission's report to the President is factually complete, ably presented and well edited, with illustrations, but it modestly fails to bring forward one notable fact which should not go unmentioned. With all the huge expenditure of money involved, no breath of scandal has touched the operation. There must have been minor defections, mistakes and failures, but none were important enough to come to public notice. There has been a clean fulfillment of public trust.

The American commissioners and staff people are getting ready to leave their jobs and go home. Most of them, including Commissioners Frank Waring and John O'Donnell, will have left by the end of next month. It is quite possible that other Americans will be sent here by their Government to implement the recommendations of the Bell mission's report. In our opinion the best qualified Americans for that work would be Commissioners Waring and O'Donnell. Could they be induced to stay?

British Commonwealth Colombo Plan For Economic Development

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JACOB K. JAVITS
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, November 27, 1950

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, one of the essential elements in our fight against the Communist totalitarian drive to capture the free world is economic reconstruction and development. This is the best way to give the millions of Asia, Africa, Latin America, and Europe something to fight for.

The appended editorial on the Colombo plan of the British Commonwealth nations is based upon their considerable experience in the Far East and is an indication of the magnitude of the effort required to do the job which needs to be done. It is significant that on the basis of an expenditure of over $5,000,000,000 only modest improvements are hoped for in standards of living, and yet the decisive victory over communism is undoubtedly to be based upon the effort to raise standards of living. The New York Times editorial of November 29, 1950, follows:

THE COLOMBO PLAN

One of the greatest adventures in aid for underdeveloped areas was officially launched yesterday by the seven countries of the British Commonwealth. It is the "Colombo

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

Plan for Cooperative Economic Development in South and Southeast Asia." Here is a practical, hard-headed, realistic approach to a vital problem in an area of the globe that contains 570,000,000 people and, among other things, exports just about all the world's jute and rubber and two-thirds of the world's tin.

It is hardly necessary at this moment to point out the value of a plan that can lessen or help to defeat the menace of communism in southeast Asia. The economic front is as important in the long run as the military and political fronts. Hunger is the Communist's best ally, and hunger is the normal state in southeast Asia. So the plan rightly aims at food more than anything, and in that connection at providing the technical advice and training to make increases in agricultural production. An idea of the tremendous urgency of the problem can be gained from the fact that in 20 years, at the present rate of population increase, there will be 150,000,000 more mouths to feed in the area. In other words, just to maintain the present miserably low standard of living, production must be increased enough to feed that many more people.

Each region in the plan has specified what it needs and what it can do to help itself. The Commonwealth countries are pledged to provide as much of the remainder as they can. Whatever happens, that much will be done in the next 6 years. Beyond that, the success or failure of the plan will depend upon American aid. In principle, the Colombo plan does just what we believe should be done—the improvement of underdeveloped areas through a maximum of self-help. This is a sort of Commonwealth point 4. Our own point 4 program is not big enough. The French and Dutch have their own problems in southeast Asia. Either we help or the Colombo plan will remain restricted to a scope too small to be decisive. Since it conforms to our policies and aims, the presumption is that Washington will cooperate as much as it can.

The Negro Is Being Misled on Integration and Civil Rights

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN BELL WILLIAMS
OF MISSISSIPPI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, November 30, 1950

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, Davis Lee, Negro publisher of the Newark (N. J.) Telegram, has written some very interesting editorials for his publication. I am of the opinion that leadership such as represented by this writer will accomplish a great deal more for Negroes than radical proposals offered by those who would use race prejudice to exploit the Negro race for their own benefit.

Under leave to extend my remarks, I include herewith a recent editorial written by Lee, which represents sound thinking and the most reasonable attitude presented by any leader of the Negro race:

The more I travel, listen, and observe, the more convinced I become that the Negro has been grossly misled in this matter of integration and civil rights.

It appears to me that the first things should come first, and that our economic well-being is of greater significance than the privilege or right to attend a white school or to associate with white people on an equal social basis provided by Supreme Court decisions and pressure legislation.

As a Negro and an American, I naturally want to see my race enjoy every right, privilege, and opportunity enjoyed by any other American, but I am opposed to any type of agitation designed to deprive the other fellow of a right to be associated with his own kind exclusively, if he so desires. I would like to reserve such a right for myself and definitely would not want it encroached upon by a Supreme Court edict or any other kind of interference.

The right granted to one or two Negroes in Virginia or some other Southern State to enter a State graduate school is of no benefit to the millions of our people who are in need of the bare necessities of life, and when the fortunately situated members of the race conduct such campaigns of agitation for selfish gain the needy masses suffer.

While the South does not provide ample or adequate modern school facilities for Negroes everywhere, neither does it provide completely modern facilities for white schools, because the money is not available for such a vast undertaking. However, rapid progress has been made and in Montgomery, Ala., and several other communities the Negro schools far exceed the white schools in modernization and physical appearance. Neither do the majority of southern Negroes nor the majority of the whites approve of the present program to disrupt a custom which has served both races well down through the years and contributed so much to the Negro's economic security.

Just what would be the future educational status of the Negro in the South if the legislatures of all of the Southern States would enact legislation withdrawing State financial support from all schools of higher learning, starting at the high-school level? Not only is this possible, but if it should come to pass, the Negro would be unable to finance his own educational program. Negro financed educational programs have been a failure in the past and nothing miraculous has happened which would cause a normal person to assume that the future holds any better prospect.

Years ago southern Negro educators made annual pilgrimages to the North to raise funds for the support of their schools and this practice continued until northern philanthropists found out that the Negro educators were the beneficiaries instead of the schools. The AME Church, the Baptists, the Presbyterians, and some other minor denominations have been active in the field of Negro education, but their achievements have been nothing to write home about. Not only that, but every year charges have flown thick and fast anent the misappropriations of school funds. The operation of Negro schools has not only produced some of the Nation's juiciest scandals but is a damaging reflection of the Negro's integrity and his ability to operate and finance an educational program.

No race or nationality in this Nation has excelled or equaled the Negro in educational attainment and achievement, but this educational opportunity was not only created by white dollars but has been financed by white people throughout the Nation. It is an unfortunate fact, that Negroes contribute very little to their own community well-being and improvement and this fact should be taken into account by these agitators before they initiate their program for demands in the field of education.

Instead of spending thousands of dollars to finance unnecessary court fights for privileges which will cost the race millions in lost valuable friendships and racial good will, our leaders should go into the Negro ghettoes and force the local grocer to carry prime meats and sell to our people grade A products which will make us healthy.

I live in Newark, N. J., one of the supposedly liberal cities, and it is impossible to find prime beef or grade A cuts of any kind of meat in the Negro sections of the city. This situation is true throughout the United States. Grocers in Negro communities carry the most inferior brands.

Go into any Negro community, and the meat-market windows are filled with cheap, inferior smoked and salt meats. Some of it was put through some curing process after it had gone bad.

It is no wonder that the death rate is so high among Negroes. When one considers the food situation plus inadequate housing, it is a wonder that the death rate is not higher.

It appears to me that our leaders should direct their efforts toward correcting these abuses which are undermining our very existence. And these abuses are not practiced against us by white people alone; our own people are just as bad.

Negro restaurants buy the cheapest food and charge the highest price. Last week, on a tour of five States, I was not able to get a decent cup of coffee. Some of the coffee sold to me looked like mud and tasted worse.

It is very apparent to me that the Negro leaders of this Nation have a distorted sense of real values. They appear to be more interested in breaking down racial barriers and conducting expensive campaigns of agitation in spreading hate than in directing their efforts, energies, and money toward the attainment of the intangible essentials of life.

I was in Atlanta last week and was greatly impressed by the large number of outstanding and progressive Negro businesses. Atlanta is strictly a segregated city. I was in several New England cities this week where there is not supposed to be any segregation, and I found not one creditable Negro business.

The only owned and operated Negro radio station is not in New York, but in Atlanta. Segregation has not only given the Negro in the South an opportunity to carve out his industrial and economic destiny, but it has forced him to the fore as the most substantial and economically secure Negro in the world.

The Negro in New York, Newark, and other supposedly liberal centers may enjoy the privilege to eat where he pleases or go to any theater or public place of amusement, but a Negro can't get a license in Newark to operate a liquor package store, and there are any number of fields that he can't enter business in other eastern and northern cities. But this is not true in the South, a Negro can enter any kind of business he wishes and southern whites will even lend the money. Some of the largest contractors in the South are Negroes.

Northern Negro dollars spent to force southern white universities to admit Negroes will certainly not contribute anything toward continued good race relations in the South, and race relations were definitely on the improve until all of these school suits started.

I find more race prejudice in the East than I have found in Georgia or Mississippi. Two weeks ago 10 tourist camps refused to rent me a cabin just outside of Pittsburgh, and Pennsylvania is one of the first States to enact a civil-rights law.

If the NAACP is really interested in correcting a real evil in the school situation then it should direct its efforts toward the schools in Harrisburg, the capital of Pennsylvania, which is a little closer than the nearest southern school target.

The American race situation has not only taken on added alarming proportions but has developed into a serious problem which could explode and create a national crisis. Instead of trying to find peace in Korea and in other foreign lands our leaders, both white and colored, should try to find a panacea for these racial ills and establish peace at home before advocating it abroad. We are not in a position to teach the other fellow how to establish unity in his bailiwick when we don't have it in our own.

Congress and Its Work

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CARL D. PERKINS
OF KENTUCKY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, December 5, 1950

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, a group of Washington correspondents has launched a worthy effort to add to public knowledge of the work of Congress and its Members, and under unanimous consent I include in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the following letter received from Hal J. Miller, editor, Your Congress magazine:

COMMITTEE FOR CONGRESS,
Washington, D. C., December 2, 1950.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN PERKINS: There has been a unanimous expression of approval of the proposal of our Committee for Congress to broaden the knowledge of Congress and its work through a national educational program.

We have received many suggestions for study subjects and articles for Your Congress magazine, and in order to keep all Members of the House and Senate fully informed on this activity, it has been suggested that the editorial content of the publication should be described in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

In fact, it is our intention to conduct all business of the Committee for Congress in a virtual "goldfish bowl." While it is felt that such an educational program will accomplish most if it operates as an unfettered citizen project, free to carry on its work, unhampered by official restrictions, it is recognized that the Members themselves must have a voice in what is said about Congress.

Our founding committee of veteran newspaper observers of our legislative system has been assured that leading representative citizens will be pleased to serve on the permanent Committee for Congress and assist it in various ways.

The Committee for Congress is being incorporated as a nonprofit corporation in the District of Columbia.

Distinguished Members of the House and Senate who have indicated their approval of efforts to strengthen our democracy through the proposed study plan are being asked to serve as an advisory committee. Close liaison will be maintained with all official congressional sources so that accurate reports on the work of Congress can be printed.

The magazine will publish pictures of all Members, committees, and Hill officials. Articles will be checked carefully for authenticity and a strictly nonpartisan policy will be maintained in the distribution of educational or informational material, either in Your Congress magazine or in publications of the committee.

In addition to factual, down-to-earth articles explaining how Congress and its committees function, how bills are introduced, how legislation is worked out in conference, and so on, there will be numerous features in the magazine of general reader interest.

An important feature will be a question-and-answer column in which the queries of students and readers can be answered authoritatively. Members of the House and Senate will be asked to write articles. Veteran Members or former Members will compare Congress today with its work in times gone by. There will be personality sketches of our great congressional personalities, the Borahs, the Cannons, the LaFollettes, the Websters, the Clarks, the Norrisses, and others. Duties of various Hill officials will be explained.

There will be a summary of legislation before Congress, of legislation enacted, and of legislation slated for consideration.

An important feature will be the Congress Study Council and its plans for utilization of study material in schols, colleges, unions, employee groups, service clubs, women's clubs, and other assemblages.

It has also been proposed that we have a department for young readers, which might be used to carry pictures of children and young friends of Members of the Senate and House with brief articles about them or written by them.

In addition to educational uses of the publication, the committee for Congress will endeavor to correct a bad public relations situation resulting from the fact that when some citizens visit the Capitol they find few Members on the Senate or House floor.

This leaves the impression that Members do not take time to attend the sessions, when actually they may be busy in committee, meeting constituents or handling correspondence in their own offices.

By having Your Congress magazine available to all visitors to the Capitol, either through the guide service, or at the newspaper stands, it will be possible to explain how Congress does its business, and that it is not always necessary for all Members to be on the floor at one time.

The committee's principal channel of education will be Your Congress magazine, but we will use radio, television, motion pictures, speakers, special events, and other media. Members of Congress or their designated representatives can serve as study discussion leaders if time and the occasions warrant.

The educational project will be financed by public subscription and the sale of published materials. The great educational foundations and noted philanthropists have been asked to consider sponsoring the entire program on a long-range basis, as it is acknowledged to be of prime importance to widen a knowledge of our Congress and Government if we are to sustain this free, democratic, representative, republican system. A program that is dedicated entirely to the defense and support and improvement of our congressional system is certainly deserving of some practical assistance from the Congress itself and its Members.

The following letter represents the views of a private citizen about the value of this project.

Respectfully yours,

HAL. J. MILLER,
Editor, Your Congress Magazine, Executive Director, Committee for Congress, Sponsor of Congress Study Councils, Washington, D. C.

Is the Loss of Asia Very Near?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RALPH W. GWINN
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, December 5, 1950

Mr. GWINN. Mr. Speaker, the danger to America is the greatest in our history. MacArthur fought the possibility of drifting into a war in Korea, to be fought by us. He urged, even begged support for Chiang and the Nationalist forces, the only friends we have in China. Their manpower was very great; ours, small. They held off Japan 7 years.

Congressman JUDD in the House urged this over and over again. He pointed out that going to war in Korea, after losing the mainland of China to communism, was like trying to salvage the little finger after abandoning the palm of the hand. Militarily, the terrain of Korea was the worst that could be selected.

So a major military disaster to our own utterly inadequate forces stares us in the face. All this time Secretary of State Dean Acheson has stopped and sabotaged the 500,000 well-trained Chinese soldiers on Formosa from attacking the Communists we fight. An estimated million guerrillas are on the mainland of China. They ask not for gifts to their economy; no gifts of our men for their battle. Instead, Acheson and our President deny them even the right to buy munitions from us. Our warships stop them from landing on the mainland to help fight the very Communists that shoot our pitiful little forces in the back.

In spite of this incredible slap in the face, Wellington Koo only a few days ago renewed China's offer of 40,000 troops. They are equipped and ready. Their own ships are also ready to transport them to the fight.

The numbers and equipment of the Communists in North Korea were concealed from us by our State Department. Just so it has misrepresented the numbers and equipment of the Chinese Communists on the Korean border. So sure was it that the Chinese Communists would not attack, it reported that our boys would be home for Christmas. The war would soon be over. Now its minions falsely charge MacArthur with making such reports. They want to make him ridiculous and destroy him just as they did Chiang Kai-shek and just as they do Syngman Rhee. The reason and the alternative is Russia and communism, agrarian reform, and so forth, and so forth.

If Chiang's forces could only be allowed to attack the flank of the Communists. That might well occupy half the Communist forces now in Korea and save us from the disaster threatening us. They are the only relief in sight for our dying, freezing, and fleeing men. Acheson's refusal to accept their offer and ship munitions to them a few years ago makes the charge of conspiracy within our own Government to deliver Asia and the Pacific to the Communists, the only reasonable explanation. If we have no friends willing to fight in China then the whole Korean adventure made no sense from the start.

Our delegates at the UN are instructed to meet with Chinese Communists on the Communists' terms. Their charge is "Americans are aggressors" in Asia. How can our delegates do it? Especially Republican delegates? They should resign before such humiliation. They have even given up the veto right to stop negotiations, headed by the British, looking toward the recognition of Communist China's right to be called respectable and fit to sit in the family of nations.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

These are real Communists; as rough and tough liquidators of their opposition as the Russian Communists themselves.

Oh, where, oh, where are the Lattimores now, who deceived us into treating them as "agrarian reformers" not like other Communists?

MacArthur made crystal clear to the Veterans of Foreign Wars meeting in Chicago in August the disaster that threatens the United States at this hour. His statement was squelched and the information in it concealed from us by our President. Nevertheless the substance of part of it is as follows:

1. The abandonment of Formosa would create a base for enemy action at the very center of our defensive perimeter.

2. Our enemy would be 150 miles closer to our present defensive areas of Okinawa and the Philippines than any other point in continental Asia.

3. In Formosa there is at present concentrated operational air and naval bases potentially greater than any concentration on the Asiatic mainland between the Yellow Sea and Singapore.

4. Formosa is like an unsinkable aircraft carrier and submarine tender, capable of offensive strategy endangering Okinawa and the Philippines. The Japanese made such use of Formosa.

5. The abandonment of China to the Communists, including Formosa, makes our position in the Pacific untenable.

6. It means the moving of any future battle area 5,000 miles eastward to the coast of the American continent—our own home shores.

7. That will completely expose our friends in the Philippines, Australia, New Zealand, Indonesia, Japan, and other areas, such as Alaska, the Aleutians and Hawaii. To use the language of MacArthur, it exposes them "to the lustful thrusts of those who stand for slavery against liberty, for atheism against God."

Were we to win World War II and then be betrayed to lose 5 years later world war III even now raging? Why did we enter this war without the deliberation and consent of Congress? Has Pearl Harbor been reenacted even more subtly? It is terrifying.

Think of it, now three Republicans—Austin, Lodge, and Dulles—are being shoved out in front of the stage at the UN to accede to the demands of Russia, the abandonment to it of Asia and the Pacific. Our attention is being diverted from this central criminal tragedy by the byplay of the war ending in Korea. Surely these great Americans will seize at this last moment available to them, the opportunity to reverse the plot and make triumphant the will of the forces of liberty to stand against communism.

There is but one possibility left of avoiding the spread of the third world war. The friendly forces still left in China, according to our best authorities, could with the material we could furnish them destroy their own Communist forces. If they are allowed to try, world war III might not develop further. Russia might not be able to fight a world war on two fronts. She must divide and conquer, as Hitler advised. She must win Asia, now that the war has started there, before she can attack Europe and the rest of the world.

The free Chinese, fighting the Chinese Communists, furnish us the only reasonable and honorable relief in sight. Let them join the UN forces with the Americans and the handful of British. That would be an honest "police action." It would unite the forces of freedom and make us all allies in a common cause against the spread of slavery around the world.

The Future of Coffee in the American Economic Picture

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALLEN J. ELLENDER

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, December 6 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, an address I delivered on December 5, 1950, at Boca Raton, Fla., before the National Coffee Association.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Ladies and gentlemen, I am delighted to be with you on this occasion, the annual meeting of your organization. As I look around me at the beautiful Boca Raton Club, with the majestic Atlantic Ocean just a few yards away, it gives me a glow of pride in being an American. We are not here to express or confirm our patriotism, but I cannot help remarking at the outset that we might all glance about us and thank God that we are living in an era and under a government that permits us to gather here and express our opinions on whatever subjects we might choose, without fear of reprisals.

I hope that my remarks may be of some value to you in assembling your portion of the great jigsaw puzzle that is our agricultural and national economy. The subject of coffee is one high in my interest. As most of you know, I was born and reared in the State of Louisiana, which is the focal point for trade with the coffee-producing countries to the south of us. The city of New Orleans is and has been one of our Nation's most important ports. It is recognized as the gateway to the Americas to the south of it, and to the great valleys of the Mississippi, Missouri, and Ohio Rivers to the north of it. New Orleans ranks second on the list of our Nation's seaports in the number of bags of coffee handled annually. Last year, 711,000,000 pounds of coffee or about one-fourth of our total coffee imports passed through that city's port facilities. Accordingly, I feel that my State and I have a vested interest in your business. If you prosper and the coffee business goes well, Louisiana will benefit along with most of you, and I might add in a lighter vein that southern Louisiana looks to the coffee business for yet another reason. South Louisiana is often referred to as the "Sugar Bowl" of the Nation, and I might say that our people would like to see at least one spoonful of Louisiana sugar in each one of your multitudinous cups of coffee.

I shall more or less arbitrarily divide my remarks this morning into three parts, but first, let me beg that you do not treat me like a certain Democratic Senator who died and descended into the lower regions. On his arrival, after he had shaken hands with the old devil himself, he assumed control of all of the infernal regions. Several of the older inmates began to resent this dictation from a newcomer. He started issuing orders: "Stoke those fires; sharpen those pitchforks; torture those souls a little longer." Finally, a committee of the older residents called upon him and demanded to know by what authority he had assumed control over the whole of Hades. "You act as though you own this place," snarled the committee chairman. "I do," answered the Senator. "And where did you get it?" demanded a voice from the rear. "Well," retorted the Senator, "didn't the voters give me hell in the 1950 election?"

As I started to mention, I would like to talk this morning about three things. First, I shall tell you a little about the so-called Gillette coffee report and its effect on coffee economies here and abroad. Second, I shall touch upon the role of the coffee industry in inter-American relations, and third, I would like to mention the future of coffee in the American economic picture.

I presume that all of you are already more or less familiar with the sum and substance of the Senate Agriculture Subcommittee's preliminary report on coffee, which was released as a subcommittee print late last spring. It has caused considerable furor throughout the Western Hemisphere, particularly in Brazil and Colombia. One might say it was a brisk bit of tempest in the coffee pot. This report was put out by a special subcommittee of the Senate's Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, after hearings. I might add that although I am a member of the Agriculture, Committee, I was not on the subcommittee.

Let me give you a little background on the coffee report. The United States Senate adopted in April 1949 a resolution which provided that in view of the ascending prices of agricultural commodities within our country, an investigation should be made to determine who, if anyone, was reaping unreasonable and exorbitant profits. A subcommittee known as the Gillette subcommittee of the Senate agriculture group undertook to hold hearings on, and account for, price spreads of various agricultural commodities—the difference or spread, that is, between the price paid to the farmer and the cost to the American consumer in his market or grocery store. Food prices were going up. Who was getting the benefit? Coffee was one of the commodities investigated and hearings were held a year ago, in order to determine who was getting the lion's share of the large discrepancy in price between producer and consumer. The result of these hearings was, of course, the widely publicized subcommittee print, the original coffee report. I had no prior knowledge of what had been adduced at the hearings, or what would be printed in the report, and I assure you that the document came as much of a surprise to me as it must have to all of you. I read it carefully after the furor arose in the coffee industry, in our own State Department, and at the Washington embassies of coffee-growing countries.

The chairman of the Senate Agriculture Committee designated me to head another subcommittee which was to review and, in our discretion, to revise the report. In short, I was an innocent, projected into the center of the controversy, in the role of moderator. I am not here to either damn or defend the coffee report, nor even to explain it, and certainly not to apologize for it. In my own mind, I do not feel that it needs any apology because I know what it is. It is not an expression of foreign policy promulgated by a policy-making agency of our Government. It is only a report to a Senate committee, or in the last analysis, an opinion of a very small group of investigators in the United States Senate. It was not, and should never have been construed as an official slap at our friends and neighbors to the south.

It is indeed most regrettable that the coffee report received the publicity and notoriety that it did. Unfortunately, the time of its publication coincided with some elections being held in South America. It became therefore a political springboard for anti-American interests, who sought to represent it as an official statement of our Government. It was because of this that the coffee report assumed international proportions all out of reason to what it was, and is—the result of hearings held by a reporting subgroup of a congressional committee. The opinion has been expressed that the findings and recommendations of the original report should have been suppressed and kept completely from the public. I feel that such star chamber proceedings are inimical to our American concept of freedom of speech. A further effort was made to have the original report killed in committee. This, too, I opposed, as I believe that once the die was cast and the report released, we should carry through and in full committee either affirm or deny the report's validity. And that is exactly what we have done.

The result of my subcommittee's revision I am sure you are all also familiar with. I assure you, it was no easy job to reconcile the different and frequently conflicting interests and apparently contradictory statements. I hope that the revision aided somewhat in calming the troubled waters of inter-American relations.

Meanwhile, some relaxation and clarification of the coffee situation has come with time. The events in Korea occupy much of our attention. The over-all cost of living and of food has continued to climb but coffee is no longer a pacemaker in the upward procession. Coffee is off the fire, so to speak.

And we have more light on the new crop that we all worried so much about. In earlier months we were faced with claims and counterclaims on the size of the crop, particularly the main crop in Brazil. The experts, if any there be, disagreed. Some said there was plenty; others pointed to drought in Brazil, floods in Guatemala and to unsettled conditions in Colombia. Our Department of Commerce saw no immediate shortage. But we know now that the 1950 crop was a short one, that the rising prices of futures did in some degree correctly forecast the emerging situation. In early September 1950 our United States Department of Agriculture estimated preliminarily that the five Latin American countries which supply most of our imports would have about 10 percent less coffee for export during 1950–51 than in the previous year.

A more recent and more comprehensive report by the United States Department of Agriculture (Foreign Crops and Markets, November 20, 1950) indicates that world coffee production in 1950–51 is forecast at about 2 percent below the 1949–50 output. The total crop is estimated at 36,766,000 bags of 132 pounds each as compared with 37,486,000 bags in the previous year, 38,926,000 bags in 1948–49 and a prewar average of 41,600,000 bags.

There is, as there should be, considerable coffee usage in the producing countries. The forecast for exportable production in 1950–51 is 28,445,000 bags as compared with 29,085,000 in 1949–50, 30,485,000 in 1948–49 and a much larger prewar average of 35,017,000 bags.

The crop in Brazil of 17,800,000 bags is significantly lower than the 19,250,000 bags of last year and much lower than the 25,350,000 bags average prewar. The Colombian crop of 5,740,000 bags is only slightly less than last year and substantially more than the 4,452,000 bags average of 1935–39. Guatemala actually came out with 50,000 bags more than in the previous year.

The Asian crop is up by about 200,000 bags as compared with last year but nevertheless produced little more than half as much as prewar.

You very probably have heard something of increasing production in Africa. You are likely to hear still more of it in years ahead. The facts seem to substantiate the rumors. The 1950–51 African crop is forecast at 4,671,000 bags, substantially more than the 4,176,000 of 1949–50 and a large increase over the 2,602,000 bags average of prewar.

There is also the matter of decline in consumption. Apparently there has been some decline, due in part, at least, to higher prices, in producing countries. Some think that consumption in the United States of America may have declined something like 5 percent since mid-1949. I can only report that the statistics which I have here of United States imports of coffee by months for all of 1949 and through August 1950 are not entirely conclusive, because imports expanded sharply after trouble broke out in Korea. Nevertheless, through June 1950, imports were substantially below the corresponding months of the previous year.

United States imports of coffee, by month, 1949–50

Month	1949	1950
	Pounds	Pounds
January	278,728,094	272,868,447
February	219,767,480	207,825,414
March	274,642,108	174,138,243
April	234,881,134	149,292,581
May	194,039,704	138,551,377
June	221,673,168	128,871,780
July	222,276,419	277,026,447
August	211,290,488	298,175,635
September	254,958,824	----------
October	244,348,804	----------
November	264,556,841	----------
December	295,826,588	----------
Total	2,916,989,580	----------

It also seems probable that western Europe may have been using less coffee during early 1950 than a year previous. Data at hand show that ECA authorized between April 3, 1948 through June 30, 1950, a total of $16,600,000 for coffee procurement but only $300,000 of that total was authorized April 1 to June 30, 1950.

All of this suggests that the supply is somewhat tight and consumer resistance substantial. Expansion in consumption of some competing drinks appears to be in the cards. This, I might add, seems to indicate the need for more effective cooperation between the coffee producer and the coffee consumer.

Few of you know better than I the need for maintaining cooperation within the nations of South and Central America. They need us, and we need them. If we are to maintain any degree of hemispheric solidarity, we must extend the hand of friendship to our neighbors to the South. For too long, the "Gringoes," with their dollar diplomacy, exploited Latin American markets. I feel certain that a tremendous underlying factor in our present relations with our southern neighbors is the fact that most of them are keenly aware of the pseudo-colonial status into which they were pushed in the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. Memories are long, but world events move on and require new solutions.

It is just lately that the tide has started to turn and that relative prosperity has appeared before the eyes of our South and Central American friends. During World War II, mainly as a result of an export boom and the nonavailability of imports, the Latin American countries accumulated large reserves of gold and foreign exchange. A large part of this, shortly after the close of the war, went into the replenishment of consumer goods inventories and the expansion of plant facilities. In the first half of this year alone, Latin American republics exported nearly three and one-half billion dollars in goods and services. Conversely, their importations amounted to over $3,000,000,000—a large portion of which came from the United States. More than a quarter of our total exports have gone to Latin America this year. Also during the first quarter of 1950, a record-breaking 39 percent of our country's general merchandise imports came from South and Central America.

To me, even more significant is the confidence that American businessmen have placed in the governments of Latin America. In 1946 the United States private investment capital in South America totaled $59,000,000. Last year this had increased over eightfold; American businesses had invested $481,000,000 worth with our southern neighbors. It is my private opinion that perhaps the largest single reason for this tremendous expansion of American confidence and investments in Latin America is that the countries to the south of us may represent the one underdeveloped area sufficiently removed from the threat of aggression, to attract sizable amounts of United States private capital. I say "sufficiently removed from the threat of aggression", but let me pause a moment. In these unhappy times of measuring every step we take and judging our every move on the basis of the ever-present threat of communism, we cannot blind ourselves to the fact that South America offers a tempting field for the operation of the Communist Party. It would be folly for us, ostrich-like, to stick our heads into the sand and blithely assume that the Communists have no interest in the vast resources of the southern Americas, or that they are not interested in fishing in troubled waters wherever there may be poverty and unrest.

Not only economically but also militarily we should, we must, have the wholehearted cooperation of Latin America, and what to me is more important, the Latin Americans must know that they can count on the cooperation of the United States. Nor must anyone forget that inter-American relations must be based upon mutuality. The benefits flow both ways, as they should, to us and to Latin America. It is only on a basis of mutuality that we can build a solid economic and military bulwark against communism. We all recognize that the United States has certain common interests with Central and South America. If a stronger bond can be forged among the nations of the Western Hemisphere, they will prosper and their defense against oppression will be strengthened. But it must be borne in mind that in order to draw of its benefits, all must contribute to its preservation and development.

As members of the coffee-importing business you are all familiar with the necessity for the maintenance of amicable relations with Latin America. You know that the stress and strain of intrahemispheric difficulties is reflected not only in the availability and price of the product you handle but also in a degree of over-all cooperation that you may expect from our neighboring republics. The picture, however, is broader even than that. The growing dependence of the United States upon other countries in the Western Hemisphere is daily more apparent to you as representatives of what is probably the oldest large-scale importing enterprise in the Americas. You will become increasingly important in inter-American affairs. You are tacit emissaries to the countries of the south. The relations between the United States and those countries will depend in a large measure upon your business and social acumen. We must face facts—from day to day our contacts in South America and in Central America must be strengthened; good will must be fostered, and we must embark upon an era of unparalleled good feeling and fellowship with our neighbors and friends in Latin America.

I say we must, and the need becomes more obvious as the world situation shows less and less sign of improvement. The United States consumes roughly 65 percent of the coffee produced in Central and South America, while the coffee-producing countries are dependent on us for a substantial portion of their economy. Today we are awakening to the fact that the coffee-producing and other South American countries possess raw materials completely indispensable to the development and defense of this hemisphere. I need only mention tin, copper, antimony, platinum, and many others. It is not, of course, my purpose here today to discuss the strategic aspect of our economy, although that subject would, I am certain, arouse your further interest as to the absolute necessity for the friendly relationships that should continue to exist among all of the peoples of the Western Hemisphere.

Let me put it this way, it is not only economically advisable that we cultivate the good will of the South and Central American Republics; it has become a military necessity if we are to continue any form of military production. Therefore, I say to you that your business relations with the coffee-producing countries and others in Latin America is a vital one. Our country and the Latin-American republics are coming to realize the urgent need we have for one another. You are all ambassadors without portfolio. I trust you will maintain the high standard of friendship for our southern neighbors that we all now realize is necessary to our joint well-being.

To return now to our specific concern here—coffee and the coffee business: The authors of the original coffee report have been widely denounced for criticizing the method of certain South and Central American countries employed to control the production and marketing of coffe, while we ourselves have a comprehensive government program of agricultural controls. The answer, however, is obvious; our Secretary of Agriculture is directed by statute, to sell all price-supported crops when the market for them has reached parity figures. We have stored the storables. Although we have gathered and stored tremendous surpluses of many commodities, these will automatically be released on the market when the price reaches or exceeds parity. In that way, our Government protects the farmers from ruinous prices, and also protects consumers against runaway prices in short-crop years.

I would be the last person to attempt to tell our southern neighbors how to run their farm economy. I think, however, they might well profit by the experience—by the bitter experience, some people say, of our own Government. I am utterly convinced that the only way an agricultural economy can avoid the boom and bust cycle is by sound planning. I do not care whether this planning is done by the farmers, or their cooperatives, or the Government, so long as it is carried out in a democratic manner, and so long as the farmer is permitted a voice in its execution and a fair return for what he produces. We all remember the disastrous low prices of the 1930's. You will all recall, too, the 7-cent coffee of 1940, and the stories of Brazilian locomotives burning coffee instead of coal—even of surplus coffee being dumped at sea. In all some 78,000,000 bags of surplus Brazilian coffee are reported to have been destroyed between 1931 and 1944. Tree planting has been sharply reduced. I don't think any of us want to go back to those days, but I feel that we would all welcome a greater degree of stabilization in the coffee industry. With the depletion of reserve coffee stocks over the last several years, you do not now have a cushion that those large reserves insured. Dry weather or frost can desolate the coffee crop, with a far more direct reflection now on world prices. Instability is not a good way to hold valued markets.

I am sure we would all like to avoid the high prices of short years and the glut of over-production seasons. We in America have, of course, no control over the production and marketing of world coffee. We can only speculate—and I use the word advisedly—and unobtrusively recommend from the basis of our own farm experience with other crops. The rest is up to the coffee-growing countries themselves. I will say only, that if coffee continues in short supply, with attendant high prices, its production in other areas, in Africa, in Asia, and perhaps in the Indies will be simulated considerably and meanwhile, the market for it may decline significantly in spite of population increases.

When the Eighty-second Congress convenes next month, I hope to be the chairman of the Senate Agriculture Committee. I know you are all interested to learn what, if any, recommendations the committee may make to the Senate regarding the coffee industry. At this point, I know only one which will affect your business. Senator THOMAS of Oklahoma, who, incidentally, was defeated and will not be back in January, and Senator GILLETTE, who will be back, have introduced bills in the Senate which will permit the inclusion of coffee in the definition of the word "commodity" as used in the Commodity Exchange Act. According to Senator GILLETTE's bill, coffee will be subject to the Commodity Exchange Act but there will be no further substantial amendment of the act. On the other hand, Senator THOMAS' bill will not only add coffee and other agricultural products to the "commodity" definition subject to supervision, but will also permit the Secretary of Agriculture to establish by regulation a minimum margin to be required and maintained in connection with the purchase or sale of commodity futures. If this bill of Senator THOMAS should be passed, your coffee transactions on the various exchanges will be regulated by the Agriculture Department.

I am opposed to Senator THOMAS' bill and will vote against it, as I believe that American market transactions have not been of such a nature as to require the imposition of these margin controls. Unless this bill is voted on before January—and I might say that the possibility of its being brought up is most remote—it will have to be reintroduced by another Senator in the Eighty-second Congress. You have my assurance that unless a material change occurs in marketing practices, I shall refuse to support any legislation that will permit bureaucratic control of your coffee market. My advice is that you yourselves make every effort to remove the causes that give rise to agitation for controls.

Incidentally, I should like to call your attention to one significant development which seems to have been stimulated by the ill-framed coffee report. You will perhaps recall that there was severe criticism of the restrictive type of contract employed in the coffee futures market. The Wall Street Journal of August 23, 1950, reported the following:

"Following the initial Gillette report on coffee, the New York Coffee and Sugar Exchange in June took under consideration the recommendation for a universal type of coffee futures contract.

"A contract along those lines known as contract V was adopted by the exchange membership on August 15 and in which trading will start September 5.

"On the same date, trading in a new modified form of S contract covering will begin. Eventually it will replace S contract covering higher grade coffees after outstanding old contracts have been liquidated. The exchange D contract, covering lower quality coffees, already is in process of liquidation."

I am happy to congratulate any of you who may have had any part in setting your own house in order. Such self-policing and responsiveness to criticism is very important in the democratic process, especially in a business which is peculiarly subject to public misunderstanding and which would like to escape further bureaucratic control.

I know of no other plans afoot by the Government to regulate your business. Most of you know that I am opposed to Government controls per se and that I feel that the government governs best that governs least. Since I was elected to the Senate in 1936, I have served 14 years on the Committee on Agriculture. It is to me the nearest and dearest part of my work as a United States Senator. It will always be. I promise you, as members of a business devoted to the handling of an agriculture commodity, that your interests are my interests, and that I shall leave no stone unturned to help America maintain its place as the greatest agriculture Nation in the world.

I leave you reluctantly, because I have so enjoyed my brief visit here. I feel that your business and your work is of tremendous importance in the industry and commerce of our country. It is more than that. Your enterprise and your relations with our friends and neighbors in the other Americas constitute the cement with which we will build a united wall against inroads by foes which would destroy our democratic way of life.

HON. HUGH BUTLER
OF NEBRASKA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, December 6 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, among a number of splendid addresses delivered at Spokane, Wash., recently, before the National Reclamation Association, there was one by the distinguished senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CORDON] which should be made available to all Members of the Senate, and I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD. It is a most interesting and valuable statement covering sound reclamation development.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SOUND RECLAMATION DEVELOPMENT
(By GUY CORDON)

Mr. Chairman, I need not say to you, who are gathered here today, that it is a real pleasure for me to have this opportunity to discuss with you ways and means whereby the productive values of the West may be realized to the fullest degree. The end we seek, while geographically sectional, is national in benefit.

The National Reclamation Association is a living exponent of the pioneering spirit which led the stalwarts of old away from security and easy living westward to new fields of adventure and trial. Great of heart, self-reliant, and contemptuous of danger, they sought naught but the opportunity to carve for themselves a future in the unknown. Cooperation in those far days was a necessity. It had the added value of building friendships. It was a voluntary sharing of danger, of labor, of accomplishment. This association has followed those footsteps.

In the early years of the century men of vision saw in the mind's eye a blossoming in the desert, a fruitfulness and plenty where then was only sage brush, the whirling sand devils, and the distant mirage.

Small in original compass but daring in concept, the reclamation program was one of cooperative effort. The basic mutual effort was between the Government, as the loaning and constructing agency on the one hand, and the settler, the water user on the other.

It was but natural that those who pioneered the settlement and development of the early reclamation projects and those who came with the services necessary to a civilized community should themselves band together to study and to solve the problems incident to this great new adventure in agriculture. And so the National Reclamation Association was born. I am not complimenting you, but stating only a simple and well-known truth, when I say that without your help the West would not be what it is today.

The problems which faced you in your infancy look simple to us today. They were far from simple then. The problems which face you today were unthought of then. I undertake to say that tomorrow's problems are equally veiled in tomorrow's mist, so far as we can project our thinking today.

We have, however, problems enough as of now to keep us reasonably well occupied.

To some of those problems I shall address myself at this meeting. Permit me to say at the outset that if I can be of any help, however slight, in the formulation and execution of a sound policy to meet the present pressing problems of reclamation in the West I shall be most gratified, and, I hasten to add, equally surprised.

It has been my experience that a clear understanding of the nature of a problem is an indispensable condition precedent to a logical search for a solution.

Our problem arises from the well-known fact that there is little, if any, remaining arid, potentially irrigable land left in the West, which can be reclaimed at a cost within the ability of the land user to repay.

As I understand the history of reclamation, the original concept embraced the basic proposition that no land was subject to reclamation which could not be reasonably expected itself to produce sufficiently to repay the principal cost of its subjugation to tillage. It is well to remember, however, that there was provided, even in the earliest legislation, that some nonreimbursable assistance—which I shall term subsidy, because that is what it is—should be given by the Government if the program was to have a fair chance of success. Initially, this nonrecompensable assistance was the rental value of the Federal funds advanced—forgiveness of the interest component, if you please.

It well may be that the happy condition of the Federal Treasury in those days had something to do with the decision.

It is equally possible, if not probable, that the fact that the original Reclamation Act provided for a reclamation fund to be created solely from receipts arising from the sale and disposal of public lands in the affected States, had a bearing upon the matter.

Whatever the possibilities or probabilities, the original act did not contemplate the payment of rental or interest on the moneys appropriated from the reclamation fund for reclamation purposes. That is precedent, and vitally important to us today in the reclamation States.

Let us keep in mind, that the reclamation fund was designed as a revolving fund, that all receipts from reclamation projects of whatever nature, were part of this special fund and were subject to appropriation only for reclamation purposes.

The provisions for these accretions to the reclamation fund are emphasized in importance by section 5 of the Townsites and Power Development Act (act, April 16, 1906, ch. 1631, 34 Stat. 116), providing for the payment into the fund of receipts from the sale of surplus power generated as an incident to the irrigation of lands under the Reclamation Act. This section has increased in importance as projects have increased in size and multiplicity of uses.

I commend the provisions of the abovementioned section 5 to the particular attention of this association in its further study of the present problems of reclamation.

Now let us get into the meat of this subject matter.

A condition precedent to any reclamation program in the field of agriculture must be a need for the additional agricultural production. If the need be immediate, in the near or in the distant future, the program should be geared to the time factor.

This statement may seem abstract to some, even silly to others. It represents stark reality to me.

In the coming years we are going to be faced with objections to reclamation development predicated squarely upon the claim that we do not need additional agricultural production, that even now we produce too much. Recent heavy surpluses in a few crops, notably the potato crop of the last couple of years, have focused attention upon this particular phase of our problem.

Much of the criticism I hear, and which undoubtedly you have heard, is ill-advised and based upon fragmentary information rather than that full view essential to sound judgment. Nevertheless, the criticisms do obtain.

The critics are becoming more articulate as a result of the very fact of the increasingly high costs of reclamation development—the ever-widening breech between the costs of reclaiming an acre of arid land and the amount that the user of that acre can afford to pay for the reclamation necessary to give that acre its value.

I urge that this association give more than passing attention to this phase of our problem.

Having demonstrated need for additional agricultural production, we face another precedent problem that must have consideration and legislative determination. That problem may be stated as a question: What is the maximum amount which, in consideration of the direct and indirect benefits accruing therefrom, we are justified in investing to reclaim an acre of arid land? Irrespective of whether the cost of the reclamation is or is not reimbursable, in whole or in part, this is a question of sound economy, a straight problem of value received for investment made.

I know that I am not alone in this view.

Various agencies of the Government interested in our natural resources, particularly in the field of agriculture, have given much thought to this phase of our problem. I am sure this association has done likewise. It definitely is a field for legislative inquiry. I am of the opinion that a legislative yardstick should be evolved to guide the administrative agencies in this most important determination.

Of this I am sure—and the recent debates on the floor of the United States Senate, with respect to the Columbia Basin account amendment to the omnibus public-works bill, make it abundantly clear—that there has been an awakening in various other parts of the United States to the importance of this phase of our problem. In my considered judgment, if the West is to have the support of the southern and eastern sections of the United States, which it has enjoyed in the past, it is necessary that we face this question openly and cooperatively, and determine it legislatively.

At first blush, one might be pardoned for holding the view that the maximum amount which can logically be invested in such reclamation is measured by the maximum amount that the user of the land can afford to pay—the original concept, as I have earlier stated.

A little further consideration of the matter will, however, indicate the fallacy of that view. A simple method of demonstrating this fallacy is to compare the amount of money received by the grower for his agricultural produce with the price therefor paid by the ultimate consumer. All of the intervening service charges relate back to, and are wholly dependent upon, the irrigated acre which produced the crop. Without going further into this aspect of the problem, I only suggest that here, at least, is the beginning of our yardstick.

Once we have determined the maximum sum which the Nation can afford to invest in reclaiming an acre of arid land, then and only then, arises the question of whether and the extent to which that cost shall, and can, be met by the user of the watered land, and the resulting question of who shall pay the difference between that total cost and the land user's payment.

There is the $64 question. Who shall repay the difference between total cost and the amount repaid by the land user or, as is usually said, the full amount within the ability of the water user to repay.

I have posed the question. I give you my answer to it.

In my opinion, repayment should not be made. Excess over land user repayment should be a nonreimbursable expenditure.

That difference is represented, in my humble opinion, in the added values accruing through the myriad of services which are created by, and are wholly dependent upon, the production from the irrigated land in question. The identity of the beneficiaries of those services cannot be determined; the value of those services, however, can. The values built upon the crop produced from that irrigated acre are as fluid as is the commerce of the United States. The sum total of benefits, direct and indirect, accrue to the economy of the Nation. Therefore, in logic and in equity, that difference in cost should be paid by the Nation.

There is a wealth of precedence for the position I take. Let me cite a few.

The rivers, canals, and harbors of the Nation have been improved and are maintained from the Federal Treasury. There is no reimbursement; the users of the waterways pay nothing for the transportation arteries into which tens of millions of dollars have been poured. That is, of course, plain subsidy. It is justified on the ground that cheaper transportation by water is a national asset. Parenthetically, I remark that production from arid lands is, at least, equally a national asset. I believe I can make a case in favor of its being a greater national asset.

A second, and even more illuminating precedent, is found in the Flood Control Act, which is in effect reclamation with reverse English. Hundreds of millions of dollars have been spent by the Federal Government to protect people, farm lands, homes, and industries from the ravages of flood waters. No portion of the funds so paid is reimbursable, or ever has been. This is based on the proposition that safety from flood damage makes for a greater national prosperity.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

Under the law, a flood-control project is justifiable when the total amount of damage prevented within the life of the project, capitalized at 2 percent, I believe, is equal to, or in excess of, the capital expenditure and operation costs, capitalized at a like rate of interest. Here, again the outlay is subsidy. I could give other instances.

In my opinion, the difference between the total cost of our reclamation project of today and the total amount within the ability of the water user to repay is likewise subsidy. Why anyone would cringe from the word as applied to reclamation, or deny the fact, which is indisputable, I am unable to understand. If ever a case has been made, or can be made, to justify nonreimbursable Federal expenditure, it has been made, and can be made, for the program of reclaiming the arid lands of the West. This is adding to the national wealth, contributing to production, making for agricultural strength and independence. It is in the American tradition of individual initiative; it promotes individual independence.

In my considered opinion, we should, and if we can have unanimity of effort in the reclamation States, we can write nonreimbursability of excess of capital costs over ability of water users to repay into the reclamation law.

I am well aware that there are many able students of reclamation, well versed in the mechanics of Federal legislation, who doubt that, as a practical proposition, such a provision can be enacted.

I am not unalterably committed to my view. I have been wrong before; I may be now. Here and elsewhere in conferences I shall present and assert my position. If a better solution can be found I shall join in the effort for its adoption.

I do not include among the alternatives, however, the so-called interest component provisions of the recent O'Mahoney or Magnuson—depending upon who is speaking—amendment to the public works bill in the recently concluded session of the Congress.

I am unalterably opposed to those provisions as they are spelled out in that amendment.

Upon careful and close analysis I find them fantastic beyond belief. Their vice is not in what they disclose but in what they conceal.

There is simply not the time available to us for that analysis, which alone can penetrate the legalistic jargon and reveal the concealed sophistry. I attempted to analyze these provisions in the debate on the amendment in the Senate. I spent over 4 hours on the Senate floor and then did not fully cover the subject. Much of the pertinent supporting proof was inserted in the form of tables. Because of the lack of time these tables were not orally examined in detail, nor their precise application identified and explained.

For those who desire to pursue the subject, I suggest that the debates are available in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, copies of which are found in most, if not all, of our public libraries, chambers of commerce, etc. Specifically, the debates began on page 4970 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 10 with a discussion by Senator WATKINS, of Utah, of the provisions of a bill which he had drafted and which he offered, entitled the "Interstate Water and Power Project Act of 1950." The ensuing debate, while not directly on the Columbia Basin account amendment, did include some observations with reference to it.

The debate having specifically to do with the amendment begins on page 5022 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 11 and appears on various pages thereafter up to and including page 5190 on April 14, all, of course, in the current year. Thereafter, certain amendments were offered in an attempt to salvage the reclamation aspects of the amendment. The action taken, together with the comments, appears in succeeding pages.

For those who may be interested in my own analyses, they may be found on page 5122, April 13, and up to and including page 5144, and beginning again on page 5165, April 14, and concluding on page 5175.

If the directors of this association feel that the material contained in the debates, pro and con, can be of value in the further study of reclamation problems, I shall be happy to have reprints made, with extraneous material deleted, for such distribution as may be determined.

My repudiation of the interest component provisions of the amendment does not go to the establishment of a sound accounting system for Columbia Basin power and reclamation projects. Neither does it go to objection to crediting to the nonreimbursable reclamation costs a reasonable portion of receipts from power projects if that should be advisable. Such an accounting procedure may well include prospective receipts so long as the inclusion is definite as to the percentage and time and certainty of the receipts. Any such accounting operation should be subject to audit from independent sources, as is the Bonneville account today.

I have had delivered to me a copy of a proposed bill on the over-all subject of the Columbia Basin account. I have not as yet had an opportunity to study the proposal so I am not in position to comment upon it. I assure you that this proposed bill will have my earnest consideration at the earliest possible moment. I hope that I may be favored with the views of those who have studied its contents. The future of reclamation is too vital to the West not to have the deep and constant study and attention of us all.

While we are on the subject of alternatives, let us have in mind that the term "the ability of the water user to repay" really should be "the ability of the water user to repay in 40 years." This repayment period has been in the law from the beginning. In many minds it has assumed a sanctity it does not, in fact, possess. Other installment-payment periods of principal account in the governmental field, as well as in private industry, have been liberalized during these last 48 years, time and time again. Liberalization under the reclamation law may well be in order. If the water user can afford to pay $100 in 40 years, he can afford to pay $200 in 80 years, and so on. The same user may not pay all the bill, but the production of the land will. If criticism be raised as to the additional length of time taken, answer is found in the fact that in like public works of like public value within like periods of time no payment is made.

That other suggestions have been presented, and will be in the future, I have not the slightest doubt. I realize, however, that with respect to our program time is of the essence. Let us suggest, confer, and agree without more delay. Let us frame and present to the Eighty-second Congress that type of legislation which we can all support and all defend. Let it have the virtues of all good legislation: clarity that all may understand; certainty, so that solicitors' opinions may not torture in interpretation; and lastly, command, so that administrative agencies may know the extent of and the limitations upon the powers and responsibilities created.

If we have problems, potentialities, and hopes, so have they in other regions of our country. We are part of a great adventure in building America. The part is less than the whole. Let us get help by giving it, let us retain confidence by deserving it. These are the signposts on the road to our place in the sun.

Water Supply Assured for Rensselaer County

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HERBERT H. LEHMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, December 6 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD a news article appearing in the Times-Union of Albany, N. Y., on October 5, 1950. This article reveals in interesting detail the benefits which the water-resources investigations of the United State Geological Survey extend to the citizens of every State. The joint Federal-New York State report described in the article is the latest result of a series of continuing studies designed to prevent or to lessen the disastrous effects of future water famines in my State.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WATER SUPPLY ASSURED FOR RENSSELAER COUNTY

(By Bill Breisky)

Rensselaer County readers who encountered the story were somewhat pleased, but not duly impressed with the glittering generalization of a Washington reporter who said recently that "artificial rainmakers, such as those employed by New York City, will be unnecessary in Troy, Rensselaer, or of Rensselaer County for some time to come."

The reporter was referring in somewhat glazed terms to a recently completed study of Rensselaer County water resources made by R. V. Cushman of the United States Geological Survey, conducted with the State Water Power and Control Commission.

Methods and results of the study were discussed in the story, but no mention was made of the important question:

"What does this report mean to the home owners, the industrialists, the farmers, and the businessmen of Rensselaer County?"

This is a story well worth telling, for with a small staff and a few thousand dollars, Federal and State scientists have joined forces to bring to Rensselaer County a permanent study that probably will pay for itself every year over again. Reports also have been published on similar studies in Albany, Montgomery, and Schoharie Counties, but the Rensselaer County report is the most recent one.

The push that got the surveys started came before the war when some wells in the Brooklyn area that had been pumped below sea level were ruined when sea water filled them. Hydrologists of the Geological Survey made plans for a comprehensive cooperative survey to be conducted with the State Water Power and Control Commission that would make greater use of water resources in the Empire State. The war halted the project, but focused a beam on work to begin in the Albany metropolitan area soon after the end of hostilities.

The scientists desired to determine the quality and quantity of water in the State. The study was detailed and completed. It discussed the geologic history, and stratigraphy of bedrock formations and the overlying glacial deposits.

More practically, the scientists were looking for positive facts that would enable residents and prospective builders to determine: How deep the average well level, what type of a pump they can use to best advantage, what their water yield will be in gallons per minute, what water temperature they may expect during the changing seasons, their best and cheapest sources of water supply, and how they may increase water supply and water power at home or in business.

The scientists were seeking basic information; they did not attempt an engineering job for any particular party. Their discoveries already have been utilized by a large number of persons and groups that had varying needs and requirements.

Preliminary planning for public water supplies in Berlin, Hampton Manor, and several other communities already has been aided by the study.

Consulting engineers have referred to it often in planning detailed installations.

Industrial firms desiring to locate in the county or which needed additions to their present supply found the study invaluable. Now they may determine, among other things, how much air conditioning will cost them, what likelihood there is of ever being flooded and whether the municipal-water supply would be more expensive than their own water supply.

Farmers have found many dollar-saving tips in the building of ponds and digging wells at the most advantageous site.

Home owners and builders outside the municipal water system have avoided the notorious problems of Mr. Blanding in deciding where to get their water.

Well contractors, well drillers, and pump manufacturers found out how close to the surface water occurs in different areas and whether there will be a greater need for shallow-well pumps or for deep-well pumps.

Assistance in the study was offered from many quarters. Testings were made under direction of Geological Survey district geologist M. L. Brashars and district engineer Arthur W. Harrington. From their office in Albany's Federal building, Holbert W. Fear headed the surface-water study while Erwin S. Asselstine directed the ground-water investigations.

Contributing agencies included the State department of health, which analyzed water samples, Rensselaer County Health Association, State museum, State department of commerce, United States Weather Bureau, and many water-district superintendents and well drillers.

The study shows the present water supply to be adequate and that flood waters, if properly utilized, could in some areas more than double the present supply if necessary. Most important of all, the Cushman report provides a permanent record that will be a permanent boon to the growth of Renssalaer County and the entire State.

Reclamation Bureau Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HUGH BUTLER
OF NEBRASKA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, December 6 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement which I have issued covering Reclamation Bureau policy.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SENATOR BUTLER SAYS CONGRESS SHOULD REVIEW FEDERAL RECLAMATION POLICY AT NEXT SESSION

Senator HUGH BUTLER, Republican, Nebraska, said today that rising costs of construction seriously hamper the development of economically feasible irrigation and power projects in the West and that this condition, as well as recent policies of the Bureau of Reclamation, require that Congress fully examine the Federal reclamation policy at its next session.

Speaking as chairman of the Senate Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs which, among other matters, has charge of irrigation, reclamation, and public-lands legislation, Senator BUTLER said present Reclamation Bureau policies regard the western irrigation farmer as an object of Federal charity. This attitude, he added, has provided an excuse for the Bureau to impose burdensome contracts on newly formed irrigation districts which give the Federal Government a virtual monopoly over the land and water resources of the West.

"On multiple purpose projects there are many benefits to be derived," Senator BUTLER explained. "These include electric power, irrigation and municipal water supplies, flood control, fish and wildlife benefits, and, in some instances, navigation.

"The major part of the wealth to be created by these projects will come from agriculture; and yet the farmer is the only beneficiary the Bureau attempts to control completely. Unless present Washington policies are changed, the farmer on Federal reclamation projects will have to labor under a tremendous burden of restrictions and regulations."

The Senator said he has seen the Bureau of Reclamation attempt to take control of both land and water resources in Nebraska under the guise of contracts with newly formed irrigation districts.

"Because construction costs have more than doubled since some projects were authorized, water users cannot repay the same proportion of the Federal investment in the normal period of 40 to 50 years," Senator BUTLER said. "On these grounds the farmers are requested to contract for water with the Federal Government acting in the capacity of a public utility. This type of contract is an evasion of both Federal and State laws inasmuch as water rights, according to Bureau testimony before a congressional committee, would not vest in any lands served nor in any municipalities which received project water. However, should the Bureau repudiate this position, it doubtless will still attempt to use utility type contracts instead of repayment contracts, since the Bureau's objective is to continue control of the land and water resources in perpetuity.

"The exercise of patronage and paternalism to the end that local autonomy will be destroyed seems to be the immediate objective of the personnel now in control of the particular bureau to which we have entrusted our development of reclamation. This policy is now being carried on in the name of planning the development of western resources. The provisions for repayment of construction costs by water users should be amended so that it will be clear that only repayment contracts can be entered into, and that these contracts will be definite as to time, the amounts repayable, and the rules and regulations under which farmers are to operate."

"Let no one believe that the western farmer, rancher, or metropolitan water user places so-called cheap power and water rates above freedom of enterprise and ultimate ownership and partnership in the projects we are building. But a condition exists respecting present costs, that provides a made-to-order argument for the bureaucrats. To put the United States into the business of selling water requires that State irrigation codes be ignored and State laws be reinterpreted.

"The use of a utility contract as a vehicle to extend the power of a Federal bureau, and to maintain such power in perpetuity, has, in fact, been attempted in Nebraska and in California. I have concluded that the laws defining project feasibility, repayment, allocations, and contracts must be carefully studied and clarified. My committee will give these matters first priority in the coming session.

"The determination of the period of repayment by water users has been considered a prerogative of the Congress. Our present difficulties on several large authorized projects arise from the fact that Congress was not fully advised as to the water users' ability to repay their share of construction costs within 40 years. Without consulting Congress the Bureau of Reclamation took advantage of a little-known provision in the Reclamation Project Act of 1939, under which the Bureau makes itself a public utility to serve in perpetuity as a purveyor of water. The farmer, under that system, ceases to be an owner and becomes a tenant with no hope of completing repayment of his construction charges. When the Bureau becomes a public utility in perpetuity, the farmer becomes a tenant in perpetuity."

The Senator concluded, "All authorized reclamation projects whose financial feasibilities have been affected by increases in construction costs due to the war or other causes, should receive special consideration by the Congress. The matter of repayment should be reviewed in the light of Federal expenditures for flood control, navigation, and rivers and harbors, the costs of which are not reimbursable by local interests. It is my belief that a reasonable repayment by water users should be required. Water users, however, should not be considered as debtors to the Nation for long or indefinite periods determinable only by the Secretary of the Interior and the Reclamation Bureau which seek new wards upon which to practice a philosophy of questionable origin. The problems I have mentioned indicate that we will need the best advice possible, with special emphasis on agricultural benefits, if we expect to bring order from the confusion which has become so evident in recent years, and which is a direct result of conflicting provisions in the reclamation laws."

A Formula for Action in Today's Crisis

OF
HON. KARL E. MUNDT
OF SOUTH DAKOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, December 6 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement prepared by me and a condensation of an editorial which appeared in the Huron (S. Dak.) Daily Plainsman.

There being no objection, the statement and editorial were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A FORMULA FOR ACTION IN TODAY'S CRISIS

Mr. President, America is today demanding leadership to give the vast potential strength and capacity of our great Nation force and direction in these days of crisis. Drift and policies of "letting the dust settle" have brought us squarely to the serious crisis which we now confront. Continued reliance upon haphazard hopes and belated reactions to moves by the Russian-directed Communists of the world can bring only chaos and confusion out of the already disheartening and darkened situation.

Today, this country needs a constructive plan of action. We need a positive American foreign and military policy. Each new day brings hope that the President will remove from office those responsible for their failures and frustrations of our prevailing policies and appoint in their places the most outstanding leaders in America, regardless of political party or personal favoritism. We need a National Cabinet comprised of genuine and acknowledged national leaders to meet this national crisis.

Indicative of the country's thinking is the following telegram just received from one of the Midwest's leading editors, Robert D. Lusk, of Huron, S. Dak., editor and publisher of the Daily Plainsman. This telegram is pregnant with food for thought and summarizes incompletely a lead editorial which the Daily Plainsman will carry in today's editions.

Mr. Lusk's suggestions are neither all-inclusive nor in final form but they do indicate courses of action far better than continued drift. They are preferable by far to permitting foreign heads of state to write our American course of action. They provide realistic suggestions for meeting the real problems of this dark day and hour. They are submitted for the consideration of the Senate and the country in the hope other Americans in and out of public life will come up with practical, detailed proposals for constructive action.

We are drifting toward disaster and it is a simple rule of physics that drift invariable leads only in the one direction—downward. Let us find the leaders and the resolution to develop and implement an American course of action which will prevent this crisis from degenerating into a chaotic rout of freemen and the principles of freedom which have made our country great.

HURON, S. DAK., December 5, 1950.

Senator KARL MUNDT,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.:

In the absence of anything else, here is something to kick around:

1. In order that essential confidence in Government might be restored at the earliest possible moment, a sweeping Cabinet change must take place, with the establishment of a National Cabinet with extraordinary powers and including in it the leading men of the country, regardless of party.

2. The above Cabinet change must include the appointment of a new Secretary of State with powers to remove any or all personnel in the Department without cause and without appeal.

3. Because the United States has a substantial portion of its fighting force involved in Korea, this country must immediately ask the United Nations that handicaps to its fighting an overwhelming and unexpected force be removed. These must include freedom in the use of weapons, in the selection of military targets, and enlistment of support. If such handicaps not removed by overwhelming or unanimous action, the United States will withdraw its armies from Korea as soon as its field commanders find their position untenable.

4. The United States will make the impregnability of the North and South American continents and their approaches from internal and external attack its first and prime effort and will proceed with utmost speed to accomplish this end.

5. The United States will welcome the cooperation, within or without the United Nations, of all free governments and freemen to weld themselves into an alliance to preserve and expand on this world the area of freemen and free governments. It will assist such nations to its utmost capacity after the requirements of America's bastion have been met.

6. The National Cabinet, acting as such, will be empowered at all times to enter into negotiations with recognized Communist governments leading toward establishment of world peace, but only if such peaceful settlement shall include freedom of commerce, trade, and the exchange of information between free and Communist lands and shall include an implementation of the elimination of the mutual danger of attack both by military and seditious forces.

BOB LUSK,
Editor, the Daily Plainsman.

Flag of the Free

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. IRVING M. IVES
OF NEW YORK
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, December 6 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. IVES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD the text of a poem entitled "Flag of the Free," by John A. Hofstead, an immigrant boy of 50 years ago, who has a profound appreciation and love for America.

There being no objection, the poem was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FLAG OF THE FREE

(By John A. Hofstead)

Up from the heart and the hope of creation,
Up from the depths of the soil and the sea,
Up from the soul and the surge of our Nation,
Rose and ascended the flag of the free—

Up from the bottom, the bedrock, the boulders,
Up from the toil and the toil of frontiers,
Up from America's makers and molders,
Up from their dreams and their hopes and their fears—

Up from the blood that was shed in our battles,
Up from the groans of the grueling grind,
Up from the souls of the slaves that were chattels,
Up from the prayers in the hearts of mankind!

Flag of the free, like the stars in the heavens,
Shed on us ever your luster and light,
Letting no masters nor leaders nor leavens
Cast on us shadows or darkness or night.

Flag of the free, let no taint nor dictator
Sink your bright stars in the sea's undertow;
Let no usurper, subverter, or traitor
Hoist in our homeland the flag of a foe!

Flag of the free, let no pall and no pallor
Cloak you nor cloud you, nor pale your bright hue;
Let but devotion, with virtue and valor,
Steep you, and keep you our Red, White, and Blue!

Flag of the free, may your folds ever flutter
Freedom and friendship and peace to impart;
Aye, as you whip in the breeze, may you utter Hopes shining on in humanity's heart!

Flag of the free, remain floating and flying
Streaming and dreaming on land and on sea,
Lighting and leading and waving and vying,
Symbol and signal of souls that are free.

Flag of the free, may you shield us, and shift us
Onward and forward, and upward withal,
Blend us and bless us and lead us and lift us,
Draped in your folds, when life's curtain shall fall.

Four Ship Cargoes for Red China Halted by United States

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL A. REED
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, December 4, 1950

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding the reports coming from the Government that shipments of war materials from this country to China have ceased, still the racket continues. With ECA goods being shipped from our supposed allies across the line of the iron curtain to be transshipped to Red China, all of these shipments are contributing to the horrible slaughter of our boys. The releases to the press over a period of time indicating that there has been a shutdown of these shipments may allay the indignation of the people, but it does not establish the fact that this racket has stopped.

Under leave to extend, I am inserting an article which appeared in the New York Herald Tribune of Wednesday, December 6, 1950, which indicates that at least four shipped cargoes for Red China were halted. So far so good. But the ships that have already sailed and those that will continue to be smuggled are not reported to the public. The article follows:

FOUR SHIP CARGOES FOR RED CHINA HALTED BY UNITED STATES—22 TONS OF STEEL ON ONE OF THE VESSELS ORDERED TO UNLOAD ON WEST COAST

SAN FRANCISCO, December 5.—In a general crackdown on shipments for Communist China, the United States Government ordered four ships at west-coast docks today to unload steel and other cargo.

Most important of the shipments was 22 tons of Belgian-made silicon steel bound for Tientsin, China, aboard the Norwegian motorship Igadi.

Paul Leake, United States Customs Collector, said the steel would have to be removed before the ship, scheduled to sail from Oakland, Calif., last night, could depart.

Balfour, Guthrie & Co., agents for the Igadi, said it would take 4 days at a cost of $15,000 to remove the steel since it was in the bottom of the hold. The agents offered to post a $25,000 bond guaranteeing that the steel would be returned to San Francisco after the ship unloaded other cargo in China.

But the Government rejected the proposal. "These are not ordinary times," Mr. Leake said. "We must take every legal precaution to protect this country."

The silicon steel sheets can be used for armor plate. They first were shipped to New York, then loaded aboard the Igadi.

Another Norwegian ship, the Greta Maersk, was forced to unload cargo at San Francisco, and a third, the Chastine Maersk, at Richmond, Calif.

The agent for these two ships, the Fred Olsen Line, said unloading of 45 tons of general nonmilitary goods would be completed today. The Government objected to these shipments because they had not been licensed. Shipping officials, unaware of the Government's new bans, loaded freight for Hong Kong as late as Saturday.

The fourth ship was the steamship American Mail, loaded with 4 tons of slashed automobile tires last week before the embargo was put into effect. Howard McGowan ordered the shipment, also bound for Hong Kong, unloaded before the ship could sail.

The tires were believed to be destined for transshipment to Communist China where the Reds would cut them up and use them for shoes.

Exporters said the Government ruling virtually will shut off all Hong Kong bound cargoes during the next 30 days until the Government sets up its licensing procedure. San Francisco normally does about $2,000,000 worth of business with the British crown colony each month.

Shipping men said the Government's action will work a hardship on them but they generally agreed with its principles.

What Policy Can Americans Now Agree Upon That Has the Best Chance of Saving This Country?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. JAMES S. GOLDEN

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, December 6, 1950

Mr. GOLDEN. Mr. Speaker, every American—and especially each Member of Congress—is deeply concerned in finding some successful way to prevent destruction coming to this country and preventing a devastating world war III from overtaking our people.

In the recent congressional elections held in the United States, each of the major parties showed almost equal strength, there being approximately only 1 percent difference between them. If our major parties cannot agree upon American policy at this time, then our great country will have disunity and lose half of its strength, that may cause us all to lose our precious liberties.

Terrible mistakes have been made in the past in our foreign policy, but America and the Republican Party, of which I am a member, must look to the future.

The time has come when we, as a party, need to offer our combined constructive strength to our country.

The Democratic Party and the present administration should set up a truly bipartisan foreign policy that covers all the Pacific areas, as well as Europe, and they should in good faith invite wholehearted participation in this bipartisan foreign policy upon the part of the Republican leaders of this Nation.

It is all right and proper, that prior to our great American elections we should deal in politics, and every man should speak his piece and vote and work as he believes, but the time for politics as usual, and business as usual, has passed in America. If we are to meet and overcome the terrible forces of destruction that are striking at the very heart of America, we will have to have a unified country and we will have to have the combined, best intelligence of members of both of the great political parties in this Nation, which is now possibly in its darkest hour in its history.

Joseph Malik, representing communistic Russia in the United Nations, has clearly demonstrated that Russia does not want peace and that she is driving toward a world-wide war. Russia is proceeding on false propaganda and trying to embitter the world against America.

On more than 40 occasions Russia has blocked world-wide peace by the exercise of the veto. The delegation from Red China which is now participating in the hearings in the United Nations, spent several days in Moscow before coming to New York.

Instead of offering some solution toward the Korean War, the delegation from Red China blasted America, accused her of all sorts of aggression, and said that the hundreds of millions of Chinese people intended to drive America and the United Nations out of the Pacific, and, instead of it being a peace overture, it was very close to a declaration of war against the United States.

With these deadly and powerful enemies that dominate more than one-third of the peoples of the world arrayed against us, determined to accomplish our destruction if possible, it is time that every good American should forget politics and join in a true bipartisan policy and lay plans to save liberty and justice and Christianity.

The forces of the United Nations fighting in Korea are made up of about 90 percent American boys and 10 percent of our allied nations.

At the present time, since the Red Chinese hordes have entered the war, equipped with Russian weapons, our forces are now outnumbered at least 6 to 1 and great additional armies are marching out of China and Manchuria toward the Korean border with such overwhelming force that we will soon be outnumbered 10 or 20 to 1 in Korea.

Early decisions are being pressed for in the United Nations. China and Russia are delaying proceedings in the United Nations every way they can. But even if a favorable resolution is agreed upon and passed, over the objections of Russia and China and their satellites, everybody knows that Russia and China will pay no attention to it and that they will not withdraw their armies from Korea until they get ready, unless they are stopped by force.

In the recent arguments, pro and con, concerning the question of dropping the atomic bomb in Korea, it appears that our present administration and the military leaders have agreed not to do so at this time.

Every day that the present situation continues, means the loss of several hundred precious American lives.

For America and her leaders in both parties to solve these pressing questions, we should all try to place ourselves in the position of American parents who have sons fighting in Korea against these terrible and dangerous odds.

The greatest force that is quickly available to oppose the Red Armies in Korea are the well-equipped and well-trained Chinese Nationalist soldiers now on Formosa. There are from 300,000 to 500,000 of these soldiers that could almost immediately be made available, and they have already, through their leaders, requested permission to enter Korea and China to engage the Communist forces in battle.

When their offer was first made, it was turned down by the United Nations, temporarily, upon the ground that if the Nationalist Chinese Army entered the war in Korea, it may cause the Red Chinese Communist Army in China to enter the war in Korea. Well, the Red Chinese Communist Army has already entered the Korean War. There is nothing to be lost now by accepting the offer of the Nationalist Chinese Army to fight on behalf of liberty and freedom.

In addition to this, almost 50 percent of the Chinese people, in my opinion, will quickly rally to the cause of the Nationalist Army, if they can have any hope of ultimate success.

America is better equipped than any other country in the world to mass-produce weapons of war. It will be far better for the American people to make a large contribution of war implements, and not use up so much of our most precious asset, the young men of this country.

Russia has been smart enough to use the manpower of other nations to do her fighting up to now. Why can America not be smart enough to use an army of possibly half a million Chinese Nationalists, by equipping them with the proper arms?

It is perfectly plain that Russia's plan of operations is to overrun Korea and drive the United Nations forces out of Korea.

They next intend to overrun and take Formosa, and then immediately, it will be their plan and design to overrun and conquer Japan.

It is apparent that they intend to conquer and dominate and control all of the land masses of Asia, including India, and the Pacific Islands, if they are not stopped. If they are permitted to conquer and dominate all of Asia, they will immediately become a much greater and more menacing power of destruction to the rest of the world, including the United States.

An army of a million and a half of well trained Japanese soldiers could be raised, that would be anxious and willing to fight the Russian and Red Chinese Armies. It may be said that to use the manpower of a conquered nation such as Japan, would not be in keeping with some of the treaties and agreements in regard to such subjects.

America has been too soft too long. She will, of course, never do a dishonest thing, but extreme measures must be resorted to now.

It is perfectly possible, and indeed probable, that the United Nations, or we ourselves, could take sensible steps immediately to create a combined fighting force of 2,000,000 men from Japan and Nationalist China. And there is a distinct possibility that in the future China may yield if necessary many more millions that would fight on our side in this struggle.

Nationalist China is a member of the United Nations. There is no longer any reason why their forces should not join the United Nations in Korea and the Pacific region. Furthermore, guerrillas in the mainland of China who are in sympathy with Nationalist China are now battling Chinese Reds and have captured a number of important cities and towns. If a large portion of the Nationalist Army were to be immediately transported and landed on the mainland of China, it would be an opportune time to strike back at the Chinese Reds and would do more to stop their march into Korea than anything else.

Then, our country should devote its entire national economy for the next several years for an all-out preparation for total war.

We should mobilize radios, television, the press, and advertising agencies, movies and all media of information—and we excel the world in this line—into a propaganda agency of power and effectiveness never before seen in this world, to carry the Voice of America and the great imperishable truths of liberty and justice and equality for all, to every corner of the earth.

To do this, we should enlist the best talent in America from all walks of life and from both major parties. Our propaganda should be true and it should be adaptable so that it could be understood by all peoples everywhere.

We should reexamine the friendship and intentions of all of our allies and let them know that we intend to resist communism everywhere, and let them make their decision as to whether or not they will stand up against communism with us. If they will stand up, assist these countries to rearm against communism; if they will not, discard them and center our strength where it will count.

Continue to take every opportunity to negotiate a peace, if possible, and never close the door on any effort that looks toward peace, and support all efforts of the United Nations in trying to accomplish world-wide peace, but at the same time prepare and rearm to take care of ourselves.

When our all-out war effort produces a sufficient amount of armed strength to guarantee that we can crush communism and establish liberty and Christianity all over the world, notify Russia that any other step toward aggression or making war on any other nation, will be met by this country blasting Russia off the globe, and that we will not engage in making war against Russian satellites but against Russia herself.

It is my belief that the above program is the best hope we have for world peace, and if world peace is impossible, it is the best hope we have to survival and to perpetuate the liberties and freedoms for which America stands.

Congress Should Quickly O. K. New Shipbuilding Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES A. WOLVERTON
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, December 6, 1950

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, on many occasions I have spoken on the floor of this House pointing out the importance of having an adequate merchant marine. The present emergency in Korea has demonstrated the need for such and justifies the statements that I have so frequently made that it is of prime importance that we have a merchant marine commensurate with the needs of our Nation both in times of peace and war.

I include as a part of my remarks under the unanimous consent granted, an editorial entitled "Congress Should Quickly O. K. New Shipbuilding Program," appearing in the Courier-Post, Camden, N. J., issue of Monday, December 4, 1950. This editorial clearly sets forth the importance of proceeding with the new shipbuilding program at the earliest possible day. It reads as follows:

CONGRESS SHOULD QUICKLY O. K. NEW SHIPBUILDING PROGRAM

An important step toward modernizing and revitalizing the American merchant marine and stimulating the American shipbuilding industry has just been taken by President Truman.

The President has asked Congress to give the Maritime Administration authority to start construction of a number of fast, new, dry cargo vessels before the end of the current fiscal year next July 1.

The money is already available. In the Independent Offices Appropriation Act of 1950 Congress authorized the expenditure of $132,000,000 for passenger ship construction, which is not considered as feasible or as imperative under present conditions as the building of fast freighters.

Mr. Truman now has asked that Congress make a simple change in the wording of the act, and permit the expenditure of $126,000,000 of this money on new cargo vessels. It is something that should not require prolonged discussion or debate, something that Congress could do at once regardless of the other weighty business confronting the present lame duck session.

Although the President in his request gave no hint as to the number or types of cargo carriers planned, the facts are well enough known in maritime circles. The $126,000,000 would permit construction of about 14 or 15 ships under plans that were completed some time ago by the Maritime Administration, which is in position to ask bids on them within a month, according to Vice Admiral Edward L. Cochrane, its head.

The projected vessels would be of 12,500 tons, with a speed of 20 knots. This speed is vastly superior to the 9 to 11 knots of the wartime Liberty vessels or the 15 to 17 knots of the Victory ships, both types which are outmoded and obsolete because of new submarine developments, yet constitute the vast bulk of our active and inactive merchant fleets.

Designs for the new vessels provide for their conversion into troop transports carrying 3,000 men each if emergency requires, just as the American President liners being built at Camden's New York Shipyard have been modified for the same purpose. It is expected that the new ships could be the prototypes for a much larger number which would be desperately needed in a third world war and would still be invaluable as cargo carriers in peacetime trade.

Admiral Cochrane and shipping men generally have been quick to express themselves as highly pleased over the President's decision to back construction of the new fast freighters.

The decision is so wise from every point of view that it will be most surprising if Congress does not give its speedy agreement and allow this urgent shipbuilding program to get under way at once.

Who Is Fooling Who(m)?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL A. REED
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 4, 1950

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks heretofore granted, I am inserting in the RECORD an editorial which appeared in the Iron Age dated November 30, 1950, entitled "Who's Fooling Who?" It follows:

WHO'S FOOLING WHO?

The star-chamber clambake on the excess-profits tax should scare the daylights out of us. The question isn't how much should we raise by taxes. It isn't even how we shall do it.

The catch is—how far we are going in this country to fool the people with fancy words? We have gone quite a way. We have welfare, gracious living, babies cry for television, freedom for labor, freedom for business, planned economy, security, and other words that leave a nice cozy feeling—so we think.

A lot of these high-sounding sugar pills cover some pretty bitter stuff. They taste good going down but sooner or later their deadening effects will strike home.

Business has not tried to dodge its responsibility on defense taxes. Industrial groups have used a lot of gray matter drawing up fair, logical, and anti-inflationary plans for taxes.

Does this mean anything to the administration or its yes-men? Of course it doesn't. They want a tax that will bring in just what business wants—but with a big difference.

The administration is holding out for a defense tax with an excess-profits label. That would give the people the idea that profits will be excessive. It suggests that business does not want to foot its share of the bill.

The excess-profits tax submitted by the administration is evil in itself. It limits initiative; it is sugar-coated but bitter in its probable effects. It is even loosely drawn and runs counter to its intended purpose—to fight inflation and prevent windfall profits.

Plans submitted by business and other organizations look at the problem sanely. They will raise just as much revenue. No one will get rich out of the defense program. But that is beside the point.

Debate has been limited. People have been insulted. Democratic ideals are being flouted. That is serious. It is as serious as defense itself. If we deny our people free expression—one of the things we hope to defend—we are as bad as the Russians.

Who is fooling who(m)? Let's find out—and soon.

TOM C. CAMPBELL,
Editor.

Our Foreign Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KATHARINE ST. GEORGE
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, December 6, 1950

Mrs. ST. GEORGE. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my remarks in two instances in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include an article by David Lawrence and one by George Rothwell Brown about the deplorable situation in which we now find ourselves due to the ineptitude of our foreign policy.

The articles follow:

WILL MR. TRUMAN REEXAMINE?
(By David Lawrence)

The Secretary of State, Dean Acheson, by his ironical criticism of those Republicans who want to reexamine our foreign policy, unwittingly gave momentum to the cause of reexamination itself.

Mr. Acheson said he didn't, of course, object to the kind of reexamination which goes on constantly before committees of Congress to explain policies, but he did object to pulling up the crop by its roots just to take a look at how it has grown. He charged that the latter is the true purpose of the so-called isolationist.

But Mr. Acheson completely misunderstands the temper of the country. He has revived a waning isolationism. He has failed to grasp the meaning of the large protest vote at the recent congressional election.

Reexamination is an unpartisan term. It doesn't necessarily mean repudiation of past policies or basic principles. But it does mean reconsideration to see if we are getting anywhere and if a modification will achieve the desired goals.

The present foreign policy, which has guided this country since 1947, has been based on certain assumptions. These assumptions were actually written into the laws which both parties in Congress supported and for which billions have since been appropriated.

America launched the Marshall plan and established the Economic Cooperation Administration on the assumption that we would get economic unity in Europe. We haven't gotten it.

America launched the military assistance program and the North Atlantic Treaty and established a mechanism for carrying out their objectives on the assumption, written into the law, that we would get an integrated military force in Europe. We haven't gotten it.

Is it possible that when we planted the present crop of dollars, expecting to get the white chrysanthemums of peace and unity, we actually furnished seeds that now bring us the weeds of selfishness and discord and even a craven defeatism on the part of governments supposedly allied with us?

Certainly it's time to reexamine policies and to do it with a realism which seems to have departed suddenly from the minds of some of the leaders of European governments.

If Europe does not intend to use our billions constructively, both on the economic and the military sides, how long will it be before we will breed a more and more powerful brand of "isolationism" in America and revert to the go-it-alone policy of the 1920's? Will not the voters listen to the cry that our billions should preferably be used to build up our own Army, Navy, and Air Force and that we should be done with European vacillation and "left wing" softness, of which there seems to be just now such an outcropping, particularly, in Great Britain?

Such a turn of affairs would be tragic indeed. Maybe some of this is our fault. Maybe our world leadership is not persuasive.

Secretary Acheson has a tremendous responsibility. He cannot maintain the principles of any policy by ridiculing those who wish conscientiously to reexamine our relations with Europe and the Far East.

The Chinese Communists recently chewed up a regiment of American boys. Do we now reward the Chinese Communists with a seat in the United Nations? Does international crime pay after all? Do the Moscow Communists go scot free?

What is the meaning of the drive for appeasement in the Far East, sponsored by Britain, which is sweeping Europe today on the mistaken theory perhaps that, if the Far East is written off with another Munich, there will be more American money for Europe?

The appeasement road is the road to war. The League of Nations, led by Great Britain, took that road in 1931 when Japan invaded Manchuria and United States protests went unheeded. Then, in 1935, came Mussolini's aggression in Ethiopia.

In 1936, the League of Nations dilly-dallied and Hitler marched into the Rhineland. Firmness would have turned him back.

In 1938, Great Britain and France appeased Hitler at Munich. Then came Nazi aggression in Czechoslovakia, in Austria and finally in Poland.

Today a plan to appease Soviet Russia and Communist China is being hatched in the United Nations. What will Secretary of State Acheson do about it?

Certainly it is time for reexamination. If we can't get better policies, maybe we will have to get better men to make them.

President Truman and the Democratic Party are truly responsible—not just Secretary Acheson, an appointed officer. Must we wait for November 1952 to put into effect by a larger protest vote the mandate of November 1950?

Let Farmer Truman reexamine his crops. Let him be sure that we have not sown the wind that "shall reap the whirlwind."

THE POLITICAL PARADE
(By George Rothwell Brown)

Prime Minister Attlee's visit in Washington, at one of the most momentous turning points in modern history—found President Truman confronted by a dilemma somewhat resembling that which threatens the Socialist-Labor Government in London.

It should be borne in mind in this connection that any agreement which the President may see fit to make with Mr. Attlee, if an agreement in this crisis, acceptable to American public opinion, is possible, will be made with a British Government which may be out of power in a matter of weeks.

In London the Socialist-Labor Government's majority in the House of Commons has been barely maintained at a shaky five.

In all recent bye-elections the Labor Government's margin of victory in virtually every case has been critically reduced.

In Washington, on his part, Mr. Attlee found the President of the United States, under the Constitution the officer charged with initiating all foreign policy, about to be confronted less than a month hence by a Senate in which the majority of the Truman Socialist-Labor government has been reduced to two.

Mr. Attlee has also discovered by this time that President Truman not only has a majority of but two in the Senate, but that it is a mere paper majority, and that actually he is the minority President of a minority party.

Both of these politicians are shaky, and they know it.

It also became evident as the President and the British Premier began their historic conferences, that any hopes which the Truman administration may have entertained that the bloody debacle in Korea, one of the worst military defeats in American annals, would have solidified a bi-partisan movement in Congress, had gone glimmering.

The headlines which Mr. Attlee read in his Washington newspaper told of renewed attacks in Congress on Secretary Dean Acheson.

Instead of diminishing, the demands for the removal of the Secretary of State increased on Capitol Hill to a steady drumfire.

But it was clear that the pressure on the President for the removal of Mr. Acheson would not end there even if he yielded to it.

At both Senate and House there is grim, tight-lipped resentment over the belated announcement by the Commerce Department that it had tightened the regulations governing the shipment of strategic materials to Communist China, to Soviet Russia, and the iron-curtain countries—an action properly denounced by Senator KNOWLAND, of California, as 2 years too late.

It will be recalled in this connection that at the time Senator MCCARTHY was firing his opening guns at the "crimson clique" in Mr. Acheson's State Department, the House Appropriations Committee turned up, in its hearings, evidence of a considerable number of fellow travelers in the Commerce Department.

Some of these had been removed. The current disclosures by Senator O'CONOR, of Maryland, of large shipments of important war materials to Communist China, through British Hong Kong principally, have intensified sentiment hostile to the administration at both ends of the Capitol.

Who in the Commerce and State Departments have been responsible for these policies, which have supplied to the Red armies of China vital war materials now no doubt being used to murder our soldiers in the frozen wastes of Korea?

Mr. Attlee doubtless discovered that the attacks on the Truman Cabinet were spreading from the State Department to other branches of the executive departments.

Meanwhile the British Prime Minister must be bearing in mind the fact that in a comparatively short time the new Congress will be considering an appropriation bill, containing proposed grants of financial aid to Great Britain.

There will be many embarrassing questions asked next year as these bills come up for consideration.

They will involve the revealed shipment of British strategic materials to Soviet Russia, and the fact that British socialism, financed with American tax money, is slowing down the British armament effort, notably in the perilous reduction in the output of British coal.

Korea

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MONROE M. REDDEN
OF NORTH CAROLINA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, December 6, 1950

Mr. REDDEN. Mr. Speaker, recently I received a petition signed by a large number of citizens of my county, reading as follows:

We are taking this means of conveying our feelings to you about the Korean situation and also about the situation in our State Department, even to our President. We appeal to you to go to Congress and demand action immediately. If you want to continue to hold the love and respect of North Carolinians who have voted and supported you, you will demand action on the floor of Congress. Withdraw our troops at once or declare all-out war on the Chinese Reds at once.

The people of North Carolina are fed up with talk and speeches and conferences. We want action before our boys are entirely slaughtered at the hands of the Chinese Reds. This situation calls for immediate action, not next week or next year. Let's bring our boys back in one piece instead of in a box. Let's call our Nation in repentance to God.

It is apparent that the people of Henderson County, N. C., like a great majority of the people of America, are distressed and disappointed at our mistakes in Korea.

My view is that we should never have permitted our troops to enter Korea and that we should get out now as speedily as possible. Of course, it is preferable if we can reach an agreement with the Chinese, based upon reason and justice for all concerned, but regardless of any agreement we are not militarily in a position to stay in Korea and should evacuate at the earliest practical date.

It is not alone a question of whether we wish to get out. The hordes of Chinese that are murdering our soldiers are so overwhelming in number that they are forcing us out and if they continue this onslaught our military strength is not sufficient to cope with the situation. The distance is too far from our homeland and the supply lines are too long when we consider the fact that the Chinese are fighting in their back yard.

The first great mistake made was in the announcement of Dean Acheson that Korea was not necessary in the defense of our outer perimeter. This was an invitation for the North Koreans to make the invasion that soon followed. It was a statement of our foreign policy to the world that we would not defend South Korea. It was our policy up until the time of the invasion of South Korea. We did an about face immediately after the invasion and this, too, was another great mistake.

Dean Acheson seems to be rather gifted in saying the wrong thing at the wrong time and this has helped to bring our State Department in disrepute before the American people. His usefulness has reached an end. The confidence of the American people in him to serve in this high capacity has long since been lost. He owes it to the American people to vacate the office and let it be turned over to someone who can maintain public confidence.

There are those who say we should stay in Korea to save face. I think we should begin to save the lives of the American boys who are dying in vain in that part of the world where America's foreign policy has collapsed. They are not fighting for democracy. They are not fighting an enemy who has attacked territory necessary to our national defense. They were not sent there by Congress, who is vested with sole constitutional authority to make a declaration of war. Congress has not been asked to take this step. Congress has been circumvented by those who knew such action would not be taken at the hands of the Representatives of the American people. Our soldiers are fighting in Korea because of the action of the United Nations in making an order to that effect in support of the announcement of the President of the United States reversing our foreign policy again.

The United Nations has become a great debating society. Its members argue and debate while Americans die because of an order this organization has issued.

We cannot finance or fight the battles of all the nations of the world and I contend that unless our forces are withdrawn from Korea at an early date, it is the duty of Congress to take action to see that they are withdrawn. I am unwilling to remain silent any longer. The time has come for Congress to assert its constitutional duty and authority, and those who fail to make their voices heard on this all important subject shall be called to answer before their constituents at the polls ere the final chapter of this great tragedy is written.

Struggle in Korea

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, December 5, 1950

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include the following article from a recent issue of the Boston Post, Boston, Mass. It follows:

PEACE HAS NO PRICE

After five momentous years Prime Minister Clement Attlee of Great Britain has asked for a consultation with President Truman on the questions arising out of the Korean War. It is to be hoped that the face-to-face talks will strengthen the determination of the western democracies not to do business with the Soviet Union—but there are serious doubts.

The struggle in Korea is not solely the concern of the United States. It is an issue which a majority of the United Nations must determine. Thus far the United States has provided most of the troops, spent most of the money, and suffered most of the casualties. There has been no carping at this circumstance, nor has the United States shown any evidence of faintheartedness.

Together the United States and Great Britain possess mastery of the sea, and qualitative mastery of the air, however deficient they may be in land forces to meet the Communist hordes. With the atom bomb British-American mastery of the air provides the strongest and most persuasive argument against Soviet aggressions. But such arguments will not prevail if one or another of the great western powers shows an inclination to make a deal with the Russians.

Must Britain learn all over again that there can be no more Munichs, that you can't make a deal with dictatorships? While the Soviet Union has been engaged during the past 5 years in an abusive campaign against the United States, it has been glaringly apparent that the Russians were cozening the Socialist government of Britain, striving to drive a wedge.

There isn't any question of whether Britain is a junior or senior partner in the coalition. The real question is whether Britain, France, and the nations in the North Atlantic Pact will stand firm with the United States, which, during the momentous 5 years since Prime Minister Attlee last visited this country, poured billions into Europe to make it possible for the western democracies to be equal partners in an alliance to guarantee peace.

British recognition of Communist China was expediency, and we are paying the price of that expediency today. If Prime Minister Attlee proposes another bargain with the Soviet Union it is certain that little time can be bought. A firm, resolute stand now will serve notice that the western democracies will make no deals, and the Soviet Union may halt its headlong rush into an aggressive war.

The utter irresponsibility of the Chinese Communists with their bellicose assertion that threats do not frighten anyone should convince the nations of the west that any price paid for peace on any terms with Red China is too exorbitant. If the price exacted by the servant is too high, what of the price that will be set by the master? Only firmness, resolution, courage, and integrity can cope with such barbarous blackmail.

Peace is something that has no price. It is secured only by the readiness of nations to hand together and face a common threat to their peace. Prime Minister Attlee must know how pathetic is the memory of Neville Chamberlain waving his little scrap of paper and crying that he had purchased "peace in our time." All that such deals can buy is the certainty of war.

Our Bankrupt Chinese Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HOMER D. ANGELL
OF OREGON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, December 6, 1950

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by S. Eugene Allen from the Oregon Labor Press of December 1, 1950. It follows:

OUR BANKRUPT CHINESE POLICY

(By S. Eugene Allen)

Shall it be war or peace?

That question hangs delicately in the balance. And upon its answer depends everything.

That is why it seems appropriate to consider China.

For almost a century prior to 1940 the United States had but two fixed and unchanging principles of foreign policy. One of these was the Monroe Doctrine. The other was the open door in China. In other matters our policy was flexible and adaptable. In these two matters it was fixed.

As a result of our policy toward China Americans came to have a warm and high regard for the Chinese and they, in turn, regarded America as their best friend.

The policy of the open door in China was not an emotional one. It was a practical one—a realistic one. We simply knew we could sleep better at night if China, the great Asiatic power was our friend. The policy we pursued involved no interference with the Chinese Government. We were not concerned whether she was ruled by an Emperor, an Empress Dowager, a boy king, or by a band of would-be Democrats.

How then did we come—in one short decade from 1940 to 1950—to so incredibly and so unhappily destroy all that we had built since the open door was established in 1844?

Read the following:

"The entire Communist political thesis could be reduced to a single paragraph: If you take a peasant who has been swindled, beaten, and kicked about for all his waking days and whose father has transmitted to him an emotion of bitterness reaching back for generations—if you take such a peasant, treat him like a man, ask his opinion, let him vote for a local government, let him organize his own police and gendarmes, decide on his own taxes, and vote himself a reduction in rent and interest—if you do all that, the peasant becomes a man who has something to fight for, and he will fight to preserve it against any enemy, Japanese or Chinese. If in addition you present the peasant with an army and a government that helps him harvest, teach him to read and write, and fight off the Japanese who raped his wife and tortured his mother, he develops a loyalty to the army and the government and to the party that controls them. He votes for that party, thinks the way that party wants him to think, and in many cases becomes an active participant."

The above paragraph is from the book Thunder Out of China. It was written by Theodore H. White and Annalee Jacoby. It was widely distributed in 1946 by the Book-of-the-Month Club. Neither Mr. White nor Miss Jacoby are Communists nor Communist sympathizers.

But this one paragraph sums up so well the whole cause of our utter failure in China.

It represents the opinion of most of the architects of statecraft during the past decade. It states, naively and utterly without guile, the conviction that the Communists are good people, agrarian reformers, and the bringers of a better life for downtrodden peoples. This view was officially supported by the United States Department of State. The many missions that were sent to China during the decade were all based on this assumption and were instructed to make certain as could be that the Communists were brought into the Chinese Government and made responsible for Chinese administration.

And so it was that in a single decade America destroyed all she had so painstakingly builded in a previous 96 years.

Our policy ceased to be one of friendship for China. It became one of interference within China.

Is it not incredible that we turned our back on the Nationalist Government of China which was the legally constituted government and which was friendly to America and sought to befriend the Communist revolutionary forces of Mao Tse-tung who were seeking to overthrow the legally constituted government of China and who were unfriendly to us?

Yet that was our policy. Today it comes to fruition.

There is no apology offered for Chiang Kai-shek. He was a stiff-necked despot. His government was corrupt. Most of the bitter criticism against his regime is valid.

Granted all this, upon what basis could our national administration choose to compound the evil by support of the revolutionary Communist drive to destroy the national government of China?

Chinese governments have always been corrupt. Communist governments are even worse.

Our stake in China was to keep her as a friend. But our studied policy for the past decade made her an enemy, and an enemy directed by Moscow at that.

In brief sketch this is what happened:

The Japanese ruthlessly invaded China in 1937. As a result of this invasion, American sympathies turned quickly to the side of our Chinese friends. China was hailed as a brave nation who rose heroically to resist barbaric aggression.

Chiang Kai-shek was a hero, not only to China but to America. There were China relief dinners. There developed an almost emotional attachment of American opinion to the Nationalist Government and Chiang. Preachers even implored divine intervention for the Chinese in their struggle. Even the Communists thought Chiang was a great figure.

(Russia has always feared Japan. Russia's interest lay in keeping Japanese aggression occupied in China, thus lifting fears of Japanese designs against Russia.)

With the outbreak of World War II, the Burma Road was closed by the British. Stalin and Hitler were bedfellows. Communists were no longer interested in bolstering Chinese resistance to aggression, for the war was no threat to her, she thought.

The Chinese Communists at this point began their revolution. They began to fight the Nationalist Government of China at the very time China's life was threatened by the foreign aggression of Japan.

In 1941 President Roosevelt sent son James and Owen Lattimore and Lauchlin Currie on special mission to China. They were disappointed because Chiang flatly refused to believe that the Communist revolutionaries were simple do-gooders and "agrarian reformers." They sought to induce Chiang to take them into his government.

Chiang refused even upon their urging.

Relations between the United States and China became strained.

On December 7, 1941, America was attacked by Japan. We were now allies with China, and immediately our hostility to our ally China became almost as emotional as our friendship for China had previously been.

General Stilwell went to China as Chiang's chief of staff. He constantly urged Chiang to accept the Communists into the Government. Finally, Chiang became so enraged with him that President Roosevelt recalled him.

Gen. Claire Chennault organized on a voluntary basis the famous Flying Tigers. This courageous band fought the Japanese invasion all along the China coast and kept out of Chinese politics.

A long wait was in store for poor China in her hour of peril. We simply hadn't enough matériel to give them much. A little was flown in over the Burma hump. At the Casablanca meeting the policy was still for China to wait. It had to be. But while we were unable to give China much aid or military support during these years, we gave her a great deal of advice. Most of it was to urge them to invite the Communists into the government. Giving a foreign power advice when they need matériel is an unrewarding method of conducting foreign relations.

One of the advisers sent by President Roosevelt during this period was Wendell Willkie. He came back and reported that the great reservoir of good will the Chinese had for the United States was leaking rapidly away.

Meanwhile journalists, week-end visitors, and others began to systematically undercut and scorn Chiang—still the legal head of China—and encourage the Communist rebels. Most of this activity was well meant. The new China hands took the Communists at their word that they were simply agrarian reformers seeking to right the ancient wrongs of Chinese landlordism.

By 1944 a real crisis had arrived. And by this time the Office of War Information, an official propaganda agency of the United States, was openly supporting the Communist revolutionaries and attacking the National Government of China and Chiang Kai-shek.

Then Henry Wallace was dispatched by President Roosevelt to see what he could do. It taxes the imagination to speculate on what he was doing. At this juncture Russia and Japan entered into a nonaggression pact. This meant that perhaps a million Japanese soldiers were freed to ravage China from outside while the Communist revolutionaries destroyed her from within.

Dismayed, President Roosevelt sent Patrick Hurley to China as Ambassador. After trying vainly to bring some order out of the mess that had been created, Hurley came home in disgust and said the career diplomats in the State Department were destroying any effective work for China.

In 1945 there was wide agreement in the State Department that China needed a Mao Tse-tung and not Chiang Kai-shek. And the final blow at decent relations with China was struck in February at the secret Yalta conference. This amazing agreement pulled Russia into the Asiatic war where she wasn't needed and couldn't do much; gave Russia Outer Mongolia; gave Russia control of the Manchurian railway; gave Russia control of the port of Dairen and the naval base at Port Arthur. It finally included the requirement that Chiang negotiate an agreement acceptable to Russia on all these points.

Hope was now all gone for a united China. The Russians began arming the Communists with Japanese military supplies. The situation simply deteriorated beyond repair.

Gen. George Marshall was dispatched to China by President Truman. He tried to save the situation. He failed only because it was beyond saving. He came home bitter about the affair.

The war was now over. We were anxious to get the boys home. The Communists pushed full-scale civil war. They won it.

The rest is recent history only too well known.

So in one decade we made a fearsome enemy out of what had been a fast friend. The Communists proved once more—as they always have—that they are Communists.

War or peace? The answer hangs delicately in the balance.

Youth Speaks Up

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KENNETH B. KEATING

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, December 6, 1950

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, with our young people lies our hope for building a stronger Nation and a better world. That they are aware not only of the opportunities afforded by our American way of life, but also of the responsibilities of citizenship which its continuance entails, is evident from the outstanding essays which are the products of the pens of three Rochester, N. Y., high-school students who were selected as the authors of the prize-winning speeches delivered in the Voice of Democracy contest sponsored by the junior chamber of commerce of that city. With pride in the achievements of these young citizens, I have requested leave to include their challenging and inspiring contributions in this permament RECORD. They are as follows:

I SPEAK FOR DEMOCRACY

(By Douglas K. Ahern)

My name is Douglas Ahern, or, just Doug. It isn't a real common name like Dick Brown or Bill Jones. It's just a name. The boy behind it, however, I can assure you, is as average and common as a hot dog on a picnic. Now, like the majority of my fellow men, I have stage fright if it becomes necessary to speak in front of a group of people so, it follows, that I must have a pretty good reason for speaking now. I have.

A while ago I was asked to speak on behalf of a very famous lady at a great trial. A trial that frightened me with the gigantic significance of its outcome. It is not a new trial. As a matter of fact, it has been dragging on for hundreds of years. Now, however, it is a critical period in its development. When I was asked to speak for her, I accepted immediately. Not because I liked the idea of speaking or that my few words would have any affect on the outcome, because they undoubtedly won't, but because she has done so incredibly much for me that I have a debt to her I never could possibly pay. Nevertheless, I must make an attempt.

It is my turn, very shortly, to speak at this trial and I thought perhaps you would like to hear me. You know, of course, that he, who governs our lives, the judge, has been on our side from the beginning. It is the jury we must convince. There are still many skeptical persons on it. You understand that it is not my friend herself who is on trial, but rather what she has created. Ah, there is my name. I am to speak for her now. Excuse me, please.

My Lord God, and you members of the jury, citizens of the world. You have on trial here democracy. It is a question whether you are going to accept or reject its ideals. You also, whether you know it or not, have its creator, liberty, on trial. No, don't correct me, for you must see, or I must make you see, that if you have democracy on trial, you have liberty on trial.

Part of the text statement of the Constitution of the United States of America says that, "We, the people of the United States, in order to secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America." This Constitution is as yet the most perfect recording of democracy obtained. If this democracy, under the Constitution, does secure the "blessings of liberty for the people," it is self-evident that liberty is on trial with democracy and that those who oppose democracy prefer oppression to liberty.

Now the question is, Does this democracy, under the Constitution, secure the blessings of liberty for the people?

On paper, in the Constitution there is an impressive array of liberties. To name a few, there is the freedom of speech, religion, and press, the right to assembly, the right to keep and bear arms, the guaranty of trial by jury, the right to free elections, and even an amendment saying that just because it was impossible to name all our liberties it didn't mean we don't have them. Ah, yes; I can read on your faces what you are thinking. You're thinking that from experience you know that all that is on paper is not a reality.

Well, let's take a look at the citizens of the United States and see how they feel about their country, its Government, and its democracy. You see an industrious but fun-loving people who have one of the highest standards of living in the world. You see great roaring cities with factories shooting rolling masses of black smoke skyward and quiet small towns with broad tree-shaded streets. You see endless plains tilled to perfection by the pride of ownership.

Move up closer. There's the gang down at the corner drug store. There's a political candidate making a sweating attempt to gain the favor of the people over his opponents because it is the people who elect him. What's that over there? Ha, some irate motorist blistering the seat of the local government for not fixing the hole in the pavement he's warned them about. The people love their Government very much, from what I can see. They must, for right now they are dying on the battlefield to keep it. It wasn't too long ago that their ancestors died to make it and its wonderful Constitution, and, although I am still too young, in the future I, too, should be glad and proud to give my life for it, for you see it is my country, too, and the people are free.

Well, what about it, citizens of the world? Do you want liberty or oppression? If democracy is on trial, so is liberty. As for me, if I can't have liberty, I shall at least die fighting for it. Ladies and gentlemen of the jury, I speak for democracy and its mother, liberty.

Thank you.

I Speak for Democracy

(By Anny Werman)

Democracy is a great symphony, written in the key of the individual and the time signature of all history.

The first movement is the greatness of democracy. Sometimes this greatness is slow, and sometimes it is fast, but it is always tremendous. It is so tremendous that no one can ever hear all of it. It is so important that it is often ignored. It is always present, but not always recognized. Often the greatness is hard to understand; more often it is misunderstood and misinterpreted. Confined only to slogans, it changes to littleness. The extent of this greatness is infinite and is lost in our daily language. This first movement is our goal and our inspiration. Greatness always has some portion of the divine.

The second movement is the sadness of democracy. The themes of this are war and hurt and failure. Death and half-deaths are here; the war that did not prevent a reign of terror; the war that overthrew the czar, but did not bring freedom; the war that did not make the world safe for democracy. Hurt is here: the sobs of a little Negro boy, the first time that he finds out that he is different; the screams that rang from the gas chambers around the world. And failure is also here: the failure of people who do not vote, the failure of people to whom freedom means the right to be selfish. Duties are often commonplace and dull. Responsibility is rarely easy or pleasant. But they both are part of democracy. Death and hurt and failure. The sadness is a long movement.

The third movement is the kindness of democracy. This is the blood bank that receives more than its quota. This is the story of the home-town boy who makes good: the William Allen White's, the Eddie Cantor's, the Andrew Carnegie's. This is a GI soldier giving his food to a Korean orphan. This is the American people sending thousands of dollars to one little girl who has polio. This kindness has become part of us. It is the goodness that forms the strength of democracy. We must have the greatness because it puts everything in its right proportion. We must have the sadness, because it is the price of everything important. But the kindness, the gayness, the goodness are firm and eternal. These are the best defenses democracy has against any of its enemies. These are the forces that keep democracy alive.

The fourth movement is the future of democracy. This is a triumphant march. The darkness of uncertainty is lighted by the knowledge of the past. Democracy has no need to be afraid; it has a right to be proud. It has survived the dark ages, Bonaparte, and Hitler. Dictators are forced upon people; they disappear. Democracy is part of mankind's dream; it remains. It has changed and formed itself into the mold made by each generation. It has bent before the wind of hate, and has not broken. It is a dynamic, ever-moving force. Democracy will live as long as there are people who believe. Our symphony will continue, played by men's hands and hearts and blood. The symphony of democracy is the voice of democracy.

I Speak for Democracy

(By David E. Bilhorn)

In this critical period in the history of man, when our way of life and system of government are being so severely tested, it is imperative that each one of us knows for what we stand and to what end we are striving. We must know this in order to help those peoples who are struggling within themselves, not knowing what to believe—trying to decide upon the merits of American democracy. We must not only know what we believe but act on those beliefs. Today, a democratic world will be gained only through conscientious effort, and all-out cooperation on the part of each person. No matter how many rules and laws there are in a game, it cannot be played without the players.

Here in America we have brought democracy a long way on its road to perfection. We have made it a social and governing system "of the people, by the people, and for the people." We are free to think, speak and act as long as we respect other people's rights. It is here where democracy succeeds or fails, and I am proud to be in America where this sense of respect for others is omnipresent. We are free only when we are responsible.

To live in America, under this social and governing system, is a great privilege. Since we are surrounded by all its joys and comforts, we are often amazed when people who come to this land of ours for the first time are so thrilled and awed at the things we consider everyday occurrences; going to a baseball game, eating popcorn, and driving leisurely through the country on a Sunday afternoon. The staccato voice of a pneumatic drill tearing up a pavement, making way for improved roads; the resounding blows of a lumberman felling a tree; the clear-cut hammerings of a carpenter building a new house; the shrill factory whistles announcing lunchtime, the happy laughter of many children. This is America to the ear. The fragrance of new-mown hay, the smell of a loaf of freshly baked bread, the aroma of coffee on a chilly morning, the scent of a wood-fire in the fall air—America like a whiff of perfume floating over a dreary world. The high majestic mountains, the picture of a brown, orange, yellow, and scarlet valley in the fall; the endless fields of wheat, hay, and corn; the skyscrapers stretching eagerly to the sky; the golden sunset on a silvery lake—America, a nation rich in progress, spread as an unfolding panorama before the world.

But democracy in America is not enough. It must spread to other countries, rolling away the fog that has settled over them. Democracy is what every man craves, but few are able to posssess. Why should democracy be a world force? Why do we want to establish a democratic government for all the world? Do we wish to gain power, and profit financially by it? No. Then why? In the first place, we know the freedom we possess in America and we want others to share it. It is absurd for any man who can think for himself to say that he would rather be a slave than a free man in a democracy. Deep down in every man's heart is the desire to work for himself, to try to throw off the shackles that hold him in poverty. Democracy does not promise that everyone should become rich, it gives a man a chance and a choice. A man works for himself and his fellowmen. Democracy is like a jig-saw puzzle, each piece complementing the other to make the composite whole.

In the second place, a democracy is governed by the people. Because of this, competition thrives and the people may enjoy the fruits of their labor. Through representation and election they put in governmental positions the men of their choice. These men in turn are their mouthpieces, for through them speaks the voice of the people.

And, in the third place, democracy is the only form of government in the world today which recognizes and protects the sacredness of the individual. What could be more important than this? It is the whole basis of our great Hebrew-Christian tradition. It is what the Magna Carta and the Bill of Rights were designed to protect. Revolutions in France and the American Colonies were fought to establish this fundamental ideal, and one of the main reasons for our entering the world wars was to protect this principle—this idea which is the basis of true democracy.

Democracy is our American heritage, and we are strong in the sense of our responsibility. We are ready to stand up, fight, and die for this precious gift that we cherish. That is why I am proud to be an American youth—to be able to serve my country—to defy any man to take away my freedom—to stand up, and speak for Democracy.

If He Won't Quit, Fire Him

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. E. C. GATHINGS
OF ARKANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, December 6, 1950

Mr. GATHINGS. Mr. Speaker, for a long time letters have been received by Members of Congress which have been most critical of Secretary of State Dean Acheson. Especially has this been true since the Alger Hiss statement was made by him.

I am firm in my conviction that Dean Acheson should not have been appointed originally as Secretary of State. There is an abundance of well-fitted and superbly well-qualified men who are available for such an appointment. I feel that it was a mistake when Mr. Acheson was confirmed for this position. If the matter of his approval was up for consideration at this time, I am doubtful that he would be confirmed.

In the crisis with which our country is confronted, full and complete unity of purpose and action is essential. I know of no better way to bring about a unanimity of feeling than for the Secretary of State to submit his early resignation.

Why do I say this? The No. 2 man in authority in the executive branch of our Government should possess the attributes of full and complete confidence, admiration, and respect of the Nation. He falls far short. It cannot be successfully asserted that Dean Acheson holds and merits the full confidence of the American people. The citizens would want and have a right to demand that a person selected for any place of high trust and responsibility should have no question mark upon him.

There is a question mark upon any man who would support and defend a convicted traitor.

The Memphis (Tenn.) Commercial Appeal of December 1, 1950, carried an editorial regarding Secretary of State Acheson which is in my opinion most worthy of full consideration by this body. The full text of the editorial follows:

IF HE WON'T QUIT, FIRE HIM

Need for national unity there is in face of the worst crisis in the history of modern civilization, but it won't be achieved at a price of keeping Dean Acheson on the job as Secretary of State. The administration and the Congress will make a fatal mistake if they attempt to use the present extremity as an excuse to protect him. He has got to go and with him the entire coterie of State Department "planners" responsible for the pro-Communist Asiatic policy which invited Red aggression in the Orient. If he won't quit, he should be fired, and if President Truman won't do it, the Congress can force it through the simple expedient of adopting a nonconfidence resolution.

The country has taken enough chances on the possibility of Acheson et al. having a change of heart, and the cost for chance taking is about as horrible as could be imagined. In that black hour when the American people first began to realize the extent of the Korean debacle they had a right to expect from their Secretary of State a clear expository as to what had happened and what, so far as his Department is concerned, would be done about. What they got in his Wednesday night radio address was so unrelated to the real crisis that he left them more bewildered than they were before he started his insipid delineation of what he calls "strategy of freedom." It must have given the Red delegations at the United Nations and the Kremlin's puppeteers a belly laugh.

There can be no unity where confidence is lacking, and there can be no confidence in the State Department as it is currently constituted. The Korean War started in June. We don't have to remind our readers where it is today. During the intervening months Acheson et al. have had almost free rein with their policy making, their appeasement efforts, and their "don't make Russia mad" strategy. This costly experiment has been in American lives, and the experimenters have forfeited the right to public respect.

President Truman is entitled to his personal loyalties and his too-blind friendships, but he has no right to inflict them on the American people and by so doing gamble with a nation's survival.

The War in Korea

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BRIEN McMAHON
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, December 6 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, an article on the war in Korea written by Homer Bigart, and published in today's New York Herald Tribune. It is a very interesting article and I believe it should be read by all Members of the Senate.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BATTLE FRONTS IN KOREA—BIGART SURVEYS SITUATION AS EIGHTH ARMY CONTINUES ITS GREAT RETREAT; CRITICIZES STRATEGIC DECISIONS

(By Homer Bigart)

SEOUL, December 5.—The full impact of defeat—the worst licking American arms have suffered since Bataan—has not yet been felt by the great bulk of American troops in Korea. The retreating soldiers are too weary and too preoccupied with immediate concerns to think of the consequences of this disaster.

Those who participated in the great retreat, those who are moving southward tonight on dusty, crowded roads to new positions in a series of desperate rear-guard actions, have no time to brood over the grim prospect for tomorrow. In this situation a man asks only to stay alive. He becomes a hoarder of days, and each sunrise is lovelier than the last.

Later, when the drug of fatigue has worn off and the fear of imminent death has subsided, there will be bitterness. Already some of the thoughtful officers are beginning to question the sanity of recent military decisions which may not have caused, but which certainly accelerated, this crisis. The most questionable decision of the last few weeks was General of the Army Douglas MacArthur's abortive offensive, which the enemy quickly turned into a defeat.

Before the offensive was launched it was noted by observers that any attempt to push beyond the neck of the Korean Peninsula would be unsound, even if the Chinese Communists withdrew. To fan out a small force along the rugged fastness of a 700-mile frontier with Red China and the Soviet Union simply made no sense. It was an invitation to disaster. Any frontier with a Communist power is exceedingly difficult to seal. That was learned by the American military mission to Greece.

Adequate vigilance of the lengthy frontier would have required a force many times that which the United Nations threw into the Korean campaign. Had our commands all reached the border, we would have been obliged to disperse our forces in small garrisons at isolated points. There would necessarily be unguarded gaps through which "volunteers" from China could cross and recross the frontier at will, exposing the garrisons to the constant threat of annihilation.

Yet, despite the certainty of border incidents that would compel the United Nations troops to remain in Korea indefinitely, General MacArthur's headquarters did nothing to discourage the belief that practically every one would be home by Christmas.

General MacArthur's chief of intelligence, Maj. Gen. Charles A. Willoughby, said last Friday that he knew there were 10 Chinese Communist corps either in Korea or on the Manchurian side of the Yalu River when the "home by Christmas" offensive was launched on November 24. Presumably General Willoughby passed this intelligence on to General MacArthur.

If SCAP (Supreme Command, Allied Powers) knew all this, why was Maj. Gen. Edward M. Almond's Tenth Corps given the green light to go traipsing up into the far reaches of northeastern Korea, leaving behind an attractive vacuum between it and Lt. Gen. Walton H. Walker's Eighth Army on the other side of the peninsula? Instead of buttoning up with General Walker, General Almond seems to have been fighting an independent war of his own.

It did not require any deep thinking by the Chinese Communist commanders to strike their heaviest blow down the center of the peninsula. The right flank of the Eighth Army was open and inviting. It was the sort of situation that the Chinese Reds, skilled in the Soviet technique of wide-sweeping envelopment, knew how to exploit. The Chinese counteroffensive quickly accomplished the dual result of caving in the Eighth Army's flank and isolating General Almond's corps. To escape envelopment, the Eighth Army was forced to fall back rapidly, with its flank still ragged and sloppy.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

Meanwhile the Tenth Corps faces the imminent prospect of a Dunkerque. Nor is the situation much better with the Eighth Army. For although General Walker's troops escaped entrapment north of Pyongyang, thanks mainly to the skillfully conducted withdrawal by the First Corps, under Maj. Gen. Frank W. Milburn, they are no longer capable of regaining the initiative from the overwhelming Chinese Communist forces, and they eventually may be obliged to pull back into a defensive beachhead perimeter.

The over-all strategic picture is even more depressing. Two-thirds of the existing trained professional troops of the United States Army are pinned down in a part of the world where little damage can be inflicted on the arch enemy—the Soviet Union. This is not a place where the west can achieve victory.

A unit commander, noting that the Chinese Communists had won with virtually no artillery, no armor and no air power, said: "We've got to choose our own battleground, where superior weapons can be effective. We should avoid fighting in this sort of terrain against any enemy that has a great reserve of manpower. We can't hurt Russia here."

President Truman Addresses Fifth White House Youth Conference

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. CLYDE DOYLE

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 5, 1950

Mr. DOYLE. Mr. Speaker and my colleagues, on December 5, the President of the United States very appropriately took time from his busy duties to go to the meeting of the Fifth White House Youth Conference. There were gathered approximately 6,000 delegates from all over this great Nation. The fact that the attendance at this conference for these several days is large, is, in my judgment, sufficient proof that the people of our Nation are increasingly aware of the importance of children and youth to the domestic security and best interests of the freedom of the world.

This appropriate address by the President of our great Nation speaks for itself. It follows:

TEXT OF TRUMAN ADDRESS TO YOUTH CONFERENCE

(Following is the text of the address by President Truman delivered at the Mid-Century White House Conference on Children and Youth in the National Guard Armory today:)

As we meet here today, the serious crisis in world affairs overshadows all that we do. This country of ours, together with other members of the United Nations, is engaged in a critical struggle to uphold the values of peace and justice and freedom.

We are struggling to preserve our own liberty as a Nation. More than that, we are striving, in cooperation with the other free nations, to uphold the basic values of freedom—of peace based on justice—which are essential for the progress of mankind.

As we engage in that struggle, we must preserve the elements of our American way of life that are the basic source of our strength. That is the purpose of this Mid-Century White House Conference on Children and Youth. You are seeking ways to help our children and young people become mentally and morally stronger, and to make them better citizens. I think you should press right ahead with that work, because it is more important now than ever.

NATION BEHIND FORCES

Our thoughts and prayers are with our young men who are fighting in Korea. They are engaged in a battle against tremendous odds. The full effort of the united people of this country is behind them. All of us are aware of the grave risk of general conflict which has been deliberately caused by the Chinese Communist leaders. Their action greatly changes the immediate situation with which we are confronted. It does not change our fundamental purpose to work for the cause of a just and peaceful world.

No matter how the immediate situation may develop, we must remember that the fighting in Korea is but one part of the tremendous struggle of our time—the struggle between freedom and Communist imperialism. This struggle engages all our national life, all our institutions, all our resources. For the effort of the evil forces of Communism to reach out and dominate the world confronts our Nation and our civilization with the greatest challenge in our history.

I believe the single most important thing our young people will need to meet this critical challenge in the years ahead is moral strength—strength of character. And I know that the work of this conference will be of tremendous assistance in the urgent task of helping our young people achieve the strength of character they will need.

MUST UNDERSTAND THREAT

If we are to give our children the training that will enable them to hold fast to the right course in these dangerous times, we must clearly understand the nature of the crisis. We must understand the nature of the threat created by international communism.

In the first place, it is obviously a military threat. The Communist-dominated countries are maintaining large military forces—far larger than they could possibly need for peaceful purposes. And they have shown by their actions in Korea that they will not hesitate to use these forces in armed aggression whenever it suits their evil purposes.

Because of this military threat, we must strengthen our military defenses. We are now engaged in a great program of rearmament. This will change the lives of our young people. A great many of them will have to devote some part of their lives to service in our Armed Forces or other defense activities. In no other way can we insure our survival as a Nation.

OBJECTIVE OUTLINED

Our objective is not simply to build up our own Armed Forces. Our objective is rather to help build up the collective strength of the free nations—the nations which share the ideals and aspirations of free men.

As a matter of defense, we need the combined resources and the common determination of the free world to meet the military threat of communism.

But our problem is more than a military matter. Our problem and our objective is to build a world order based on freedom and justice. We have worked with the free nations to lay the foundations of such a world order in the United Nations, and we must remain firm in our commitment to the United Nations. That is the only way out of an endless circle of force and retaliation, violence and war—which will carry the human race back to the dark ages if it is not stopped. And this is a point that we must make sure our children and young people understand.

MORAL, SPIRITUAL DANGERS

The threat of communism has other aspects than the military aspect. In some ways, the moral and spiritual dangers that flow from communism are a more serious threat to freedom than its military power.

The ideology of communism is a challenge to all the values of our society and our way of life. Some people are most concerned about the Communist threat to our economic system. But, serious as this is, it is only one of the many problems that communism raises.

Communism attacks our basic values, our belief in God, our belief in the dignity of man and the value of human life, our belief in justice and freedom. It attacks the institutions that are based on these values. It attacks our churches, our guarantees of civil liberty, our courts, our democratic form of government. Communism claims that all these things are merely tools of self-interest and greed—that they are weapons used by one class to oppress another.

ATTEMPT TO POISON MINDS

We who live in this country know, from our own experience, how false this attack of communism is. But there are many people in other parts of the world who have suffered injustice, or who have been oppressed, or who stagger under burdens of poverty or disease, to whom the false doctrines of communism have an appeal. And every time our American institutions fail to live up to their high purposes, every time they fail in the proper adminstration of justice, the forces of communism are aided in their attempt to poison the minds of men everywhere.

Our teachers—and all others who deal with our young people—should place uppermost the need for making our young people understand our free institutions and the values on which they rest. We must fight against the moral cynicism—the materialistic view of life—on which communism feeds. We must teach the objectives that lie behind our institutions, and the duty of all our citizens to make those institutions work more perfectly. Nothing is more important than this. And nothing this conference can do will have a greater effect on the world struggle against communism than spelling out the ways in which our young people can better understand our democratic institutions, and why we must fight, when necessary, to defend them.

AID TO DEMOCRACY

These White House conferences have done a great deal, over the years, to make our people and our Government conscious of our social problems, as they affect children, and to help solve those problems. These conferences have made our democracy work better—have aided it to carry out its promise of a better life for all.

In this fifth conference of this White House series, you are carrying on that great tradition. This year you are mainly concerned with the mental and moral health of our children. And that is exactly what you should be concerned with at this time.

I do not claim to be an expert in these things, and I know that I am addressing a conference of experts, but I think there are certain fundamental factors in the development of the American character. The basis of mental and moral strength for our children lies in spiritual things. It lies first of all in the home. And next, it lies in the religious and moral influences which are brought to bear on the children.

NEED RELIGIOUS TRAINING

If children have a good home—a home in which they are loved and understood—and if they have good teachers in the first few grades of school, I believe they are well started on the way toward being useful and honorable citizens. And I do not think I am being old-fashioned when I say that they ought to have religious training when they are young, and that they will be happier for it and better for it the rest of their lives.

In the days ahead, there will be many cases in which we will have to make special efforts to see that children get a fair chance at the right kind of start in life. For as our defense effort is increased, special problems will be created by the disruption of the lives of many families.

When the White House conference was held in 1940, the nature of the defense problems which lay ahead was not very clear to those who participated. But in the years that followed, we found that the defense program created many problems of migration, divided families, working mothers, inadequate housing at defense centers and military camps, lack of community services, and of facilities for education and child welfare.

EXPERIENCE FRESH IN MIND

Today we know much more about these problems, and our recent experience in trying to solve them is fresh in our minds. I know that the work of this conference will give us some important guide lines as to how we can handle these matters best. Our defense effort is all important, but we must do everything we can to see that it does not handicap the lives of children who are affected by it. The delegates to this conference can help us do a better job this time in meeting our defense problems. That is a vital part of the work of helping to make a healthier and happier life for all our children in the years ahead.

We must remember, in all that we do at this conference and afterward, that we cannot insulate our children from the uncertainties of the world in which we live or from the impact of the problems which confront us all. What we can do—and what we must do—is to equip them to meet these problems, to do their part in the total effort, and to build up those inner resources of character which are the main strength of the American people.

Individual self-reliance and independence of spirit are the greatest sources of strength in our democracy. They mark the difference between free countries and dictatorships.

WEAKNESS OF DICTATORSHIPS

The great weakness of dictatorships is that they enslave the minds and the characters of the people they rule. And the effects of this enslavement are most serious in the case of children.

I have been told by people who worked in Germany immediately after the last war that the young people in that country were physically among the healthiest in Europe. But they had been enslaved, mentally and morally, by the dictatorship, and when those controls were destroyed—when they were put on their own—they just didn't know what to do.

Brought up under dictatorial rule, they were unable to take care of themselves after the dictatorship had fallen. It takes time to correct this. The same weakness is characteristic of the Communist dictatorships where the children are just as much slaves of the state as they were under the Nazis.

BELIEF IN SELF-RELIANCE

Our form of society is strong exactly where dictatorships are weak. We believe in self-reliant individuals. That is the goal of our system of education and training—and that is the goal of this conference.

I know that this conference will make important findings concerning the ways we must adopt to meet this goal. I know that its labors will have value for years to come. The country looks to you for guidance, for help, and for inspiration. You have a great role to play in holding up the torch of freedom which this Nation has sworn to uphold, and which with God's help we will uphold.

Voters Repudiate Acheson and Communist Sympathizers—Demand a Policy Which Will Protect the Republic

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, December 6, 1950

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, the following is an editorial which was recently carried in the Allegan Gazette, a weekly newspaper published by Leo W. Hoffman at Allegan, Mich.

The editorial from the Gazette follows:

REEXAMINE MR. ACHESON

Subsequent to the election, Senator TAFT suggested that the American foreign policy ought to be reexamined.

Replying to this reasonable suggestion, Secretary of State Acheson called Senator TAFT a "reexaminationist" and compared his suggestion with "a farmer pulling up his crops to see if there as anything wrong with the roots," implying thereby that Senator TAFT was being very foolish to assume that any useful purpose could be served by "reviewing and examining our foreign policy."

This man Acheson is willing on the one hand to publicly express his trust and confidence in Alger Hiss the convicted perjurer whose influence and advice is directly responsible for the expansion of Communist influence all over the world, resulting in the loss of many of our men in Korea and billions of dollars, and at the same time not only refuses to act on the suggestion of Senator TAFT but attempts to belittle and smear him as being too ignorant to know anything about foreign policy.

At this point we would like to call Acheson's attention to the fact that it is the people of this Nation who are paying the price of his foreign policy in blood and work. The people of this Nation have a stake in this game of diplomacy called "foreign policy." We wish to remind Mr. Acheson that neither he nor Alger Hiss were ever elected to any position of Government trust and that just recently Senator TAFT was elected to a seat in the Senate by a majority of more than 400,000 votes.

We also wish to remind our Secretary of State that even TAFT's enemies admit he is a man of integrity and intelligence in public office, a man who is willing to confess from day to day that he may be wrong but who will approach any problem with an open mind desiring to do only what he thinks is best for his country.

When we think of our young men being killed and murdered in Korea, when we think of our boys being required to spend 2 years of their lives in the Army; when we think of the billions of dollars that we have spent in Western Europe in military and economic aid in order to persuade people there from becoming Communists; when we remember that Acheson and his colleagues refused to help the Chinese Government against the Communists and that he and his clique were wrong, oh, so wrong, in believing that the Chinese Communists were merely "gentle agrarians"; when we think of the billions of dollars that Western Europe and the undeveloped parts of the world are asking from us; when we think of the high taxes we will have to pay to support this foreign policy and the many hours of extra work that will be required of us to pay these taxes; when we think of the value of the dollar going down and down; when we think of the stupid, idiotic blunders that you and your New Deal predecessors have made, we think that it is time our elected Representatives in Congress give some consideration to our foreign policy, examine it and re-examine it, to see if this country is getting anywhere.

Our advice to you, Mr. Acheson, is to listen to Senator TAFT and his brother Senators without mental reservations of superiority in your mind. Examine your own record and acknowledge your mistakes of the past. If you had any common sense, which we consider the basic qualification for any office, you would realize that you couldn't be elected to any office in this Nation even if you were opposed by Joe Ferguson running on stickers.

Forget your fancy mustache, your striped trousers, your friendship with Alger Hiss, your fancy ideas of what is good for the world; bear in mind that it is your duty to do what is best for the people of this Nation and get down to work.

You have spent billions of dollars underwriting Socialist Great Britain, billions more in France and Italy, and yet we read that every third man in France and Italy is still a Communist. You don't want to build up an army of Japanese and Germans to oppose the Communists, yet you insist that American boys protect the Germans and the Japanese against the Communists.

It is about time someone in our Government accepted the truth. That is you can't always buy support for this country with money. It is about time we looked ahead and formed a foreign policy in the best interest of this country. Count noses around the world and form some opinion as to who is with us and who is against us and you can't count on the people you have to buy. The Hessians weren't worth much to the British in the Revolutionary War and the French and Italian Communists and their associates won't be worth much to us in the coming war with Russia.

MacArthur's Disaster

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BRIEN McMAHON
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, December 6 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "MacArthur's Disaster," published in today's New York Herald Tribune.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

MACARTHUR'S DISASTER

Chinese Communist forces, according to subsequent information, began crossing the Yalu in mid-October, when the United Nations troops, having secured the big naval base of Wonsan, were just beginning their drive on Pyongyang. General MacArthur paid no attention to this development until 2 weeks later, when the Eighth Army's rapid advance to the Yalu was suddenly unhinged by a Chinese Communist attack on the right and rear, forcing an abrupt withdrawal and regrouping along the Chongchon River line. There was then a dramatic communiqué; the war, it said, had virtually been won when the Communists "committed one of the most offensive acts of international lawlessness of historic record" by moving "alien" elements across the Yalu backed by a large concentration "of possible reinforcing divisions with adequate supply" in the "sanctuary" of Manchuria. "A possible trap was thereby surreptitiously laid," the communiqué continued, "calculated to encompass the destruction of the UN forces," but was evaded by the skillful defensive maneuvering of Gen. Walton Walker "in order to avert any possibility of a great military reverse."

Just 19 days later General MacArthur walked directly into the trap he had described, with a confident communique in which this appreciation of November 6 seemed totally forgotten. His air forces, he said, had "successfully interdicted the enemy lines of support"; the Tenth Corps in the northeast had "reached a commanding enveloping position" and the Eighth Army was moving forward that day in a "general assault" which if successful should "for all practical purposes end the war." Issuing this announcement, General MacArthur went back to Tokyo. Two days later the trap was sprung in a repetition of the maneuver which should have warned MacArthur in early November; one of the greatest military reverses in the history of American arms has duly followed; tremendous strategic retreats have been enforced on the UN armies and the whole position in the peninsula has been desperately imperiled.

Once again, however, prompt and skillful maneuvering, presumably by General Walker, has so far averted total catastrophe; and the black pessimism which appears to have engulfed Washington is not as yet sustained by anything allowed to come out through the field dispatches. It is true that the MacArthur headquarters, obviously in dire need to excuse a colossal military blunder, has now "estimated" that 1,000,000 Chinese troops are either in Korea or on the way. But on the record of the last 3 weeks, it is impossible to put any confidence in such figures; and it is becoming increasingly difficult to put confidence in the military capacity of a headquarters which has so gravely compounded blunder by confusion of facts and intelligence.

The Army Chief of Staff, Gen. Lawton Collins, is in Korea in an obvious effort to find out what has really happened. Washington's gloom has prepared the country for an enforced evacuation of the peninsula. It has not made it remotely clear how armies of well over 100,000 men, still retaining every modern weapon and full power of maneuver, could in a week be so completely overwhelmed even by superior masses of foot troops, as to see no alternative but evacuation. British criticisms of MacArthur's alleged political irresponsibility have seemed to this newspaper unjust, but a general who fails in the military field can scarcely expect to retain the confidence of the country. Until General Collins' findings are available one has a feeling that all judgment of the military position should be suspended; General MacArthur, at least can no longer be accepted as the final authority on the military actualities. We must be ready for the worst but we still do not know how bad in fact it may be.

Counsel for the Minority—Report on the Tydings Investigation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KENNETH S. WHERRY

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, December 6 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, in the October 20, 1950, issue of the Freeman, a magazine published in New York, there is an article on the Senate Foreign Relations Subcommittee's investigation of disloyal personnel in the Department of State.
